33-4-10

en in arms at the sound of the marseillaise and the great heart of Europe had heaved with the mighty pæan — Germany was born — Germany did I say? Bah! a handful of petty quarrelling principalities with powerful Austria on one hand and unknown Prussia on the other. Napoleon had lived, had conquered Europe, had humbled Prussia, already humble enough till a Prussian Prince a daughter of Wohenzollern, fled for his fatherland to her knees, and died in vain. But the time came when an empire arose in his stead. The flash of victory passed into his sword, but a Night a peasant met a worn and haggard man wandering through the fields of La Belle Alliance and the beaten one and thou and he anathema'd "Napoleon" and the peasant held his peace. The little Corsican had met his waterloo, and [illegible] the little Prince William of Prussia [illegible] on his epaulets when Otto Edouard Leopold von Bismarck was laying in the cradle of Schönhausen 2½ months old. In [illegible] these scenes as a boy he leveled and grew up every inch a nobleman, hating liberalism, loving Prussia and honoring the King. That strong character that once proudly told a corpulent tho H. von Bismarck was as good as H. von Anybody else, was seen when in those next Reichstag assemblies, where liberal mid with liberal

Each other in the audacity of their views, Bismarck in spite of hisses and cheers defended the prerogatives of the crown. Here he began to see that the salvation of Germany as a nation lay in crushing liberalism and that upon the ashes of Austria or Prussia the German Empire must arise. Immediately began to form that unbending purpose as he once expressed it: "I only care to see the word German instead of Prussian on our standard." Soon amid the low murmuring of revolution there came a change in Europe
One morning, night as Chancellor of the Reich broke his rest and cried "the King and William I of Prussia ascended the throne is dead; long live the King." Three years before a kindred cry arose beyond the waters

33-4-12

"The South is dead; long live the South. One year afterward, as someone has aptly said William performed the greatest act of his life when he called Otto von Bismarck from his star-hunting in Russia to be Minister of the Kingdom. Loud and long was the cry that went up from the German States: "Bismarck" and then the landing of Napoleon III across the Rhine "Bismarck, that is the coup d'etat!" And the fortune showed that their fear of the man who had dared to flout the Diet of Kings in their faces at Frankfort were not groundless.
With the unification of Germany before him
the first work of Bismarck was to crush Austria. His warrior King began the reformation of the army, and Bismarck contented by overriding the constitutional rights of the Diet [illegible] The Rhenish statesman was too [illegible] to let Austria choose the time and circumstances of the war which he saw was inevitable, but keeping on the Schleswig-Holstein dispute as a pretext, in defiance of the public opinion of Europe, being outvoted 5 to 1 in his own diet, in the face of the fact that Austria was one of the most powerful state of Europe, in spite of the South German alliance she had formed against him, almost against the wishes of King William himself he hurled Prussia into war against three times her number, and with the grim determination of a man who knows he is risking all, he struck the fatal blow and Austria fell as Königgrätz it was no more. But his genius did not end with the rapidity of onslaught or the audacity of attack; behind the smoke of Sadowa was the shadow of the master hand of the statesman. Hanover Hesse-Cassel and other German states were brought over to Prussia. Unknown to the French secret alliances were formed with the South German states and Prussia became the recognized head of Germany. The effect of this was seen in the liberals who had once hated Bismarck with a perfect hatred came over to him in a body. Prussia and the third Teutonic [illegible] took the first place on Europe: William, the most revered monarch; Von Moltke the most renowned strategist, Bismarck the most distinguished and autocratic statesman of modern times. But what said Bismarck. When they heard; now, they hungered; he was deaf & blind; his inflexible purpose never wavered. "No matter" said he "whether I succeed or not I will walk in the path I recognize as best for the Fatherland to the very end undeterred, whether I earn love or hatred thereby" Long ere the discerning eye of the chancellor had seen the cloud on the western horizon. The Czar first hated the Teuton; this was the hour of Bismarck's greatest problem was received with [illegible] at Paris. Negotiations concerned the seizing of Luxemburg & France were pondering before the Austrian war. Had Napoleon been sharper he might have seized the fringe when Prussia's back was turned but Bismarck outwitted him and now with Austria at his feet sent back word "Not an inch of German soil." Right on the heels of this came the news of the fall of the French empire in Mexico and the cedure of Austria to France's people. Was the glory of France all departing? The murmurs of discontent grew louder and louder, the imperial throne was trembling, Napoleon must do something;

33-4-14

but strange news comes to Versailles; forsooth Leopold of Hohenzollern will reign in the Escurial, and the Emperor fiercely stroked his mustache, "what!" said he, "what!
a Hohenzollern on the south of France too!
It cannot it shall not be" Bismarck saw the storm coming; he was ready for it ~~he~~ careful however that France should be clearly in the wrong and commence the war
The first demands of the French were granted but the French blood was warm; they became imperious and when met by a flat refusal declared war. "Oh yes" said the affable Baron de Beust "your majesty's armies are marvellously ready for war. We will drink the health of your

33-4-16

unde at Berlin" and all the French nation +said "Amen". But the Bavarian councillors had flamed to fool on German soil. All Prussia was in arms;
The secret treaties with the South German states became known; Mecklenburg began the talk Sedan ended it, and a German Emperor of the Rhine crossed the Rhine, a prisoner with Bismarck by his side. In seven months Paris was captured Alsace-Lorraine annexed, Germany Germany humiliated. Again Bismarck crowned victory with substantial fruit and on the 18th of Jan. 1871, in the Salles des Glaces of Versailles palace, where Germany's dictators Louis XIV and the great Napoleon had strutted and scowled, surrounded by his victorious hosts, William I of Hohenzollern was proclaimed the first Emperor of Germany by the grace of God and the genius of Otto von Bismarck. The life of this powerful chancellor illustrates the power of purpose. The force of an idea; it shows to students of history what a man can do if he will. "So near is grandeur to our dust so near is god to man. But it comes with its warning lest for example a lone

33-4-17

my good [illegible] advantage; let me raise a nation and forget the people, become a Bismarck and not a Moses. To the one object of his life [illegible] sacrificed even truth and Liberty. No lie was too [illegible] between [illegible] and success, no popular right but was hindered that [illegible] hand of iron. No one knows better than Bismarck that Bismarck is BISMARCK. His has gained a fearful power and he wields it; but in return for it he has made Germany a nation that knows not the first principles of self-government, that must have a Bismarck or after Bismarck the deluge. No man more than any other is responsible for making Germany a nation of thieves, for the ragings of Lassalle, the pressumes of [illegible] and the [illegible] of Bright. On a cold morning last March, the deputies of the Reichstag [illegible] bowed heads while a colossal figure in [illegible] uniform with bald head and [illegible] broke pushing the hard lines of his [illegible] mured that "His Master the [illegible] was dead" Lord now

COMMENCEMENT SPEECH DELIVERED AT FISK UNIVERSITY

JUNE - 1888

By

William E.Burghardt Du Bois

33-4-05

BISMARCK

Europe - the boundary of her nations fixed only by the sea, changed by every motive that can sway the human will: on the east Russia, the Slavonic giant stretching herself to the west with a force well-nigh irresistable; on the west England fearful of her Indian empire; France, ephemeral, impulsive, longing for revenge; on the south, Italy, Austria and the Balkan, awaiting the avalanche and the struggle for existence, in the north the German Empire, the keystone of European power. The Fate of Europe is in Germany and Germany is Bismarck. The Man of Iron, one of the strangest personalities the world has ever seen; brilliant, stubborn; - reckless, careful, a patriot, a despot: the Man of One Idea. Stirring times were those when the Iron Chancellor crowed in his gaunt, old home three score and ten years ago; wars and rumors of wars rocked his cradle. The spirit of Liberty had risen in arms at the sound of the Marseillaise and the great breast of Europe had heaved with the mighty paroxysm. Germany was torn - Germany did I say? Bah! a handful pf petty quarreling principalities with powerful Austria on one hand and unknown Prussia on the other. Napoleon had lived, had conquered Europe, had humbled Prussia, already humble enough, till a Queen, a daughter of Hohenzollern, pled for her fatherland on her knees and pled in vain. But the time came when an Emperor rose in his stirrup, the flush of victory passed into his eyes, but at night a peasant met a wan and haggard man wandering through the fields of La belle Alliance and he said "Who art thou?" and he answered "Napoleon" and the peasant held his peace. The little Corsican had met his Waterloo and Prince William of Prussia had won his epaulets// when Otto Edward Leopold von Bismarck was lying in the manor of Schönhauser two and a half months old. In these historic scenes as a boy he reveled and grew up every inch a nobleman, hating liberalism, loving Prussia and honoring the king. (glance up) Glances of Chat strong character that once proudly told a superior the H. von Bismarck was as good as H. von Anybody else, were seen when in those vast popular assemblies, where liberal vied with liberal in the audacity of their views, Bismarck, in spite of hisses and cheers defended the prerogatives of the crown. Here he began to see that the salvation of Germany as a nation lay in crushing liberalism and that upon the ashes of Austria or Prussia the German empire must rise. Immediately began to form that unbending purpose as he once expressed it: "I only care to see the word German instead of Prussian on our standard". Soon, amid the low murmuring of revolution there came a change in Europe. One wintry night a Chancellor of the Realm broke his rod and cried "The King is dead, long live the King!" and William of Prussia ascended throne three years before a kindred cry arose beyond the waters, "The South is dead; long live the South!" One year afterward, as someone has aptly said, William performed the greatest act of his life when he called Otto von Bismarck from his bear-hunting in Russia to be of the kingdom. Loud and long was the cry that went up from the German liberals; "Bismarck!" ~~and the~~ thinking of Napoleon III across the Rhine; "Bismarck; that is the coup d'etat!" And the ~~picture~~ showed that their fear of the man who had dared to flout the Divine Right of Kings in their faces at Frankfort was not groundless. With the unification of Germany before him, the first work of Bismarck was to crush Austria. His warrior king began the reformation of the army, and Bismarck contemptuously overriding the constitutional rights of the Diet, stood at his back. The shrewd statesman was too wily to let Austria choose the time and circumstances of the war which he saw was inevitable, but seizing on the Schleswig-Holstein dispute as a pretext, in defiance of the public opinion of Europe, being out-voted 5 to 1 in his own Diet, in the face of the fact that Austria was one of the ~~three~~ most powerful states of Europe, in spite of the South German alliance she had formed against him, almost against the wishes of King William himself, he hurled Prussia into war against three times her number, and with the grim determination of a man who knows he is risking all, he struck the fatal blow and Austria fell at Koniggratz to rise no more. But his genius did not end with the rapidity of military preparation or the audacity of attack; behind the smoke of Sadowa was the shadow of the master hand of the statesman. ~~Hanover~~, Hesse-Cassel and other German states were brought over to Prussia. Unknown to the French, secret alliances were formed with the South German states and Prussia became the recognized leader of Germany. The effect of this was wonderful. The liberals who had once hated Bismarck with a perfect hatred came over to him in a body. Prussia and the third Triumvirate arose to the first place in Europe: William the most revered monarch; Von Moltke the most renowned strategist, Bismarck the most distinguished and autocratic statesman of modern times. But what cared Bismarck. Then they hissed, now, they huzzared; he was deaf to both; his inflexible purpose never wavered. "No matter," said he, "whether I suffer defeats or not I will walk in the path I recognize as best for the Fatherland to the very end undisturbed whether I earn love or hatred thereby". Long since the discerning eye of the Chancellor had seen the cloud on the western horizon. The Gaul yet hated the Teuton; the rise of the house of Hohenzollern was received with ill-concealed chagrin at Paris. Negotiations concerned the ceding of Luxemburg to France were pending before the Austrian War. Had Napoleon been sharper he might have seized the prize when Prussia's back was turned, but Bismarck out-witted him and now with Austria at his feet sent back word, "Not an inch of German soil!" Right on the heels of this came the news of the fall of the French Empire in Mexico and the ceding of Venetia to Francis Joseph. Was the glory of France all departing? The murmurs of discontent grew louder and louder; the imperial throne was trembling. Napoleon must do something. But strange news comes to Versailles; forsooth Leopold Hohenzollern will reign in the Escurial and the Emperior forcely stroked his mustache; "What," said he, "what a Hohenzollern on the south of France, too! It cannot, it shall not be!" Bismarck saw the storm coming. He was ready for it, careful however that France should be clearly in the wrong and commence the war. The first demands of the French were granted but the French blood was warm. They became imperious and when met by a flat refusal declared war. "Oh, yes," said the affable Le Boeuf, "Your Majesty's armies are more than ready for war. We'll drink the health of Your Majesty's uncle in Berlin" and all the French nation said, "Amen." But the Berlin councellors had planned too well. They scarcely set foot on German soil. All Prussia was in arms. The secret treaties with the South German states became known. Weisenburg began the tale, Sedan ended it; and an Emperor of the French crossed the Rhine a prisoner with Bismarck by his side. In seven months Paris was captured, Alsace-Lorraine annexed to

33-4-06

33-4-07

33-4-08

Germany, France humiliated. Again Bismarck crowned victory with substantial fruit and on the 18th of January, 1871 in the Salle de Glace of Versailles Palace where Germany's dictators Louis XIV and the great Napoleon had strutted and scowled, surrounded by his victorious hosts, William I of Hohenzollan was proclaimed the first emperior of Germany by the grace of God and the genius of Otto von Bismarck. The life of this powerful Chancellor illustrates the power of purpose, the force of an idea. It shows what a man can do if he will. "So near is grandeur to our dust, so near is God to man." But it carries with it a warning lest we sacrifice a lasting good to temporary advantage; lest we raise a nation and forget the people, become a Bismarck and not a Moses. To the one object of his life Bismarck sacrificed even truth and liberty. No lie ever stood between him and success; no popular right ever hindered that ruthless hand of iron. No one knows better than Bismarck that Bismarck is Bismarck. He has gained a fearful power and he wields it, but in return for it he has made Germany a nation that knows not the first principle of self government, that must have a Bismarck or after Bismarck the deluge.

(Cut from Speech)

The man more than any other is responsible for making Germany a nation of theorists for the vagaries of Lasalle, the pessimism of Schopenhauer(?) and the idealism of Hegel. On a cold morning last March the deputies of the Reichstag stood with bowed heads while a colossal figure in Prussian uniform and only a moustache hiding the hard lines of his countenance announced that his master, the Emperor of Germany was dead. "Lord now ——.

9 4 is the master has passed down the Unter den Linden for the last time But the Iron Chancellor still lives In spite of two mistakes we must honor his patriotism when he leaves us he will leave a place that even his most bitter enemies must acknowledge none other can fill, and the name of Bismark shall ever be the name of one who gave his life for his fatherland
And —— now

The Financial South

Although all of us like money, yet there is an undefined prejudice against the money-maker. Perhaps this is natural for the science of Political Economy was in its infancy when Alchemy was flourishing in the full vigor of its manhood, when Alchemy had reached its dotage and when Bacon long since had crowned philosophy with his Novum Organum. It is the youngest science, and although we have gradually forced ourselves to accord due honor to Smith, Mill, Jevons and others in whose minds the science was conceived molded and brought near to perfection, yet to Dessemer, Ames, Vanderbilt, and Gould who have lent the awful might of their energies to the unfolding of the problems of wealth in practice, we have not only not accorded due honor, but have even heaped obloquy upon their names, have upheld them "to point a moral, to adorn a tale" If the U.S. owes much to the sturdy virtue virtue of Washington, there are others to whom it owes more; for instance to those men who set the great grain fields of the West beside the Mechanics door in the East, the coal mines of Penn. in his wood-shed; who struck the moneter distance with the electric wealth and it melted into nothing. Heroes of war may save their country, but heroes of finance make the country worth saving. Surely when Mark Hopkins built the P. R.R. and treated that great monopoly of which demagogues sigh and moralize, he was carrying clothes to the naked, wealth to the penniless, Christianity to the heathen; when W.m H. Vanderbilt formed that mighty consolidation known as the N.Y.C & H.R.R.R., reducing the cost of transporting a barrel of flour from Chicago to N.Y. from $1.50 to 50¢ he was giving food to the hungry, putting down riots and saving the world from that horrible face, that last relic of barbarism, which men call war, but which God calls murder. Blessed are the Peacemakers. The North Atlantic has been the field of the Financier in the U.S., & there he has accomplished a grand work. The circumgation of the Atlantic & Pacific have met a Breakage, and the West, no longer new and undeveloped is a field of sharp competition The South is to be the future theatre of finance in this country. To day, freed from its former bounds, it opens for the first time its wonderful wealth of forest hill and dale to the world, promising an El Dorado grander than the wildest dreams of the early Spaniard. Here, young men, is a field for us, a sphere of usefulness, a call & which we have no more right to neglect than a call to the Ministry. We acknowledge there are, have been, and will be many unadulterated rascals engaged in money-making; but are they only found there? If you are seeking a profession filled only by upright and honest men" you are but a stranger here heaven is your home"! Duty summons us to that field where we can best serve the world and its creator. It is not our business to dodge temptations. We each have a hole to fill and the round peg won't fit the three-cornered hole. If a man cannot make money to the glory of God he is no Christian and the sacred pulpit itself cannot sanctify his work. When God created wealth and brains he meant them to be used and increased. We need more men of principle in the N.Y. Stock Exchange, in the U.S. Senate, in the Nashville banks. We need more financial missionaries, more men like Peter Cooper and Geo. Peabody who could put their hands in their pockets and hand Fisk. Fiske a few thousand dollars, I tell you they would be greatly appreciated by the faculty of Fisk tonight. Finance is the mighty factor that will settle the race problems of the South. Christianity, Education & Hygiene, are needed, are demanded for the true advancement of our people; but the minister can't live on air nor the doctor on love, the teacher's influence will be small @ $15 and $20 per month, the scholar can't always depend on Northern charity for an education, and unless the Colored Georgia receives more cash in the future than in the past, he'll starve. When Negro capitalists own lands and railroads in the South, then, and not till then, shall we need school of Law Medecine and Dentistry. The interests of humanity call you to this field. What has been honorable in the past, it will be in the future in just such proportion as the comforts of peace exceed the barbarities of War. May you help to increase the race of divines, but may never a Lazarus be found at your door." ~~And when to Christian teachers lawyers~~ & doctors we can add Christian money makers then from the millions of the new South, white & black, high & low, shall go forth a cry "Now is the Winter of our discontent made glorious summer"

31-11-28

31-11-28

31-11-30

31-11-26

We, the students of Fisk University recognizing the need of on our part of a close cooperation with the faculty in matters of discipline and mutual interest, and knowing that the honor and reputation of the University depends largely upon our individual efforts, in order that hereafter our duties and our privileges may be more carefully attended to, and that the name of Fisk

31-11-25

in the past is hereby

Resolve that a University Senate be elected consisting of four young men from the College department two young men from the Normal department

[1890]

Jefferson Davis as a Representative of Civilization.

Jefferson Davis was a typical Teutonic Hero; the history of civilization during the last millenium has been the development of the idea of the Strong Man of which he was the embodiment. The Anglo-Saxon loves a soldier -- Jefferson Davis was an Anglo-Saxon, Jefferson Davis was a soldier. There was not a phase in that familiarly strange life that would not have graced a mediaeval romance: from the fiery and impetuous young lieutenant who stole as his bride the daughter of a ruler-elect of the land, to the cool and ambitious politician in the Senate hall. So boldly and surely did that cadaverous figure with the thin nervous lips and flashing eye, write the first line of the new page of American history, that the historian of the future must ever see back of the war of Secession, the strong arm of one imperious man, who defied desease, trampled on precedent, would not be defeated, and never surrendered. A soldier and a lover, a statesman and a ruler; passionate, ambitious and indomitable; bold reckless guardian of a peoples' All -- judged by the whole standard of Teutonic civilization, there is something noble in the figure of Jefferson Davis; and judged by every canon of human justice, there is something fundamentally incomplete about that standard.

1/0170

I wish to consider not the man, but the type of civilization which his life represented: its foundation is the idea of the strong man -- Individualism coupled with the rule of might -- and it is this idea that has made the logic of even modern history, the cool logic of the Club. It made a naturally brave and generous man Jefferson Davis -- now advancing civilization by murdering Indians, now hero of a national disgrace called by courtesy, the Mexican War; and finally, as the crowning absurdity, the peculiar champion of a people fighting to be free in order that another people should not be free. Whenever this idea has for a moment, escaped from the individual realm, it has found an even more secure ~~footing~~ hold in the policy and philosophy of the State. The Strong Man and his mighty Right Arm has become the Strong Nation with its armies. Under whatever guise, however a Jefferson Davis may appear as man, as race, or as nation, his life can only logically mean this: the advance of a part of the world at the expence of the whole; the overweening sense of the I , and the consequent forgetting of the Thou. It has thus happened, that advance in civilization has always been handicapped by shortsighted national selfishness. The vital principle of division of labor has been stifled not only in industry, but also in civilization; so as to render it well nigh impossible for a new race to introduce a new idea into the world except by means of the cudgel. To say that a nation is in the way of civilization is a contradiction in terms, and a system of human culture whose principle is the rise of one race on the ruins of another is a farce and a lie. Yet this is the type of civilization which Jefferson Davis represented: it represents a field for stalwart manhood and heroic character, and at the same time for moral obtuseness and refined brutality. These striking contradictions of character always arise when a people seemingly become convinced that the object of the world is not civilization, but Teutonic civilization. Such a type is not wholly evil or fruitless: the world has needed and will need its Jefferson Davises; but such a type is incomplete and never can serve its best purpose until checked by its complementary ideas. Whence shall these come?

To the most casual observer, it must have occured that the Rod of Empire has in these days, turned towards the South. In every Southern country, however, destined to play a future part in the world -- in Southern North America, South America, Australia, and Africa -- a new nation has a more or less firm foothold. This circumstance has, however, attracted but incidental notice, hitherto; for wherever the Negro people have touched civilization their rise has been singularly unromantic and unscientific. Through the glamour of history, the rise of a nation has ever been typified by the Stsong Man crushing out an effete civilization. That brutality buried aught else beside Rome when it descended goldened haired and drunk from the blue north has scarcely entered human imagination. Not as the muscular warrior came the Negro, but as the cringing slave. The Teutonic met civilization and crushed it -- the Negro met civilization and was crushed by it. The one was the hero the world has ever worshipped, who gained unthought of triumphs and made unthought of mistakes; the other was the personification of dogged patience bending to the inevitable, and waiting. In the history of this people, we seek in vain the elements of Teutonic deification of Self, and Roman brute force, but we do find an idea of submission apart from cowardice, laziness or stupidity, such as the world never saw before. This is the race which by its very presence must play a part in the world of tomorrow; and this is the race whose rise, I contend, has practically illustrated an idea which is at once the check and complement of the Teutonic Strong Man. It is the doctrine of the Submissive Man -- given to the world by strange coincidence, by the race of whose rights, Jefferson Davis had not heard.

What then is the change made in the conception of civilization, by adding to the idea of the Strong Man, that of the Submissive Man? It is this: the submission of the strength of the Strong to the advance of all -- not in mere aimless sacrifice, but recognizing the fact that, "To no one type of mind is it given to discern the totality of Truth," that civilization cannot afford to lose the contribution of the very least of nations for its full development: that not only the assertion of the I, but also to the submission to the Thou is the highest Individualism.

The Teuton stands today as the champion of the idea of Personal Assertion: the Negro as the peculiar embodiment of the idea of Personal Submission: either, alone, tends to an abnormal development -- towards Despotism on the one hand which the world has just cause to fear, and yet covertly admires, or towards slavery on the other which the world despises and which, yet is not wholly despicable. No matter how great and striking the Teutonic type of impetuous manhood may be, it must receive the cool purposeful "Ich Dien" of the African for its round and full development. In the rise of Negro people and development of this idea, you whose nation was founded on the loftiest ideals, and who many times forgot those ideals with a strange forgetfulness, have more than a sentimental interest, more than a sentimental duty. You owe a debt to humanity for this Ethopia of the Outstretched Arm, who has made her beauty, patience, and her grandeur, law.

[1890]

Cambridge

Jefferson Davis as a Type of Civilization.

—•—

Jefferson Davis was a typical Teutonic hero; the history of civilization during the last millennium has been the development of that idea of the Strong Man, of which he was the embodiment. The Anglo-Saxon loves a soldier — Jefferson Davis was an Anglo-Saxon, Jefferson Davis was a soldier. There was not a phase in that fantastically strange life that would not have graced a mediaeval romance: the fiery and impetuous young lieutenant, who stole as his bride the daughter of a rich ex-Governor of the land, [to the wars—

precedent, would not be defeated and never surrendered. A Roman and a lover, a statesman and a ruler, passionate, imperious, ~~overbearing~~, and unconquerable, bold reckless wayward & profligate — judged by the whole standard of Puritanic living stands there is something noble in the figure of Jefferson Davis: and judged by the Canon of human justice there is something grandly triumphant about this character.

I would not desire to, not the man, nor the idealization by the human mind. It is the ~~man~~ strong man — Individualism complete with the rule of Might: the word meaning core of the I, and the

Whenever this idea has for a moment left the individual ideal realm it has found an even more secure foothold in the policy and philosophy of the nation: the strong man and his mighty right arm appearing as the strong nation with its armies. Hence the ever increasing and more rapidly increasing respect now that advance in civilization is the use of one race on the ruins of another; that the only way for a new nation to introduce a new era with its work is by means of the sword! The constantly decreasing "room" in the world for civilization — a circumstance only possible when the aim of the world is not the advance of all but of one, — not civilization but Teutonic civilization being here a mere part, serving to the advancement of a part not of the whole, as this are found in the world moving in a more perfect condition?

It must have occurred that the Rod of Empire has in the days named found the South. In every country, however, there is to play a prominent part in the world — in Southern South America, S. America, Australia and Africa, a new nation has a more or less prominent part. This circumstance has however attracted but incidental notice, for wherever they have come or wherever their lot has been many circumstances have been unfavorable.

the glamour of history the rise of a nation has ever been typified by the Strong Man crushing out an effete civilization: that Barbarity ousted ought like devils Rome. when it descended Gallic hordes and drunk from the Rhine north has ever entered human imagination. Not as the mere warrior came the Negro, but as the cringing slave. The Teuton met civilization and crushed it - The Negro met civilization and was crushed by it. The one was the hero the world has ever worshipped, who conquering a new world - powers with the boldness of unrivalled self-confidence, won triumphs without thought of mistakes and made Mistakes with who gained unthought of triumphs and made unthought of mistakes such unparalleled audacity, that the world ~~since~~ rarely ~~will~~ think of their proper names. The other was the personification of a corpse for three days, & the miserable ~~and~~ waiting. Virtues in strong minds, serving, in ~~the~~ women & hopeless apprentice ship, they were examined and prized by no mistress past. They never win the thirsting of Nature, & never ~~have~~ heard ~~from~~ those beloved of Zeus. In whose victory, we seek ~~the~~ the element of the true definition of Self, and Woman and free, ~~but~~ but we ~~are~~ to the general mean view of subordination, depend from command, easy rules or stupidity, such as the world never knew ~~&~~ we free. This is the one which by it was means must play a part in the world of tomorrow and this is the race with posture patient pleading have gone to sunning their heads and duller and sitting up their household gods before they have set up their household gods. This is the nation ~~to which~~ whose race

I contend has ~~not~~ gracefully ministered an ~~world~~ which is at once the check and complement of the Saxonic ~~Jefferson Davis~~ strong Man. It is the doctrine of the submissive Man. — given to the world, by strange coincidence, by the race of whose rights Jefferson Davis had not heard.* The Zenton stands today as the champion of the idea of Personal ~~Liberty~~ assertion. The Negro as the peculiar embodiment of the idea of Personal Submission either alone lends to abnormal development — or else Despotism on the one hand

which the world has just come to fear and yet sneakingly admires or toward Slavery, on the other hand which the world and yet which yet is not wholly despicable. despises. No matter how great and striking the Teutonic type of impetuous manhood may be, it must resign the one purposeful "Ich dien" of the African for its sound and just develope-ment. In the use then of the negro race and the development of this idea you

From this point of view civilization presents itself not as a process of homogeneity. the evolution of one idea of St Edmundsbury, one Jefferson Davis, not the triumph of one great nation, not as an analysis with the fusing out of every nation not reaching an arbitrary standard, but rather as a process of synthesis of all whose nation was founded on the truest ideals & who took those ideals with the most assurance have most whose own nation was founded on the worst ideals of a Jefferson Davis, & who than a sentimental interest more than a sentimental duty.

You owe a debt to humanity for this Ethiopia w/ the Outstretched Arm — ~~on whose countenance was~~ ~~not the least trace of negro was no~~ ~~expression~~ — who has made her beauty, patience, and her grandeur, hers.

Zizis

You cannot speak this in ten minutes, and should cut it down, accordingly. Your title does not give your subject; or are there two subjects? The first part is the best, but throughout strange words appear now & then, and sprawling sentences. You do not bring out your point strongly & once for all

(FRAGMENT)

slave. The Proton met civilization and crushed it – ~~the Negro met~~ civilisations and crushed it – the Negro met civilisations

1/0/62

Carlyle.

I have made bold to say a word to you tonight partly because I have something to say and partly because the inspiration of your presence means so much to me.

We as the architects and builders of a new nation — the hesitating blacksmiths of a unique and burning Idea, are apt to think that our position is so unusual and unheard of, that there is little in the world's wonderful storehouse of thought that can light the darkness of our path. No more fatal mistake could be made. Wisdom is one never repeats itself, but none the less there is a certain one new to all thought which makes the thinker of the first century prime minister to the thinkers of the last, and they in turn but moulders of the central ideas of the nations to come. In casting about therefore for some part of the message of the ages which should be especially applicable to you and me at this moment, I have finally chosen my text in the very first chapter of the

33-1-131

EIGHTH YEAR

The Leading

Afro-American Journal

OF THE

UNITED STATES

A Good Advertising Medium.

SUBSCRIPTION.

One Year,	$1.50
Six Months,	1.00
Three Months,	.50

OFFICE OF CORRESPONDENT AND AGENT FOR

THE DETROIT PLAINDEALER

936 F. STREET, N. W.

Washington, D. C. ..... 189 .....

gospel according to Thomas Carlyle.

I do not know when Carlyle was born or died and I do not care. Such a soul belongs to no petty day or year. It is ~~an im-~~ part and parcel of the soul of that eternal Spirit of the Time whose life is not measures by years. Thomas Carlyle was a gruff old lovable bear, who arose in a night when every man was steeped in his own selfish ends; when out every corner leaped the dilettante and the fool; when idleness and daze was in fortune's 7th heaven of the hour; when men seemed to think money had a soul and therefore loved better than their wives and children; and when even he who joined the church and prayed loudly, did as a sort of insurance against ~~death~~ any lack of bread and honey in the world to come. You have seen this spirit — you have felt it: it is the same spirit that is saying to you to night: what is the use of all this strife and sweat; wherefore worry and vainly endeavor to fill a larger niche in life than I am: in Heaven's name, why should I spend the best and brightest years of my life in a preparation which at last an invitation to futile ill, in spite of all good might possibly bring to others; it is the spirit bringing hundreds of young Negroes to breaking-point with enthusiasm and aspiration, and then coldly breathes on them, dangles at them breezes them tightly into government pigeon-holes and leaves them there to die like fools; you recognize this spirit do you not? well this was the spirit which Carlyle cursed and hated: he stood on the mountain top and shrieked and screamed, swore and called names, spoilt English and defied rhetoric all in order to rouse a listless generation to resurrect forgotten ideals and to tell men and women to go to work! The nobility of effort, the long continued, wearying, never ending effort, the imperativeness of eternal strife, the divinity of sweat — this was the gospel according to Carlyle. He says + I have spoken rather frequently because the message of Carlyle was too great to be expressed in anyone else but himself. Let me make this abstract concrete by saying what does Thomas Carlyle mean to you, to me — tonight?

33-1-132

33-1-133

In the life of every one of you the desire & Work has clashed with the desire of ease. You would like to get a 10 year educational training, But you would like & get it in a year, you would like & make the most of your lives, but unfortunately you would at the same time like to have the ~~very best time~~ most pleasurable life possible: & the two things are not compatible. Here comes the crucial point in every man's life — it is a real conflict — a stubborn contradiction which no one can escape and at these crossroads the hero & the man part company. Perhaps in no other city in the world is the temptation for young men to shirk the awful earnestness of life — to sink in the dilettantism and pleasure seeking — so great as here. But as great as the temptation is yet the opportunities for the larger manhood & womanhood are simply wonderful. You are surrounded by educational institutions, libraries, museums, art galleries, theatres, the wonderful news of a great government, the contact of master minds — a perfect paradise for the scholar and a fountain of instruction for the earnest man. And yet here I have heard the wail of complaint — of lack of knowledge here - of lack of consideration there —— Bah - what of that! What does man who has the world in his grasp care for the meteors that escape him - what does the monarch of the sphere of the 7 stars & solar years care if some little stars of the universe shine out for him? Turn your back on evils you can't not right, & press to work that is calling so loudly & clearly. I remember four years ago, how four young men, in a Southern University, used to use the front steps of their dormitory to build castles in the air. Those men are here tonight — every one of them with the consciousness that there is some pleasant in life which they have missed — many things undone which might, have been accomplished — some four sighing maidens still sigh — but nevertheless, every one of those men has done something: Every one looks back as on slow but sure steps taken toward making their lives the heritage of ages to come. And they shake hands and are content.

So thus the shind of Socrates & Moses, of Ernest & Carlyle ... has called them — is calling them - is calling you

33-1-134

we are living we are dwelling in a grand & awful time in an age or ages telling
To be living is sublime

33-1-136

I wonder how vividly you realize this and how much it will eventually take hold of & fashion your lives — yes & your deaths — for it will make all that world of difference between lying down to pleasant dreams & the death ~~Faust~~ Goethe envy of

Selig der &c

SOME IMPRESSIONS OF EUROPE

c. 1894 Incomplete

Some Impressions of Europe

I trust I have not committed the unpardonable sin in daring at this late day to say anything about Europe. I have two excuses: first, some things in this world have been decided so often and so well that most people know nothing them. In spite of all our foreign abroad we remain often more ignorant of Europe than China ~~& India~~ for the simple reason that we supposed to know the former

33-2-91

...would require any [illegible] merely saying that I am quite aware of the enormity of my transgression in daring to add anything to what everybody has said about Europe
I believe the sin is unpardonable and I shall not seek to expiate it

My object is to tell as simply as possible the story of a two years travell in Europe. I shall not hesitate to tell you many things you already know — in fact I have little or nothing new — and my ultimate object is simply to make you see a small bit of what I saw as I saw it.

And first why does one go to Europe or [illegible]. Of course you original in all its advances — India and China have often forestalled her in philosophy and the arts, but it is the glory of Europe to have taken into her culture all that other civilizations have furnished and for 3000 years to have so added to it that to day European civilization is not only a synthesis of all that was good in the past but on the whole is the best fruit of the human understanding.

European culture is today of course larger than Europe — Australia, India and America are seats of its latest development For spite however of all transplanting the civilization remains at bottom and essentially European and we can understand and rightly appreciate their institutions laws and customs only as we 33-2-104

Some Observations
of Europe

A trip to Europe is today something within the reach of most well-to-do people. For anyone therefore to be bold enough ~~impressions~~ to retail impressions of so well known a lands can only be excused by unusual opportunities of observation or unusual conceit I have in reality neither of these excuses and have been only been tempted into inflicting my thoughts upon you recognize them as growths and offshoots of that parent trunk ~~in Europe~~. For this reason we visit that country — to know it and through it to understand ourselves

33-2-105

To appreciate however all or even the large part of what Europe has done we must do more than look — for the greater deeds of men and nations are invisible. Here is where the average tourist makes his saddest mistake: that is to visit this greatest of lands without a careful acquaintance with its history. I pause for a moment to bring this strangely interesting history back to your minds, not because you do not know it, but because you ambitions of several jealous or hostile cities. The task of reconciling the differences of hostile peoples so that great nations could pursue great ends in peace and quiet — This was the mission of the Roman state. Rome did not come in a vulgar sense conquer Greece — rather Greece, that is her literature and art, conquered Rome and thru her the world.

This Greco-Roman culture with its wonderful accomplishments ruled Europe until it was almost crushed & swept out of existence by the horde of barbarians that came reeling down drunken & ignorant from the Northern forests. The Teutons they brought to be sure material capable of wonderful development, but their first advent resulted in utter shameless

33-2-18

Some Impressions of Europe.

~~The day has gone by when~~ the American who has visited Europe is no longer a very exceptional being. Nearly every well to do citizen feels it his duty to spend a few months of his life abroad, if not for ~~his own~~ the sake of doing, at least for the sake of the folks at home taking for granted, therefore, that most of the younger people here will some time or other visit the other continent obliteration of culture and decency which we call the dark ages. Finally however the Graeco-Roman culture conquered and became in the hands of the modern nations of Europe what we call modern culture

33-2-107

I have been using the rather indefinite words "culture" and "civilization" without attempting to explain what I mean by them; I have done this with purpose for so complex, important, and far-reaching are the things institutions and ideas comprehended under the word "civilization", that it is difficult if not impossible to give an abstract definition of the word: it is better to study it in the concrete: for this reason let us start for Europe.

I regard it as most fortunate that between us and the land that means so much for us, about 10 days of the most unique experience, that is, the ocean voyage.

Here for a period of some length a large number of people of the most diverse character habits and history are thrown into close companionship under the most unusual surroundings: and strange to say the centre of interest in a sea voyage is not the sea but ~~the strange developments of~~ human nature. For the changeless circle of sea and sky that surrounds
~~does not after the first spell~~
~~of novelty~~ the vessel soon loses ~~the people~~ never its novelty. The first act of the drama is always an awful and general attack of sickness which serves ~~to~~ thoroughly to introduce the passengers, and is afterward a useful topic of conversation

33-2-108

on which most people agree.

I sailed from New York in mid-July and about 2 weeks later landed at Rotterdam, Holland.

Holland is a distressingly neat well ordered little mud puddle, situated at the confluence of the English French and German language and inhabited by a stolidly busy set of good folk, ~~and~~ a large and innumerable windmills number of black & white cows. Here ~~I got~~ one meets the first three strange ideas of Europe: The slowness its foreign tongues & its art-collections. One realizes there is more time & space here — there is less of that hurrying and annoying, that breathless rush and roar that characterizes so much of our life. This slowness often takes the unpleasant form of delaying ~~your~~ one's trunks or making ~~you~~ one wait ~~for~~ a week for a draft on

33-2-109

London as I ~~had~~ was compelled & once; but one realizes too that it enables the husband & see his wife and children a bit oftener, it allows time for the dinner to digest after its eaten and allows whole families & go wandering out under gods skies & enjoy scenery which here is left & cattle and snakes. As & the new tongue which one ~~hears~~ finds on every hand it is indeed a strange experience & hear human souls in new clothes. To hear not only great thoughts but the smallest ideas the mutterings of the day and the kitchen utensil changed in & unknown and apparently unknowable jargon. One gets lonesome with an awful lone-someness — you start & ask a policeman about the street and suddenly remember that he must understands; your neighbor affably discusses the news of the day with you, then looks surprised because you can't understand a word he's saying. The street-signs are so ~~strangely~~ beautifully and wonderfully made that you can scarcely tell a tea-dealer from an apothecary, and even if you do happen upon an oasis where English is spoken, it is apt to be a kind of English quite beyond your comprehension. It will take you long to learn and appreciate the new habits and customs you there meet, it will take long to learn the peculiar beauty and adaptability of a foreign tongue, but there is one of the new ideas that even the most prosaic American in some degree appreciates; and that is that Europe preserves some things not because they pay — not because they are "dry" but simply because they are beautiful. You cannot wander thro' the imposing galleries of the Royal Museum at Amsterdam with out realizing ~~Catching some faint echo of Emerson's Rosemary~~ that the beautiful is as true as the good

33-2-110

33-2-11

~~If eyes were made for seeing Then beauty is its own excuse for being.~~

Turning now from the still homely life of Holland leaving behind it long straight canals, it decorous rows of tall trees and its fine old stolidly lazy windmills, I sought the

33-2-112

Some Impressions of Europe

I have no thought of saying anything very new to most of you tonight, because these are days when a European trip is quite a common occurrence. I give these few ~~thoughts and~~ observations therefore because they are mine, and as part of the experience of one who was born and bred among you the worlds most famous river

— the Rhine. God has not perhaps done more for the Rhine than for ~~the~~ our own Hudson but when on this earth God and Man join hands to make a great & beautiful thing, we have a result which makes Creation smile. Here ~~we~~ is have a river, to whose wonderful natural beauty is added all the romance and glamour which a 1000 years of history story and legend have woven round her hills Her green waters are bubblin with the breath of other centu her vine covered hills are clad in stone & ivy and the very about her is suggestive of tho thousand years of stirring a forming, ~~of~~ ...ding & ..., o

33-2-13

the Rhine. It is from Rotterdam to Cologne a placid calm and not particularly striking stream; but before Cologne we come [illegible] in the distance those two mighty towers of the most magnificent gothic edifice in the world — the cathedral of Cologne. 500 hundred feet above the valley rise these colossal monuments to the infinite cunning of the workmen and the solemn grandeur of the church. To wander in the soft gloom of this vast temple, to hear the swelling of great organ & the cadences of the chanting priests — to realize that you are standing here upon the work of 5 centuries, all this is a fit introduction to the famous valley of the Rhine. As we now continue the ascent of the Rhine

33-2-114

it beauties begin to unfold. The mountains creep nearer and picturesque villages appear Here lies Bonn with its famous & aristocratic university nestled on the right, and then comes a succession villages half clad in their ancient walls and towers, great ruined castles with their staring windows & ivy clad battlements, little dark & lonesome towers, ~~great~~ rambling convents, and pretty churches Everywhere are memories of the mighty history of the land; there is the impregnable fortress of Ehrenbreitstein rising sheer 570 feet above the rushing river which has figured in all European wars; yonder is the Königs stuhl where many of the old

33-2-115

Emperors of Germany were elected and nearly every castle has its tale of the thirty years war the french revolution or the ruthless march of the wonderful Napoleon. Then come the fairy tales: there are the famous rocks of the Lorelei below which the Rhine gold is buried & above which sits the famous maiden combing golden hair & enticing the fishermen into the rapids that rush & roar at her feet. There is the famous old castle which Byron calls "The castled crags of Drachenfels" and the beautiful ruins called the Brothers, whose story perhaps will give some idea of the legends of

33-2-116

Rhine. On two spurs of rock near the ruins of two old ivy covered castles. In the first castle ~~These~~ once upon a time lived the old Knight Bayer von Boppard, Lord of Liebenstein, his two sons Henrich and Conrad, and their adopted sister, the beautiful Hildegarde.
Now it happened that both brothers fell deeply in love with the foster sister; ~~and~~ the chival-rous Henrich determined to let his brother win the prize and he himself departed on a crusade to the Holy Land.
So Conrad won Hildegarde's love and the aged father build the twin castle of Sterrenberg for the pair, ~~and~~ on the neighboring peak.
He died however before the nuptials were celebrated and Conrad becoming restless and jealous of the fame his brother was earning in the Crusades, postponed the wedding and departed for the holy land to joine in the ~~Crusade~~ wars. Long weary ~~years~~ days Hildegarde awaited in the lonely castle above the murmuring Rhine, the return of her lover only to have him come back after ~~long~~ years with a Grecian bride. The broken hearted girl did not complain — she refused & let Wernich avenge her, reconciled the bullying & feach old Conrad & herself retired to the convent below the castle & die as a nun. The Grecian wife tired of her exile, deserted her husband, Conrad & Wernich died, and now only the gloomy castles stand there & tell their little world-tale of love & ambition.

33-2-117

33-2-118

We have now traversed the more famous part of the Rhine — old Frankfort and Mainz lie ~~behind~~ in the distance Bingen, fair Bingen on the Rhine is on the right and here before us is the famous ~~statue~~ statue of New Germany — the Germania of the Niederwald. Let us pause here and consider for a moment the new country we have entered. We are in one of the oldest and truest lands of Europe: here, the half-wild German Arminius led his hordes against the trained roman legions and defeated them: and here ~~was~~ arose as late as 1871 within the memory of us all a new nation, the German empire — to day one of the foremost powers of Europe. This land is one especially instructive for us: for here is a land which clings to the traditions of the past: Monarchy, hereditary aristocracy, + paternal government, boasts today + has a right to boast that she has done as much for civilization, + that too as well, as the most blatant of Republics.

33-2-110

33-2-120

Let me just remind you the more recent history of Germany: ~~Every~~ Nearly every one of the thousands of ruined castles that dot + beautify Germany today were once the seats of ~~some~~ petty independent and warring sovereignties. ~~It had before it the old question which antedates the world~~ City fought city, noblemen killed each other, Electors were cheated and bribed & Kings went to devastating war over petty trifles. The authorities of law and order as represented by the elected Emperors melted to a shadow, until with the breaking out of the thirty years war it seemed as though anarchy & license had conquered civilization. What was the remedy? It was the same for this great nation as it is for this ~~town~~ State, for this little ~~church~~ village & for ~~that~~ this ~~secular fossil~~ university: each one knows that by the constitution of the world and ~~the~~ human jealousy ignorance & thoughtlessness of people it is impossible for everyone to have his own way: all must ~~sacrifice~~ some kind of their ease their comfort & their ideals to the common good of the ~~the~~ family, the ~~Church~~ students, the ~~town~~ Univ.

33-2-121

& the creation & which they belong: all of course will not do this: the lazy will shirk, the envious refuse to work & the fool will not know enough: the result of this will only be that others must bear more than their burden, unthanked & unhonored for it: but they are the world-makers: they are the heroes that raise life out of its depths of pettiness & meanness & the blue of God's own sky: they, the creators of todays of lifes, who are ready to go down into the blood & dust of its battles. The modern history of Germany is the history of the efforts of a heroic people & its heroic kings to raise a nation torn by petty jealousies & little bickerings into the unity &

33-2-22

fulness of a great national life: I am bound to the republican form of government by birth and education, but I must say that if there ever existed a race of divinely appointed Kings, it is certainly those monarchs of the House of Hohenzollern, who gave the world the Prussian state & German nation of today. The process by which this was done is one of the heroic chapters of history. A little despised country in North Europe which the great powers used to divide up for their amusement got the one idea of the unity of Germany in its head & this Prussia, poor & unimportant as it was worked toward this ideal with unabated energy for nearly two centuries: it supported a vast standing army, it laid enormous taxes and it obeyed leaders who were worthy of obedience. Those leaders to were no shirks: said the tireless Frederick the great as he sadly looks upon the broad acres of Sans Souci, "when I lie beneath the sod I shall at last be without care." The builders of this state builded until at last ~~there arose a great~~ Prussia arose as a great power in Northern Germany menaced by Austria on the east & France on the west. What shall the man do whose only road of advance is hemmed in by his enemies? conquer them — thus said the foremost statesman of Prussia, Bismarck. I saw him once — it was early last February in Berlin.

33-2-123

33-2-124

We must not linger too long in Germany — we can as to the people only notice their personal courtesy, their love of honor and the devotion of the country as a whole to their traditions of monarchy & aristocracy
Our appearance in the land is most interesting: for up on the North west lie the historic old commercial cities, the brick Lübeck, Bremen with it fine old Council Hall, busy Hamburg.
The capital is Berlin, the best Governed city on earth, tho' homely and commonplace in external appearance. It sets like a great hard island amid billows of sterile sands and pines that stretch away — away until

33-2-125

at last they roll against the fertile fields and neat farms of Saxony. Here lies the famous ~~City~~ city of Dresden on the Elbe — a broad low shift river, crossed by mighty stone bridges, and bounded by visions of wooded hills and towns In Dresden ~~These~~ is the famous distine Madonna of Raphael, copies of which you all have seen — the Mother of God coming out of heaven with the wonderful Child in her arms. From Here one can ride to the South through narrow valleys with mighty rocks, dotted with busy factories & mining works until we come to the hills & fields of Bavaria where

33-2-126

THE ART AND ART GALLERIES OF MODERN EUROPE

Wilberforce Athletic Association, c. 1894-96

in 1890 -

The Art and Art Galleries of Modern Europe.

I purpose tonight to tell you something of the Art and Art Galleries of Modern Europe, not from the standpoint of the artist or art critic, but from the standpoint of one who loves beautiful things and whose good fortune it has been to give a passing glance at ~~nearly all~~ many of the great art collections of the modern world.

We who take interest in the ~~Wilberforce A.A.~~ training of men believe steadfastly and conscientiously in the full rounded development of man. We believe that there can be no sturdy moral growth without deep intellectual training; and we believe too that there can be no true lasting moral worth and mental development without healthy physical life; and we believe that all exceptions to these propositions merely prove the rule. But these three factors of life are not coordinate; the physical development of man is not an end in itself but a means to an end; the great underlying life principle which conserves life for the sake of those great ends which make life worth living. Therefore tonight the Athletic Association asks you to listen not to a desertation on physical culture but rather to a talk on one of the three great ends of living for the attainment of which healthy muscular manhood is the first prerequisite.

49-3-1

Three things in life beckon the human soul: the Good, the True and the Beautiful. We hear of the good everyday - hear of it somuch in fact that we sometimes become deaf from very hearing and forget that simple goodness is the end of all moral strife; and that it is just as impossible to be a Christian and be bad, as it is to be ~~black~~ full and ~~white~~ empty at the same time. Again we hear much of the True; theobject of our being here in school, theobject of all right training, the object of all science is to search out and make known the real Truth about the world we live in. But there is a third something - a third dimension in life without which we cannot truly live: it is the Beautiful. Goodness is a matter of the Will power, Truth, a matter with which the mind deals; but the heart and the emotions deal with the Beautiful. We immediately see how inexpressibly broad a field we have here, how infinitely varied in aspect and product and with what tact and delicacy it must be cultivated and fertilized. It is always extremely difficult to teach young people to give proper attention to the beautiful things of life, to realize that the object of all life is to make the universal beautiful, so to use the Good, that we may realize the Beautiful in the True. And yet it is a problem how to bring this central fact before the many varieties of charcater which are represented here. The first place of such training is of course the home - the picture books of early years, the paintings in the parlor, the decorations of the bed room, the mother's Sunday clothes - all these are the materials out of which the youth must form his ideals of what is beautiful. How important then are the little decorations of home, and how easily can a hideous combination of colors, or a tawdy picture make a man an aesthetic idiot for life. Unfortunately we as a people are just beginning to build our homes and consequently many of us have missed the vast educational power of baeutiful surroundings in childhood. These must train themselves by the stud of beautiful things in after life. For this purpose the first great art school is Nature: here ~~at Wilberforce~~ in Angwela we are surrounded by an art gallery which treasures countless masterpieces, and yet there are dozens of us who will go through this coming Springtide and see nought but dirt and water - unmindful of the ~~awful~~ glory of the sunsets beyond the western ~~meadows~~ hills, unmindful of the daily panorama of sun, and clouds and sky.

49-3-2

Thus far I have attempted to bring to your minds the fact that the Beautiful is one of the great ends of life and that we can train ourselves to appreciate the beautiful things in life and even discover beauties hidden to untrained hearts. One gallery of the beautiful I have said is the world about. I now come to the second great reservoir of the Beautiful, which we call Art: Art is beauty created by man; it is something of which a human soul conceives, a human hand executes and all human hearts everywhere acknowledge beautiful. Take for instance ~~this bit of~~ a little flower If I ask you why it is beautiful you could not tell me - it simply is beautiful it raises pleasing sensations - a sort of mental satisfaction almost indescribable. Again take another work of Art - a great building. I remember sailing along a blue rushing river, once, when suddenly rounding a bend, two dark and mighty towers seemed to shoot into the air, capping a wilderness of graceful fretmork and mighty buttress, standing there in that calm August day like twin giants. It was the Cathedral of Cologne. Why was it beautiful? "If eyes were made for seeing Then beauty is its own excuse for being.

49-3-3

And yet some reasons one may give are ?

Why was it beautiful - was it not because of the thoughts it raised in me? The awe, the wonder, the feeling of strength, the lust of creative manhood, and yet withal the sweet symmetry of life? Take a wonderful painting, Possibly, but if so it is no more than is it beauutiful because it imitates a beautifu thing? ~~O, no that~~ is a photograph, not a work of Art. A real masterpiece of art is beautiful ~~only~~ what it creates, in proportion to the emotions it raises in the hearts of its beholders.

Let me illustrate. At the National Galleries in Berlin there hung once a picture. It was a strange wierd thing in grey and blue with great long necked swans sailing down a river. We had all viewed it when the young lady of the house, who was a wee bit strong minded, expressed her opinion and said, Why that picture is simply absurd - who ever saw swans with necks like that?" But one of those present said: ~~what~~, that makes no difference - suppose no such swans ever did exist: so long as the artist succeeds in embodying a great idea in creating a beautiful thing, is not this object accomplished? Is an artist a mere photogra her of chicken's heads? No: Art does not imitate nature, but nature imitates art. Or to put it better both strive toward one vast Ideal, the infinite beauty of the other world.

H9-3-4

If then true art is to be measured by our own emotions, how necessary it is that those feelings be capable of responding to the highest, that the nature of the beholder be so nicely attuned that it responds to the lightest touch and most subtle harmony of the work of Art. Let me illustrate Suppose we have ~~these~~ are two pictures: a mere chromo, the other ~~is~~ an excellent work. ~~by~~

~~the son of Bishop Tanner.~~ What is the difference? Perhaps some of you would do not see any difference - if so it would merely means that your aesthetic nature - your perception and appreciation of really beautiful is in sad need of training: some of you might instinctively feel that these paintings are of different degrees of ~~merit~~ merit and yet could not give a reason; finally a few of you could immediately say: the master iece is cunning in execution - in light and shade, in harmonious colers, in careful painting: the other is inharmonious and glaring; the masterpiece has unity of idea,— It is not that it exactly imitates ship and sea - one who had never seen either would get the same idea of strength and beauty. On the other hand, the other picture is overdone - the underlying idea is evident but it is too broadly and crudely brought out - there is none of that nice suiting of means to end which is so important.

H9 - 3-5

If now you have some conception of what the Beautiful in life is, of how nature and Art strive to create beauty and what a masterpiece of Art should be, let us now ask how are beautiful things preserved from the rust and decay of earthly life. We know that Nature preserves itself through continual renewal, helped and hindered by the hand of man. We see for instance how God strives to keep our fine campus beautiful and how some of the students ~~the University~~ city strives to make it ugly ~~as sin~~; how the eternal beauty of Nature refuses to be covered by the hideous neglect of ~~our ravine and~~ roads & hills & meadows & by the heaps of nastiness we dump ~~into it~~ on them for the sake of unsightliness and disease. But I am not to speak of the preservation of the beauties of Nature ~~z~~ - though it were indeed a fruitful theme - but rather of the preservation of works of Art.

I suppose that not one half of the thousands of people that visit Chicago or New York know that there ~~is~~ are an Art Galleries there - of those who know it, few visit them - fewer study: and yet here is a little attempt to preserve a few beautiful things. That is what an Art Gallery is and whenever you go to Chicago, to New York, to Philadelphia, and Boston - go to the Art galleries not rushing through pell-mell, but go sit down and look at a beautiful picture a half hour each week: it is an education, soul training which nothing can surpass. Then remember when you see these galleries, that these are but faint echoes of the great galleries of the world, where the masterpieces of the world's greatest artists are hung. The galleries of the World's Fair were wonderful and yet even there not a single one of the world's greater masterpieces of art were hung. Only in Europe can we study the art of the world. There are in Europe today 10 great collections of works of Art, which I will name in the order of their fame: The Louvre which occupies that mighty series of palaces in Paris situated at the head of the greatest avenue in the world ~~the Champs Elysees,~~ the great collection of Rome centers in the palaces of the vatican near the greatest cathedral, St.Peters. Third, the famous collections in the Pitti and Uffizi palaces at the lovely city of Florence in the valley of the Arno. Fourth, the great collection at the Zwingen in Dresden, Germany . Fifth, the galleries of the Alto and Neue Pinakothek at Munich; sixth, the collections of the strangely beautiful sea city of Venice, Seventh, the fine new galleries at Vienna, Austria

49-3-6

Eighth, the great Dutch collections at Amsterdam. ninth, the National Museum at London opposite Trafalgar square. Tenth, the collections at Antwerp, Belgium. Of these I have visited all except that at Antwerp. Besides these ten greater collections, there are numberless minor collections each one larger and more important than anything we have in America: for instance, the collections at Berlin, Madrid, Naples, Frankfurt, Milan, at Cassel, Düsseldorf, St.Petersburg,etc, etc. All of these I have seen except those at Madrid and St.Petersburg.

First now, I want to tell a little about the history of the more famous of these collecthons and then something of their arrangements, etc finally I shall take upa few of the great masterpieces. Let us take for instance the great Munich gallery. It has been formed by the union of 3 collections of pictures. First of those collected in the 16th and 17th centuries by the early Electors of Bavaria who encouraged such great masters as Albrecht Dürer, and such art centres at Nuremburg. Second the great collection of Dusseldorf were during the wars following the French Revolution carried bodily to Munich to keep them from going to Paris; 3rd, when the monasteries and churches were suppressed at Cologne in 1805-1810 the great paintings were taken to Munich, so that today we have here a vast collection of 1,400 pictures arranged in 12 saloons and 14 cabmites adn housed in a magnificent hall called the Alto Pinakothek. So the celebrated Dresden gallery was begun about 1750 by Augustus the III, King of Saxony; while the collection of Italians date back to the Renaissance. Thus you see these collections of pictures are not mere chance things collected in a day or a decade, but are centuries old, inter twined with the history of the nations, fostered by loving care an standing today as great monuments to European civilization.

49-3-7

Whose works, now are enshrined upon these great altars e ected to the Infinite Bauty of the world? Perhaps many of you know the names of the world's greatest artists, but lest some do not I am going to name twelve great masters - the Dii Majores of Art and every one of you should learn their names.

Michael Angelo, Titian, Raphael, Phidias, Lionardo, Corregio, Murillo, Rubens, Rembrand, Velasquez, Van Dyke, Durer.

Let me tell just a bit of each one of these: Michael Angelo was born in Tuscany Italy, 1475 and died in 1563. He was a born artist and under the patronage of the Medici in Florence executed many noble works. I never tired while in Rome in gazing at his ceiling in the Sistine Chapel and his famous statue of Moses with beard and horns you all know. Raphael was born at Urbino, Italy in 1483 and died at Rome in 1520. He is universally considered the greatest of Italian painters if not of the world's artists. His masterpieces are copied the world over: that pretty little round picture of the Madonna and the child and St.John, which you so often see, hangs in the galleries of Flor nce; the wonderful canvas of the Transfiguration is at Rome, andothers of his strangely beautiful conce tions of the Christ child are at Munich. Titian is the great master of color and is also an Italian. His masterpieces are in Venice and Florence. Phidias was the great Gree sculptor who adorned the Parthenon and taught the carver of the Venus of Milo. Lionardo was another Italian the first great pioneer of the Renaissance and modern painting- a universal genius. Correggio, Murello and Velasquez are Spaniards whose works are chiefly in Spain although Murello's celebrated little beggars are at Munich. Rubens and Van Dyke are Belgians and their paintings - especially Rubens are all over Europe and among the best known in the world. These may be seen at Dresden, Munich, Antwerp and Vienna. Rembrant is the great Dutch master of ligth and shade, the wonderful yellow light of whose pictures have been the despair of imitators. Abrecht Durer is the great German painter born in quaint Nuremburg in 1471 and his house I have seen, still standing - a careful conscientious pioneer in German art. Let me now call your attention to certain great masterpieces of art; the Venus of Milo, by Praxitales, the Moses of Michael Angelo , the Sistine Madonna by Raphael the Cathedral of Cologne or Meister Gerard, the Descent from the Cross by Rubens, the tribute money by Titian, the Beggar Boys by Murello ~~and~~ the Night Watch by Rembrandt, and the portrait of Charles I by Van Dyke.

I shall begin with the Cathedral of Cologne, the most magnificent Gothic edifice in the world. I then pass from architecture to sculpture and from sculpture to painting. Here is a picture of the Cathedral of Cologne. Look at it and as you look let it grow larger: let the bold cruciform structure swell beyond the little confines of this romm and of this building - imagine a vast structure three times the length of this building, three times its width ,and three times its height with two mighty towers, the highest in Europe, 512 feet in height or twice as high

49-3-9

two buildings like this

~~as the University and Normal buildings~~ set on end one on top of the other. The original foundation stone was laid on the 14 august 1248 and from that time it has slowly grown through the centuries, now desecrated by war now honored by kings until at last October 15, 1880, the first Emperor of new Germany and his prince and Furst Bismarck celebrated the completion of the vast work. Between the years 1842 and 1889 alone $3,600,000 were spent on the work. As a result we have not one of those tawdy eyesores which meet American eyes as the result of the expenditures of millions, but a beautiful harmonious symphony in stone every part of which bears its relation to the other parts and to the whole and all of which goes to embody a great and otherwise inexpressible conception of the beautiful. The blazing marble of Milan's fretted cathedral is wonderful, Westminster Abbey is venerable, Notre Dame is historical, but Cologne is grand. *

From the desire to decorate great monuments of architecture like this first arose in the ancient world the branch of art known as Sculpture. Let us then turn to the Venus of Milo by Peraxateles, ~~a rough outline of which is before you and~~ replicas of which you have all seen. This is probably the most famous single statue in the world and stands today in the galleries of the Louvre at Paris. Starting from the Arc de Triumphe, that bold monument built to the glory of the First Napoleon, you swee down the broad magnificent avenue of the Chamws Clysees. ~~I have seen many streets in many places, but none that rivalled the avenue of the Chamos Elysees in Paris.~~ Coming at last to the Tuilleries, you pass the works of marble statuary and past groups and gay and polite Parisians until at last you approach great piles of buildings in the draceful renaissance architecture and passing by wings and through quadrangles you enter the famous galleries of the Louvre - without doubt the greatest art collection of the world. There, in a little room as large as perhaps one of the parlors and hung in black velvet, stands a single marble statue, armless and maimed, nicked and disfigured, yellow with age and yet with all one of the most perfect works of Art which the perfect Greek world has handed down to the 19th century. The statue was probably the work of the great Greef soulptor Poraxateles ~~y~~ lay buried for centuries in the little island of Melos in the Mediterranean, and was finally exhumed in 1820, and brought to France. Fortunately no one has been allowed to spoil this masterpiece by attempting to restore its lost parts. Through all its obvious deformity its beauty still shines. It is a full length figure larger than life representing Venus the Goddes of Love, or the Wingless victory "grandly serious, and almost severe" - the simple darpery resting on the hips" and "displaying the perfec symmetry" of the massive beautiful frame and the whole conception has that mysterious dignity and unapproachable ness which is the genuine expression of the divine.

44-3-10

~~Salle de la Venus de Milo, dedicated to the "Venus of Milo, the most celebrated of the treasures of the Louvre (No. 399).~~ a great culture has said; This is the only statue of Aphrodite handed down to us which represents her not merely as a beautiful woman, but as a goddess. The form is powerful and majestic, and yet instinct with an indescribable charm of youth and beauty while the pure and noble expression of the head denotes the goddess's independence of all human requirements and the calm self-sufficiency of her divine character. The fact that this beautiful work, notwithstanding its great excellence, is not one of those which have been extolled by ancient authors, affords us an approximate idea of the beauty of those lost masterpieces which formed the great marvel of antiquity.

49-3-11

The statue was found in 1820 by a peasant in the islnad of Melos now Milo, at the entrance to the Greek archipelago, and sold for ~~[illegible]~~ $1250 to the French Covernment.

I have coupled with this another masterpiece of ancient sculpture - the Victory of Samothrace.

~~The Nike of Samothrace, on a pedestal representing the prow of a trireme~~ This figure, found in 1863, was originally erected in memory of a naval victory won by Demetrius Poliorcetes about 305 B.C. The much mutilated statue represents the goddess on the prow of a vessel, in the act of sounding the signal for battle upon her trumpet. In dignity of conception and in the masterly handling of the voluminous drapery, this sculpture is perhaps the finest extant work of early-Hellenistic art.

There is something more however in both these statues than their over-mastering grace and beauty: it is the story the y tell of the Greek ideal of healthy womanhood. These are pictures of women, strong, tall, muscular, with that peculiar grace and rythm which comes from unharnessed freedom of movement. The modern world has almost lost that ideal of beauty. Look at the waists of these women - manifestly graceful and yet a modern dressmaker could not clothe them. We have put before us all sorts of unhealthful cooking deformities, called fashion fiddle and so perverted has modern taste become that a natural strong and healthy woman is almost ashamed because she is not delicate and fragile and swan-like. Notice the foot on the Venus of Milo - broad, strong and made for walking. She could not get a decent shoe in the city of Augusta. Does this not teach us soc~~e~~thing? It surely tells us that if the young women of the Negro race wish to be really beautiful and happy, it is not mere beauty of face and length of hair that they must cultivate, but that health, strength, and symmetry of form which simply cannot be had by following the prevailing fashions of dress. * which is beyond all the most beautiful thing about a human physique

#9-3-12

The works of architecture which statutes like these and like the Laocoon group embellished in Grecian times are still among the world's greatest buildings, as for instance the Parthenon, pictures of which you have often seen. After the Greeks no masterpieces of sculpture appear for a thousand years; then the Italians began through their great genius, Michael Angelo produced numerous great works. One of these is his statue of Moses. A few copies of this with the picture of the master I am distributing. Michael Angelo was born in Italy in the wonderful 15th century and was a youth of 17 when Columbus discovered America. A prince found him playing among the statuary of his gardens and taking him to his palace educated him in art, until he became as sculptor, painter and opet, the greatest of the great artists of his day. His record of work ~~his~~ wonderful, he carved this statue of Moses, he made a statue of David, painted the great picture of the last judgment and built the Church of St.Peter's at Rome. No man before ever put so much poetry in stone: here sits the man who walked and talked with God, the tables of the divine law in his hands, the great beard coiled and wound in his fingers, the horns of superhuman power on his forehead and the eyes dreaming away toward the Wromised Land which he never saw. *

49-3-13

After the Greeks had come to the making of statues a part from buildings, they soon began to paint them statutes and color them from life; this through the Greeks and Romans led insensibly to the art of painting - an art which reached its finest development in the 16 and 17th centuries of the modern world. I suppose if any artist were asked to name one picture which all things considered was justly entitled to be called the most famuos in the world he would answer: the Sistine Madonna by Raphael, which today stands in the gallery of Dresden, Germany. This is an altar piece first painted for ~~th~~ a church at Piazenca, Italy about 1515, and purchased in 1753 for $45,000--- a ridiculouslm small sum compared with its worth today. The picture is eight feet high and six feet wide and represents the Virgin and Christ Child, the saints Sixtus and Barbara and two cherubs. Let me read Professor Springer's Criticism of the Picture: " A curtain has just been drawn back and the virgin issues as it were from the depths of heaven, awe-inspiring, solemn, and serene, her large eyes embracing the world in their gaze. The idea of the sudden revelation of a hitherto concealed mystery could not be more effectively expressed. "Below are two cherubs pictures of naive innocence; at either side two saints contrasted in age and sex, expression and movement, supplementing each other with admirable effect." Sixtus commending himself to the virgin's mercy - and the beaming face of Saint Barbara represents the joyful enthusiasm of the redeemed" I have spent many minutes watching this picture and I do not think that I can ever forget the large misty eyes of the Mother of God as she steps upon the clouds with the Wonderful child in her arms. *

The Assumption by Titian is an immense picture hanging in the gallery at Venice, near the square of St.Mark's. I used to imagine that the Avenue Champs Elysees in Paris was but a ~~classified~~ glorified image of that monn beam road to the stars which we have all seend through our childish tears. And if it is then I can imagine no better ending for that celestial way than the Piazia of St.Mark's at Venice, with the gilded domes and glistening turrets of the marble church the endless columns and galleries and brilliant shops and the ~~throun~~ thousand of whilring doves which in this city of water find this their only resting place. Near St.Marks hangs Titian's masterpiece the central figure of which is faintly outlined - it represents the assumption of the Virgin May - surrounded by holy men and angels, she rises toward God and no mortal mother ever had that look of divine happiness which hovers on the lips of Titians Madonna.

44-3-14

I have not been able to secure copies of this, the greatest of Titian's pictures but I have brought you two specimens of his work - one of which - the tribute money is well known. The subject is a familiar one : the keen Jew-hating-Roman and Roman tribute approaches the master and asks "Is it lawful for Jews to pay tribute unto Caesar?" The master asks whose image and superscription is on the penny and says "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's but unto God the things which are God's." The other picture is the less know Madonna of the Rabbit. Titian one of the world's great artists was an Italian like Raphael and Michael Angelo and lived at the same time. At 10 years of age he went to Venice and studying art began a brilliant and profitable life. His picture is among those distributed.

49-3-15

*

You will notice how much this golden age of Italian art deals with biblical and religious subjects, the Christ and Mary his mother, the saints, prophets and apostles. It is the glory of the Catholic church that she made beauty the hand maid of religion and enriched the world with noble conceptions of goodness and purity. However there were soon men who began to see the beauty in every day life and to paint it - to look round on earth and sea and children and men and paint them in life. This began in the Flemish school of painters in little Belgium, with such masters as Rubens and Van Dyke. To be sure they painted religious subjects, like Rubens' wonderful Descent from the Cross - but they made the figures human and everyday so that one felt the touch of flesh and blood. Then by easy transition they painted portraits of men, like Van Dyke's great portrait of Charles the First, the king whom Oliver Crmwell beheaded. Rubens who was born in Westphalia in the 16th century and educated partly in Italy was a prodigious wonder and painted over 200 great paintings some as large as a wall of this room. Van Dyke was a pupil of Rubens and especially celebrated for his portraits. *

From Italy the study of beauty reached north to Belgium, and from Belgium to Holland. Holland is a curious bit of mud north of Europe stolen froo the sea by a sturdy homely people. And there arose then a set of men who painted life as they saw it - every day themes and perhaps the greatest of the painters was Rembrandt. He was a miller's boy born at sleepy Leyden the same year that the English settled Jamestown, he was a good-hearted fellow, always in debt , always at work, painting his wonderful yellow lights. His largest and greatest work is the "Nigth Watch" - but you can get but faint idea of it from the black and white print. You should see it as I saw it in a burst of brilliant color, at the end of the long hall in the gallery at Amsterdam. It is 11 x 14 feet and it represents the assembly of a company of militia. Because of its energy and action and wonderful play of light and shade it is noted as one of the great pictures of the world. Rembrandt himself was a handsome young fellow and he knew it and often painted his own portrait. This specimen is by himself.

49-3-16

Finally painters even turned to the slums and the gutters to find the pictureque and striking and here is Murieglo, the Spanish painter's, celebrated beggar boys which the world has long admired.

I have of course described these pictures knowing that it would be hard for you to realize the beauty of the originals without seeing them. Nevertheless these outlines will help you and if you never see the pictures themselves you can, if you will, have in each of your homes copies of such great masterpieces - not cheap and vile caricatures, but real valuable copies which cost but little and are lasting sources of pleasure. This sentence I have used cost I can't each.

This brings me to urge in conclusion that you should early learn to appreciate and surround yourselves with beautiful things " A thing of beauty is a joy forever". -this has a deeper meaning than we imagine because we so misuse the word beautiful; But things of real lasting beauty: bits of ~~rare~~ china, graceful furniture, pretty wall paper, neat dress, little pieces of statuary and above all beautiful pictures - these things will add enough to your lives to make even your sorrows curves of grace in a crooked world. Not in evil, not in idleness, not in sensuality, comes the real fulness of life; pedantry is not learning, extravagance is not art and yelling is not religion - but all lifeis one striving toward the Eternally Beautiful.

49-3-17

Whichever lives and loves

One God, one law, one element,

And one far-off divine event

To which the whole creation moves.

H9-3-18

A Program for a Sociological Society

By W. E. B. Du Bois
Atlanta University

1897

Speech at Atlanta, 1897

I desire this afternoon to read to the First Sociological Club a candid criticism of their work and a suggestion for its future activity. I do this the more boldly because I am a member of the organization and as such must bear my part of the responsibility for its shortcomings; and at the same time I speak as an outsider, for in the year that I have had my name on the rolls I have had given me but one opportunity to share in the work of the club. I always hear with a certain shiver of the formation of a club for any kind of sociologic work, for my experience has taught me that the percentage of absolute failure among such clubs is very large. The trouble is apt to be that the persons forming clubs for social reform have very vague ideas of what the science of sociology really is, and what is the real aim and object of their striving. Consequently it can easily happen that they drift aimlessly on until the members begin to wonder whether it is worth while to waste so much time doing nothing. I fancy I have seen in this club something of this same tendency, and it seems to me that the great need of this organization is a clearer conception

33-1-69

ms

to aims & more practical & persistent work & accomplish these objects.

I have therefore chosen for my subject ~~The Law~~ A Program for a Sociological Society. and I want to divide what I have to say in ~~four~~ six parts. 1st I want to show what Sociology is. 2nd What the science has accomplished 3rd By what method its work has been done. 4th How the material and knowledge thus collected can best be utilized. 5th What the society has already accomplished & why. And finally what this society might & ought to do.

1st What is Sociology.

There was a vast revolution which took place in the early part of this century, that is too often forgotten by educated people. It came after that terrible upheaval of human institutions which we call the French Revolution, after the orgies of Robespierre, Danton, & Marat, and became finally the great instrument that freed Europe from the grasp of the Arch-tyrant Napoleon. This revolution was the industrial revolution of the 19th century. It began in the 18th century, when the science of chemistry was first well & established, when Geology gained a sure foundation, when Dudley showed the world how to dig canals uphill, when iron began to be smelted by coal instead of charcoal & above all when James Watt turned a tea-kettle into a steam-engine. Such epoch-making inventions ~~have~~ changed the civilization of the world and with the dawn of the 19th century came an industrial revolution – factories started up towns grew, commerce expanded, capital increased, the world market widened. Against such a mighty movement Napoleon Bonaparte set himself when by his celebrated Continental System he sought to cut the trade of England & the continent. ~~He~~ It was not Waterloo it was not the European coalition that overthrew him, it was the new commercial spirit of the age ~~that smote him~~ and the sea If we regard this industrial movement more carefully we shall see that of all departments of human industry the manufacture of cotton made the most gigantic strides in this epoch. The ancient world dressed in wool, the middle age in wool & linen, the modern world dresses largely in cotton. The series of inventions that made cotton manufacture possible are a curious example of coincidence. Between the years 1775 & 1825, Arkwright, Hargreaves, Cartwright and Eli Whitney had changed the spinning wheel into the factory and made the southern United States the cotton field of the world. *

33-1-70

33-1-171

This industrial revolution had serious consequences: first it fastened American slavery in this country & made emancipation more difficult, & the Negro problem more baffling; more than that in all lands it gave rise to & intensified those intricate questions of life & death & civilization which we call social problems: human beings were, by the new concentration of industry, crowded into centres of population & the difficulties, diseases & moral adjustments of human life became intensified & more patent to the eye. Crime, poverty, disease, prostitution, ignorance, & death began to assume threatening proportions. Men came to be attracted to these sinister phenomena & ask what they really meant, how far they were remediable & how far inevitable.

There was then but one science which undertook the study of the phenomena of human action

& that was the science of political economy
But this science was limited in scope: it began in the 17th & 18th century when the phenomena of money & international trade first assumed importance & confined itself & simply & a study of wealth: it asked how goods were produced, how they were distributed among the producers, and how their owners exchanged them for other goods. It thus took into account only a few human activities under stable conditions of society. The industrial revolution however had greatly changed conditions, & brought a distinct demand for wider inquiry into the causes & scope of human action — deeper search for the reasons of present conditions & the intelligent application of such knowledge & methods of social regeneration. This was the beginning of the modern science of Sociology.

Sociology is therefore the name given & that vast field of inquiry into human action as manifested in modern organized life
It cannot study all human action under all circumstances but that human action which by its regularity gives evidence of the presence of laws. & What these laws are we hardly know, ~~yet~~ and yet we do know that there are in life curious & noticeable coincidences — rythm in life & death, a working out of cause & effect, evidence of force action & reaction, which cannot be ignored or neglected — Many eminent men still insist that this mass of partially digested facts cannot be called a science — and indeed if you mean by science, a body knowledge with definitely stated laws, and carefully systematized fact then Sociology is not yet a science & may never become one. But if you ~~do~~ mean by sociology a vast & fruitful field of inquiry into the mysterious phenomena of human action, which has yielded evidence of the ~~re~~ working of scientific laws & some extent, & promises much for the future — if such a work deserves, as many think, the name of science then sociology is one of the greatest of the Sciences.

33-1-23

But it is impossible & tell what a Science is merely by defining it — the definition is the last thing that a science discovers — indeed it can truthfully be said that no science can be fully defined until it is perfect until its work is done. The best ~~def~~ explanation of a science then is a description of the sort of work it is doing & what it has already accomplished. I come therefore to the second point in my talk

II What has Sociology done?

33-1-35

Sociology has studied the proportionate number of the two sexes in the different countries, the number of people of different ages, the ~~average~~ number of births each year in different localities, the number of deaths from various diseases, the size of families, the average number of rooms in dwellings, the extent of illiteracy, the number of communicants in the different churches, the occupations which men pursue, the income from their work, the way that income is expended; the number of the blind, deaf, dumb, and insane, the extent & degree of poverty, the prevalence of suicide, the extent & kinds of crime, the characteristics of criminals, the migration & distribution of population, the distribution of property, etc. Moreover it has sought to generalize much of this mass of facts & show how all these actions & phenomena tend to a certain rythm & regularity which we call the social group. In the social group the distribution of the sex & age of the individuals remains continually about the same despite birth & death, & the rate of birth & death various so little that it can be predicted within limits. The income, occupation, expenditure & crime tends in the same way under forms of law. This so-called social law seems partly voluntary, partly involuntary, but in all cases its regularity is much greater than the casual reader dreams. These social groups in turn combine & form that higher generalization which we call Society. Society is simply a general name for the regularities of human action — for the general fact that when 50, 100, or 1,000,000 live together they do not act irresponsibly or at random but according to well-known maxims, social forces & laws.

22-1-28

All this that I have said can best be illustrated by a few actual examples: In Europe for instance repeated investigation has proven that for every 1000 males there about 1024 females. This is characteristic of old countries. In the U.S. on the other hand there are only 952 females for every 1000 males. In the older eastern states however we should expect to find conditions approaching those in Europe — & sure enough there are 1005 females & every 1000 males. To show the significance of such facts let us go a step furth: we find in the city of ~~Baltimore~~ Baltimore 1310 Negro women & every 1000 men, we can immediately say this is surely an abnormal situation & must have something to do with the large number of illegitimate births in that city.

33-1-77

Statistics of age show that in normal countries ~~the go~~ about one third of the population is under 15 years of age, yet the nations vary considerably: for instance take the children under 10 years of age: in England they form 24% of the population, in France only 18% among the Negroes of this land 28%. Turning now to the old people 60 & over & we find that they form 7% of the population of England 13% of that of France, & 2% among our race. Such differences simply mean poor family life among our people.

The statistics of births & deaths are always of great interest & consequently liable to misuse

33-1-28

we may have two especially marked types: a population with a low birth-rate & low death-rate like Sweden or a population with a high birth rate & high death rate like the American Negro. The latter is a sign of a low standard of culture — early marriage, illegitimacy & neglect of the laws of health; the former is, namely a sign of high civilization — postponement of marriage until the support of a family is assured, & life according to the laws of hygiene. So in the same country the character of a community may easily be approximately fixed by measuring the number of people in every thousand that die annually a death-rate above 26 is high: while one above 30 points to grave dangers. The rate may be as low as 14 as in Norway. The average death rate of Negroes in cities is 34.

The statistics of marriage are interesting. In Europe out of every 1000 persons of all ages about 15 marry every year. The average age of bride grooms in England is 28 — of brides 26. In Russia 58% of the brides are under 20

~~While in Scotland 69% are between 20 & 30~~
~~& in Norway 28% between 30 & 40.~~

Where sociological inquiry reveals great differences in the conditions of different groups of people this is usually evidence of some unseen cause which makes the variation. For instance, we can represent the occupations of the people of Philadelphia by the following set of door steps: *

- If however we represent the occupations of the Negroes of that city, we find the steps have to climb

What is the meaning of this striking difference? It is explained fully by one comprehensive word SLAVERY. Thus history writes itself in figures & diagrams.

In the matter of crime sociology had done some of its best work; let us notice

33-1-29

only one — the connection of crime & age:
In Germany for instance it has been found that ~~15 1/2 % of the crimes are committed by men between~~ ~~21 & 40. And in all countries it~~ 15% of all persons between 21 & 40 have been convicted for crime, 9% of those between 40 & 60 & 7% of those between 12 & 18 years of age. Further analysing these figures it is found that the most criminal age is between 20 & 30. and among young unmarried men. Taking for instance the Negro criminal in the Eastern Penitentiary of Penna. ~~they were of the following ages:~~ we find the remarkable fact that 67% of them were under 30 years of age & 11% under 20.

Using such minute & detailed statistics sociology has built up the theory of the social group. The county village is a social group — it population distributed in a certain normal order as to age & sex & original condition, its birth & death rate regulating the increase of population.
There is some crime, a school, a church; ~~then~~ the
the village store ~~with trade goods~~ ~~with the trade~~ ~~goods~~ The population is divided ~~as~~ among different occupations, social classes make a faint appearance and there is a general public opinion which represents & synthesizes of like ideas. Such a group may

33-1-80

groups & a city or to a nation, but as it gro we note certain peculiarities: it forms within itself other smaller groups for special purposes — clubs for amusement or Reading, church societ associations of capital & labor called shops or companies or factories &c. These sub-groups we might call organs for carrying out the special work of society, just as the tissues of the body form here a heart and here a an eye & serve the whole organism of the body. This we refer to when we speak of society being organized — of course this is but an analogy for the organization of society is far from complete & individual free will must ever hinder that consummation in this world. Nevertheless advance in civilization is to a certain extent advance in the perfecting of the organization of society.

33-1-81

Such is the work that Sociology has accomplished. It is to be one only a beginning:
our statistics are woefully imperfect, & crude,
our methods of observation crude, and the material at hand is largely an unclassified mass of facts whose the value of which is various & uncertain.
Nevertheless gigantic strides have been taken in the last 10 years, something has been done &

the outlook for the future is bright. This brings me to the third point I wish to discuss, viz.,

III The Use of Sociological Material

The interest in social reform & general betterment which animates so many excellent people of day must not be mistaken for the science of ~~social reform~~ Sociology. There are many people who have a vague desire to right wrongs, help the needy & reform the vicious. Unfortunately these people in very many instances are ignorant of the results of scientific research in these lines — they do not know the value & meaning of statistics & they often waste money & energy, or do absolute harm, either by attempting the impossible or ~~trying the possible~~ by antiquated or discredited methods. If anyone should inform an ordinary citizen that chemists had discovered a new element, Argon — he would very well or bravo! and be done — he would not attempt to discuss the matter or draw conclusions — he is no chemist & does not attempt to be. If he wishes to use the results of chemical ~~to~~ research he seeks the advice of a chemist. In the realm of sociology however the case is very different:

33-1-82

tell a man that the death rate of the Negroes is 36 and immediately he is ready to discuss the matter write articles form clubs, & send money although he knows that he is not an expert in statistics or a student of sociology. What ought to happen in this case is clear: the man ought to say candidly
I know nothing about death rates — is 36 high or low or medium? What has been the history of the variation of death rates? How do the death-rates of different peoples compare with this? In fine a sensible man ought to ask What does a death rate of 36 mean what in the light of the expert statistical knowlege & the careful sociological research of the last quarter century, is the proper interpretation of this figure 36, which otherwise is to me a Sphinx & an Enigma.

The cultured & thinking part of the modern world is gradually & surely coming to this position. The first thing people ask of social reformers now is not how earnest are you or how great is the need of reform but rather what do you know about the actual situation & how does the best of your interpret these facts. Men recognize the fact that such expert opinion may err but they are coming to see that the occasional error of men who give their life & knowing is not as dangerous as the perpetual error of men who guess or dogmatize. The facts & the means of the facts are then the first steps in modern social reform.

33-1-83

How now shall the mass of intelligent people who have no time & be experts put themselves in position & ~~know~~ use the materials collected by sociologists in the gradual work of reform? We can best answer this by seeing the work done in reform during this century.

One of the first movements was the English abolition of the slave-trade: for this the House of Commons collected a mass of statistics — the number of ships engaged, the amount of capital invested, the methods employed & capture slaves, the routes of sailing, the number transported the death rate among slaves & sailors &c. They sought to the history of the subject, the general conditions, the opinions of experts & statesmen & when they began to legislate on the subject they knew what they were doing & no nation had done so much to stop Negro slavery as these same Englishmen who studied the matter

33-1-84

so thoroughly. Again take the matter of prison reform. When the question was first agitated there was'nt a crank in England or America that had'nt an opinion & a panacea — it was do this, do that, make their punishment as severe as that of galley slaves, treat them as unfortunate victims of society; make them work hard, let them lie idle; hang them, give them tracts to read, &c. Society has outgrown this: gradually here & there we have collected facts — not how someone thinks a plan might work, but how the plan actually did work when it was tried; we have studied criminals instead of taking it for granted that we know them, we have watched crime instead of theorizing about it & then with this material we have tried careful experiments — experiments in housing prisoners, experiments in punishment, experiments in work & diet; until today no intelligent man thinks of aimlessly giving advice as to crime — he knows that this is a subject for experts — a subject still dark, with much to be learned, but still a realm where the dawn of open work is past. In the matter of classification perhaps the greatest advance has been made the classic example of the worlds attempt in the matter of giving alms is the History of the English poor law. In the 14th & 15th century England took no particular public care of paupers save to make them stay in their own parishes & left the matter of relieving distress to their wants. The result was ~~disorder robbery~~ and violence. ~~The~~ The 16th century these followed vagabonds & beggars increased alarmingly.

33-1-85

This state of affairs England tried to remedy by laws ~~to attempt~~ designed to suppress pauperism & punish beggars. The penalty for vagrancy ~~& beggary~~ was whipping & branding with a hot iron, & a second or third offense was punishable by death. Soon men began to see that such wholesale legislation would not do & some provision was made for the poor who could not work. In the 17th & 18th century pauperism continued to increase & in place of rigor sentiment began to rule England. It became easier to live as a pauper than as a laborer & the poor taxes increased enormously. Finally in the 19th century the state has begun to apply scientific methods to the question of pauperism. Instead of relief to the poor it aims to discover the causes of poverty,

The classic example of this is the history of the English poor law. At first England frowned mercilessly on beggary & poverty & whipped & branded & hanged the poor devils. Then she melted into sentiment and coddled & stuffed her paupers until it seemed as tho' all England moved on a begging. Finally the State bethought itself to ask Who are the paupers, what makes pauperism, how can we decrease it &

33-1-86

& help people & help themselves? For this reason it uses the statistics, studies social conditions, organizes charities, avoids duplication of work, detects impostors and seeks in as many ways & know the causes of poverty & apply intelligent & scientific remedies. The world is still far from solving the problem but we are much nearer than we were in the 17th & 18th centuries.

33-1-82

Thus sociological interest is daily used by all kinds of social reforms: the organizers of children societies, of schools; those who seek & help the deaf & the blind, those who want to get work for the idle; saving banks & building associations are established on careful & by ascertained principles, model homes built for tenants — indeed this is the age when lasting & effective reform has become systematic & scientific & has replaced sentiment & theory.

The question now comes

What Has the First Sociological Society done.

I want to be perfectly frank in this matter & to say plainly that in my opinion this society has done nothing. I know we have organized — we have held meetings. We have had pleasant social gatherings & we have talked. But of actual work accomplished either in the line of knowing just what there is to be done, & just how we are to do it, & what there is to be learned as to method from the sociological work of the day, and above all of actual accomplished work, it seems to me perfectly fair to say that this society has done little more than nothing. Indeed I have several times seriously asked myself whether I was justified in attending those meetings & whether there was a reasonable prospect of an end of aimless talking & a beginning of definite doing. We seem to me in the first place to have no clear idea of what the society is for; we seem again to have a tendency to bother away precious time on trifles, we seem to forget when we are discussing ways & means that all this is not mere theory but that definite information of the experience of others in the work & of the general state of scientific knowledge on most of these points is easily obtainable And finally we seem in the hazy out of our definite practical work for committees & have not the faintest shade of an idea of enormous difficulties & infinite complications of some of the subjects we undertake. To particularize at the last meeting the subject for discussion was the influence of small tenement life on children — a subject of the deepest importance & of wide influence. There is a perfect mass of material on the subject — studies, maps & plans, vital statistics, statistics of dwellings & occupations, measurements of children's bodies, experiement as & mental aptitude, inquiries into home life — indeed I could with out difficulty gather right here in Atlanta a hundred volumes of material on the point to be discussed. If a sociological society had been going to discuss that subject what would one reasably expect the trend of the discussion to be? They would expect first that the general conditions of slums would be explained: Both the maps of London would be exhibited & studies show-the physical environment; The Hull House maps & papers would have been taken next; something would have been said of the slums of New York & Philadelphia. Then the general question of children would be approached — what physical surroundings are necessary & the lack of them there would be illustrated by the death rate of children in slums; the moral demands of child life would be touched upon & criminal

33-1-85

33-1-89

statistics adduced to show how youthful criminals are bred in the slums; finally we would have the evil social effects — lewd talk, illegitimate children, prostitution, personal uncleanness, the spread of disease & the like. There are some very elementary matters connected with the life of children in slums which any consideration of the subject must take up. But beside this the central part of the discussion ought to have been the slums of Atlanta: we ought to have had the map of several a typical alley showing the size & relation of the houses, the number of rooms, the number dwelling there, & the number & sex of children; the general characteristics of the families, the ~~the~~ ability of the children in school or at work, the number of deaths in the alley in a year, the kinds of diseases, and a general history of the alley. From one to five such studies might have been made.

Such is what we might reasonably expect in the discussion of this subject by a club which calls itself sociological. And yet I doubt if any member of this society went from that discussion with a single new fact or idea. No body had studied the subject, no body knew anything about the matter, noone had any information

83-1-90

& unfair. About 2 days before the meeting in the midst of a busy week's work I was informed that I was selected & discuss a subject which experts have been studying for 10 or 20 years. And when out of sheer respect for the intelligence of these members I mildly protested that two days was not enough time for such a subject — the society blandly waved its hand, & said "why you had three days".

33-1-91

I remember last year at the Atlanta Conference the president of this society gave an outline of this organization & a list of its committees. It must confess it made a splendid showing; but there was one fact that the president omitted & mention & that was that ~~not a single~~ very few of those committees had done any good worth mentioning. ~~I said to myself well the work~~ Was this the fault of the president: he had urged the society again & again to do actual work & the society did attempt & help the Atlanta Conference, but of all the bad reports that came out that conference that of this clubs was the worst. If it had not been for the personal work of Dr Butler & Mr. Mathews the Atlanta Conference would have had to omit Atlanta from the cities investigated. I said to myself however this society is young yet — next fall the ~~for~~ work will begin. And lo! at the first meeting I attended the club was adopting a new constitution. I must say I was somewhat disgusted — what to me meant I thought of a new const. when we have done nothing under the the old one. A constitution is not worth the paper it is written on unless it is backed by deeds & given the deed & I care not whether we have a const. or not. ~~The~~ one of the objects of the new const. was said to be the facilitating of the organizing of other sociological clubs in other cities. I would as soon think of my baby advertising & teach person to walk — why he can't walk himself.

33-1-92

After the new constitution was adopted the same difficulties appeared as last year in the apportionment of work & committees. One afternoon last year we casually discussed the matter of crime. In a moment the discussion spread — we swept thro' the calendar of crimes in 15 and attack the subject of criminals; passing then a moment we sailed gaily & the matter of punishment, then & slums & education, then & the the conduct of courts, then & color discrimination, then to the situation of the south & to the negro problems. A library of 10000 volumes would not have covered the matters we lightly discussed in that afternoon and then as it was opening my eyes in wonder, we suddenly appointed a committee & charged it with the whole matter. Does anyone wonder that we haven't heard from that committee since? It is my candid opinion that if we had appointed a committee of 10 persons & given several thousand dollars & expend they could not possibly have accomplish the work we gave them in less than 300 years.

33-1-93

The trouble is we despise the day of little things — we neglect little movements, small efforts, tentative experiments & throw ourselves blindly against adamantine walls which have withstood the assaults of philanthropists for centuries. We had a simple program of work laid before us: it was suggested that we make a careful map of the Negro slums of Atlanta & see how they are situated with ~~to~~ regard & the various agencies for good. This was not theory or experiment — it was simply analogous to a great work now being done in New York city. Yet this society virtually shoved the plan by appointing an endless committee

& give pastors of various churches advice as & their mission fields in the city. The chairman of the committee protested at the time that this method of attacking the matter would not do — but no! we must have the committee. And of course the committee never reported for it had nothing & report. Several times other promising deputate proposals for small beginnings have been made but no sooner were they launched than someone proposed something else, another pointed out that this method would not reform everybody & make the sunshine 24 hours in the day & the whole plan became amended & blocked & died a peaceful death in committee

To sum up then: We as a society are not sure what we ought & do; and we have made clumsy & ineffectual attempts & do a mass of things without a knowledge of the facts or of the well-grounded theory of the subject. We add & our membership in a hap-hazard way forcing people & join who simply come & visit; we appoint committees & distribute work in a way equally accidental & thoughtless & above all we yield & the temptation & talk & discuss when we nothing & say.

33-1-94

But enough of criticism. I know it is much easier ~~the~~ to find fault than to avoid fault — to pick flaws in work done than to do work. And yet candid criticism has its place — it lies at the root of all reform & after all in this devious world perhaps the trouble is that we stray so little rather than that we err so much.

33-1-95

Let me therefore turn to the last point I wish to consider

VI What this Society might & ought to do.

The aim of a society of this kind ought to be to furnish accurate information to such agencies as are engaged in the work of social reform, to endeavor to increase the cooperation between those agencies, and to ~~endeavor~~ seek to establish new agencies for reform in neglected and unknown fields of effort. Let me take up these 3 things in order:

First I say, this society should aim to gather facts and information for its own & others use. I was once planning an elaborate piece of investigation in regard to the Negroes of a certain city, when I came across a woman who could if she would give me much valuable matter. She looked at me suspiciously & said "What's the object of this investigation?"

simply to get at the truth" I answered. "Do you hope to do anything after you get the facts" said she "We simply collect the facts"
I returned "Others may use them as they will"
"Then you are trying ~~simply~~ only to get facts & not to better things" she said "Yes" I again answered. "Humph" she replied & I'm still waiting for that information. Now this illustrates well the attitude of many minds toward careful & systematic collection of minute facts.
Men are so filled with ideas of reform that they haven't time to study the abuses which they seek to abolish & baldly assume that they know all about them. One of the most baffling things about the Negro problem today is the fact that so many people in this country are absolutely convinced that they thoroughly understand it. Especially ~~to~~ is every Negro supposed to be born with a thorough understanding of this intricate problem in all its bearings. And yet a moments thought will convince us all of our ignorance. How many of us here really know very much of the history & present condition of the 8 millions of our race in this land? We call the "Negro problem" certain facts of personal experience, joined to some reading

33-1-96

& general information & to a good-deal of great.
There is not one of us that does not need to study thoroughly & minutely any part of the subject which we propose to work upon. This Society should be a centre for gathering and information in Atlanta. We ought to begin to study thoroughly comprehensively & minutely the Situation of the Negroes of the city — we ought to become a bureau of accurate information for all facts connected with the Negro — wealth & poverty, business & labor, crime & pauperism charity and reform, homes & streets, migration, wages, occupations, marriage & divorce, illegitimacy education, Church-organizations, other organizations — every general fact which bears upon the ~~present~~ condition of the Negro in this city, past & present ought to be carefully collected & recorded, and now & then published. We should follow the history of alleys, compile a careful list of the worthy poor, study minutely the abode & history of the criminals, keep an eye upon orphans & homeless waifs — in fine no fact or condition should escape the eye & pen of a society whose chief business it is to know the social problems they seek to solve.

33-1-97

For this ~~information~~ work we should have committees, and every member of the organization be ~~to~~ a member of some committee. Each committee should work under a chairman & the chairman ~~should~~ coned ~~taught~~ if he can 33-1-92. & appoint sub-committees. At every meeting it should be the work of each committee & report some carefully ascertained facts & this committee & & report in writing not orally. The facts may small or unimportant they may be a study of a whole district, they may be historic data, illustrative incidents but allways accurate, always reliable and always designed & teach us more of the actual situation of the people & guide our feet in matters of reform.

These committees should be standing committees & no other committees ought & be appointed during the year, save in very exceptional cases. The committees should be appointed on such subjects as Poverty, Crime, Health, Homes, & Churches, Education, Occupation The defective classes, Wealth, Reading &c. — That is, simple comprehensive fields where much may be learned.

2nd We should endeavor & increase cooperation among the various agencies for social betterment among the Negroes of Atlanta: these agencies are the Churches, the schools, the secret & ~~benev~~ benevolent societies & the benevolent efforts of various kinds. Our object here should be not & needless ~~useless effort~~, not & interfere in the work of others, but by speedy information & pointing out fields of action we should seek reduce the duplication of benevolent work & a minimum & get the widest good fellowship & cooperation possible. Mothers meeting, lectures, circulating libraries, savings associations & general reform work could in this way be spread by sheer contagion thro' the various church-constituencies & communities. This society should stand ready & send & every single church in Atlanta two three times a year competent persons & explain & the members some elementary matter of reform — ventilation, the use of water, sewing-schools, hygienic cooking, reading, saving, &c. In this way effort could stimulated in existing agencies toward betterment of present conditions ~~& this work this should an executive committee under the~~ ~~direction who should arrange conferences with officers of various societies~~ & become a sort of federation of benevolent counsel of Negroes ~~& finally this society should endeavor to find out what fields of reform are entirely~~

33-1-99

For this purpose there should be an executive committee under the chairmanship of the President which should arrange meetings & conferences, & tell us what other movements are doing & seek to build gradually a central board which would federate all the benevolent effort of the city among Negroes and cooperate with similar efforts among Whites.

Thirdly the society should endeavor to find out & explore fields of reformatory effort neglected by other agencies, or forgotten or unknown. And should seek here to inaugurate ~~up~~ new movements for betterment. In this work however great care must be exercised. Our committees ~~are our~~ stand for ears open to all sounds from every where & letting no whisper escape. But our efforts at actual reform must not be thus dispersed. ~~Not we~~ We cannot reform the whole world at once. We must concentrate our efforts: one thing at a time & that a small thing; careful tentative effort, feeling our way slowly, making no failures

33-1-150

& take no back road sleds & above all remembering that permanent reform is slow work & that 10 years in such work is a mere bagatelle. One thing at a time then & let that one thing take our whole strength. We might for instance do this: each of us here might contribute to the committee on School a book suitable for children to read. We each might get a few friends to give similar books. Then this with a modest little library of say 25 or 50 volumes properly labelled, cared for might be placed in one of the public schools & circulate for a month. Then in another school for a month, then in another. Next year we might collect another small library — in 10 years we might thus place in every ~~the~~ school house in the city a circulating library & begin to send some to the county school. — simple work, nothing great, no wholesale manufacture of saints, nothing to wave our hands about or yell, but Work, Reform & advance such as in the past has built nations & empires. When this enterprise was well started & in charge of the proper committee — or possibly given over to some special organization, we could begun another & larger effort — but slowly carefully. We could start a movement toward a penny savings bank. Not a money making institution, but a benevolent enterprise & encourage thrift run on business principles. We could select in the city three or four Negroes whose reputation for honesty & probity was unquestioned If possible we would ask three or four interested white men & act with them & form the directing board of a Negro Penny Savings bank. Each church could be induced & hold meetings & hear talks on thrift & little things. The various schools — Spelman, Atlanta Baptist, Clark Morris Brown or other could preach a crusade of saving at chapel exercises. At ~~each~~ several of the larger colored stores, a small stand a tin box & a padlock could be placed & a member of the committee on saving could preside from 8 & 10 p.m. on Wednesday & Saturday night. Bank books with stamped receipts could be given out. The enterprise would flourish for a while then it would die down but we would not die down — more lectures, more talks, tracts & posters, a notice in the Constitution & habits of saving would begin to grow & know

33-1-101

33-1-102

33-1-103

we should gradually, where to place our branches — how & encourage people. In ten 5 years we might have $200 or $300 in deposits; to 10 years $2-3000. In 15 years we might hire modest quarters, use our money for a building association or surrender the whole work to a special society. — Nothing great in such a movement — nothing to take ones breath away — it has been done a hundred times in other cities among other people & in a few cases among Negroes — but the the true way — which does not necessarily call for a constitution on paper but it calls for a certain mental & moral constitution in us which is too often lacking.

I might easily go on naming a hundred different methods of work — distributing contracts, offering prizes in the schools & churches, a comprehensive system of neighborhood visiting, careful organized & persistently conducted series of mothers meetings & fireside schools, temporary care of waifs & foundlings, shelters for friendless girls, ~~at these~~ ~~& nursery &c~~, a social settlement house in the slums, — all these and many more — not all at once not all in a year but slowly gradually doggedly — such work lies before.

Finally as to our meetings we must stop throwing away time in endless senseless & aimless talk. We are here for business. First we want information on local conditions from the chairmen of committees & chairmen having nothing to report ought to be made to feel thoroughly ashamed for their neglect & carelessness. ~~After the~~ The reports should be brief, definite, & contain actual data. We do not want essays on what ought to be done but what your committee actually has done & when it did it & how it did it & what the result was. We ~~have~~ do not want vague general statement but definite, brief, concise records of date place & deeds. After these reports & a short discussion of the meaning of these facts then we should turn to the work of the meeting: somebody who ~~knows about it~~ has studied something & knows about it & has his knowledge in a shape to impart clearly & somewhat more briefly than I am doing, should then take the floor & teach us something either in sociological theory, or in efforts of other lands or cities, or in local We do not want general essays, or boy papers — but facts & information & carefully weighed opinion. When we can go knowing more than when we came & better prepared for work. If noone has such a paper prepared, then let us take one of the dozens of excellent works on social questions & ready read passy it from hand & hand & discuss it. Or let us adopt a text-book & study the subject we profess & know some thing of.

93-1-104

If in a half-century we thus increase our knowledge of social conditions & start a few movements & better abuses then this club will deserve well of the nation.

Fellow-workers the Negro problem is in this room — between these four walls & it is the question as & whether the best class of intelligent Negroes can so cooperate in unselfish effort as & better in some degree the condition of the Negro masses.
Among the masses we have problems but not Negro problems — these are problems of 33-1-105

33-1-105

crime, of poverty, of sexual lewdness of ill-health, of heredity. The Negro problem is the question whether those who have raised themselves above the dead level of degradation can do as other nations have done — cooperate, investigate, sacrifice & lift as they climb.

33-1-106

A PROGRAM FOR A SOCIOLOGICAL SOCIETY

By W. E. B. Du Bois

Atlanta University
1897 — 1899 is more likely FB

I desire this afternoon to read to the First Sociological Club a candid criticism of its' work and a suggestion for its' future activity. I do this the more boldly because I am a member of the organization and as such must bear my part of the responsibility for its' shortcomings; and at the same time, I speak as an outsider, for in the year that I have had my name on the rolls I have had no opportunity to share in the work of the club. I always hear with a certain foreboding shiver of the formation of a club for any kind of sociological work, for my experience has taught me that the percentage of absolute failure among such clubs is very large. The trouble is apt to be that the persons forming clubs for social reform have very vague ideas of what the science of sociology really is, and what is the real aim and object of their striving. Consequently it can easily happen that they drift aimlessly on until the members begin to wonder whether it is worthwhile to waste so much time doing nothing. I fancy I have seen in this club something of the same tendency, and it seems to me that the great need of this organization is a clearer conception of its' aims and more practical and persistent work to accomplish these objects.

43-1-74

I have therefore chosen for my subject A Program for a Sociological Society, and I want to divide what I have to say in six parts. First I want to show what Sociology is. Second- What the science has accomplished. Third - By what methods its work has been done. Fourth - How the material and knowledge thus collected can best be utilized. Fifth - What the society has already accomplished and why. And finally what this society might and ought to do.

1st. What is Sociology

There was a vast revolution which took place in the early part of this century that is too often forgotten by educated people. It came after that terrible upheaval of human institutions which we call the French Revolution, after the orgies of Robespierre, Danton, and Marat, and became finally the great instrument that freed Europe from the grasp of the arch-tyrant Napoleon. This revolution was the industrial revolution of the 19th century. It began in the 18th century, when the science of chemistry was first well established, when geology gained a sure foundation when Brinley showed the world how to dig canals uphill, when iron began to be smelted by coal instead of charcoal, and above all when James Watt turned a tea-kettle into a steam engine. Such epoch-making inventions changed the civilization of the world and with the dawn of the 19th century came an industrial revolution - factories started up, towns grew, commerce expanded, capital increased, the world market widened. If we regard this industrial movement more carefully we shall see that of all departments of human industry the manufacture of cotton made the most gigantic strides in this epoch. The ancient world dressed in wool, the middle age in wood and linen, the modern world dressed largely in cotton. The series of inventions that made cotton manufacture possible are a curious example of coincidence. Between the years 1775 and 1825, Arkwright Hargreaves, Cartwright, and Eli Whitney had changed the spinning wheel into the factory and made the southern United States the cotton field of the world.

This industrial revolution had serious consequences: first it fastened American Slavery in this country and made emancipation more difficult, and the Negro problem more baffling; More that that in all lands it gave rise to and intensified those intricate questions of life and death and civilization which we call social problems: human being were, by the new concentration of industrys, crowded into centers of population and the difficulties, deseases, and maladjustments of human life became intensified and more patent to the eye. Crime, poverty, desease, prostitution, ignorance, and death began to assume threatening proportions. Men came to be attracted to these sinister phenomena nad to ask what they really meant, how far they were remediable, and how far inevitable.

There was then but one science which undertook the study of the phenomena of human action and th t was the science of political economy. But this science was limited in scope: it began in the 17th and 18th century when the phenomena of money and international trade first assumed importance and confined itself simply to a study of wealth: it asked how goods were produced, how they were distributed among the producers, and how their owners exchanged them for other goods. It thus took into account only a few human activities under stable conditions of society. The industrial revolution, however, had greatly changed conditions, and brought a distinct demand for wider inquiry into the causes and scope of human action - deeper search for the reasons of present conditions and the intelligent application of such knowledge to methods of social regeneration This was the beginning of the modern science of Sociology.

Sociology is therefore the name given to that vast field of inquiry into human action as manifested in modern organized life. It cannot study all human action under all circumstances, but thay human action which by its regularity gives evidence of the presence of laws. What these laws are we hardly know, and yet we do know that there are in life curious and noticeable coincidences - rythm in life and death, a working out of cause and effect, evidences of force action and reaction, which cannot be ignored or neglected. Many eminent men still insist that this mass of partially digested facts cannot be called a science - and indeed if you mean by science, a body knowledge with definitely stated laws, and carefully systematized facts, then Sociology is not yet a sciene and may never become one. But if you mean by Sociology a vast and fruitful field of inquiry into the mysterious phenomena of human action, which has yielded evidence of the working of scientific laws to some extent, and promises much for the future - if such a work deserves, as many think, the name of science, then Sociology is one of the greatest of sciences.

But it is impossible to tell what a scienc is merely by defining it - the definition is the last thing a science discovers - indeed it can truthfully be said that no science can be fully defined until it is perfect, until its work is done. The best explanation of a science then is a description of the sort of work it is doing and what it has already accomplished. I come therefore to the second point in my talk.

43-1-77

2nd. What has Sociology done?

Sociology has studied the proportionate number of the two sexes in the different countries, the number of people of different ages, the number of births each year in different localities, the number of deaths from various dis ases, the size of families, the average number of rooms in dwellings, the extent of illiteracy, the number of communicants in the different churches the occupations which men pursue, the income from their work, the way that income is expended; the number of the blind, deaf, dumb, and insane, the extent and degree of poverty, the prevalence of suicide, the extent and kinds of crime, the characteristics of criminals, the distribution and migration of population, the distribution of property, etc. Moreover it has sought to generalize much of this mass of facts and show how all these actions and phenomenas tend to a certain rhythm and regularity which we call the social group. In the social group the distribution of the sex and age of the individuals remain continually about the same despite birth and death, and the rate of births and deaths varies so little that it can be predicted within limits. The income, occupation, expenditure, and crime tends in the same way under forms of law. This so-called Social Law seems partly voluntary, partly involuntary, but in all cases its regularity is much gr ater than the casual reader dreams. These social groups in turn combine to form that higher generalization which we call Society. Society is simply a general name for the regularities of human action - for the general fact that when 50, 100, Or 1,000,000 live together they do not all act irresponsibly or at random but according to well-known maxims, social forces and laws.

All this that I have said can best be illustrated by a few actual examples. In Europe, for instance, repeated investigation has proven that for every 1,000 males there are about 1,024 females. This is Characteristic of old countries. In the United States, on the other hand there are only 952 females for every 1,000 males. In the older, eastern states, however, we should expect to find conditions approaching those in Europe - and sure enough there are 1,005 females to every 1,000 males. To show the significence of such facts let us go a step farther: We find in the city of Baltimore 1,310 Negro women to every 1,000 men. We can immediately say this is surely an abnorman situation and must have something to do with the large number of illegitimate births in that city

Statistics of age show that in normal countries about one third of the population is under 15 years of age, yet the nations vary considerably: for instance take children under 10 years of age; in England they form 24% of the population, in France only 18% , among the Negroes of the land 28%. Turning now to the old people 60 and over and we find that they form 7% of the population of England; 13% of that of France; and 2% among our race. Such differences simply mean poor family life among our prople.

The statistics of births and deaths are always of great interest and consequently liable to misuse. We may have two especially marked types: a population with a low birth -rate and low death-rate like France or a population with a high birth rate and high death rate like American Negro. The latter is a sign of a low standard of culture - early marriage, illegitimacy and neglect of the laws of health; the the former is usually a sign of high civilization - postponement of marriag until the support of a family is assured, and life according to the laws of hygiene. Son in the same country the character of a community may easily be approximately fixed by measuring the number of people in every thousand

of people in every thousand that die annually. A death rate above 26 is high, while one above 30 points to grave dangers. The rate may be as low as 18 as in Norway. The average death rate of Negroes in cities is 34.

Where socilolgical inquiry reveals great differences in the conditions of different groups of people this is usually evidence of some unseen cause which makes the variation. For instance, we can represent the occupations of the people of Philadelphis by the following set of door steps:

43-1-79

If however we represent the occupations of the Negroes of the city, we find the steps hard for climbing.

What is the meaning of this striking difference? It is explained fully by one comprehensive word SLAVERY. Thus history writes itself in figures and diagrams.

In the matter of crime, sociology has done some of its best work; let us notice only one - the connection of crime and age. In Germany for instance it has been found that 15% of all persons between 21 and 40 have been convicted for crime, 9% of those between 40 and 60, and 7% of those between 12 and 18 years of age. Further analyzing these figures it is found that the most criminal age is between 20 and 30, and among young unmarried men. Taking for instance the Negro criminal in the Eastern section of Pennsylvania; we find the remarkable fact that 67% of them were under 30 years of age and 11% uande 20.

Using such minute and detailed statistics sociology has built up the theory of the social group. The country village is a social group.

Its population distributed in a certain normal order as to age and sex and conjugal condition, Its birth and death regulating the increase of population. There is some crime, a school, a church, a village store. The population is divided among different occupations, social classes make a faint appearance and there is a general public opinion which represents of synthesis of like ideas. Such a group may grow to a city or to a nation, but as it grows we note certain peculiarities: it forms within itself other smaller groups for special purposes - clubs for amusement or reading, church societies, associations of capital and labor called shops or companies or factories and etc. These sub-groups we might call organs for carrying out the special work of society, just as the tissues of the body form here a heart and here an eye to serve the whole organism of the body. This we refer to when we speak of society being organized - of course this is but an analogy for the organization of society is far from complete and individual free will must ever hinder that consummation in this world. Nevertheless advance in civilization is to a certain extent advance in the perfecting of the organization of society.

Such is the work that Sociology has accomplished. It is to be sure only a beginning: our statistics are woefully imperfect. Our methods of observation are crude and the material at hand is largely an unclassified mass of facts, the value of which is various and uncertain. Nevertheless gigantic strides have been taken in the last 10 years, something has been done, and the outlook for the future is bright. This brings me to the fourth point I wish to discuss.

4th. The Use of Sociological Material

The interest in social reform and general betterment which animates so many excellent people today must not be mistaken for the science of Sociology. There are many people who have a vague desire to right wrongs, help the needy, and reform the vicious. Unfortunately these people in very many instanses are ignorant of the results of scientific research in these lines - they do not know the value and meaning of statistics and they often waste money and energy, or do absolute harm, either by antiquated or discredited methods. If anyone should inform an ordinary citizen that chemists had discovered a new element, Argon - he would say very well or bravo! and be done - he would not attempt to discuss the matter or draw conclusions - he is no chemist and does not attempt to be. If he wishes to use the results of chemical research he seeks the advice of a chemist. In the realm of sociology, however, the case is very different: tell a man that the death rate of the Negroes is 36, and immediately he is ready to discuss the matter, write articles, form clubs, and spend money although he knows that he is not an expert in statistics or a student of sociology. What ought to happen in this case is clear: the man ought to say candidly that he knows nothing about death rates - is 36 high or low or medium? What has been the history of the variation of death rates? How do the death rates of different peoples compare with this? A sensible man ought to ask: What does a death rate of 36 mean; what in the light of the expert statistical knowledge and the careful sociological research of the last quarter century, is the proper interpretation of this figure 36, which otherwise is to me a Sphinx and an enigma.

The civilized and thinking part of the modern world is gradually and surely coming to this position. The first thing people ask of social reformers now in not how earnest are you or how great is the need of reform but rather what do you know about the actual situation and how does the best of expert opinion interpret these facts. Men recognize the fact that such expert opinion may err but they are coming to see that the occasional error of men who give their life to knowing is not as dangerous as the perpetual error of men who guess or dogmatize. The facts and the meaning of the facts are then the first steps in modern social reform.

How now shall the mass of intelligent people who have not time to be experts put themselves in position to use the material collected by sociologists in the practical work of reform? We can best answer this by seeing the work done in reform during this century.

43-1-82

One of the first movements was the English Abolition of the slave-trade: for this the House of Commons collected a mass of statistics - the number of ships engaged, the amount of capital invested, the methods employed to capture slaves, the routes of sailing, the number transported, the death rate among slaves and sailors, and etc. They soughtthe history of the subject, the general conditions, the opinions of experts statisticians and when they began to legislate on the subject they knew what they were doing and no nation had done so much to stop Negro slavery as these same Englishmen who studied the matter so thoroughly. Again take the matter of prison reform. When the question was first agitated there wasn't a crank in England or America that hadn't an opinion and a panacea - It was do this, do that, make their punishment as severe as that of galley slaves; treat them as unfortunate victims of society; make their work hard, let them lie idle; hang them, give them tracts to read, and etc. Society has outgrown this: gradually here and there we have collected facts - not how someone thinks a plan might work but how the plan actually did work when it was tried; we have studied criminals instead of taking it for granted that we know them, we have watched crime instead of theorizing about it and then with the material we have tried careful experiments - experiments in housing prisoners, experiments in punishment, experiments in work and diet; until today no intelligent man thinks of aimlessly giving advice as to crime - he knows that this is a subject for experts - a subject still dark, with much to be learned, but still a realm where the day of guesswork is past. In the matter of charity, perhaps the greatest advance has been made. The classic examples of this is the history of the English poor law. At first England frowned fiercely on beggery and poverty and whipped and branded and hanged the poor devils. Then she melted into sentiment and coddled and stuffed her paupers until it seemed as though all England would go to begging. Finally the state bethought itself to askwho are the paupers, what makes pauperism, how can we decrease it and help people to help themselves? For this reason it now uses the statistics, studies social conditions, organizes charitable societies, avoids duplications of work, detects importers and seeks in every way to know the causes of poverty and apply intelligent and scientific remedies. The world is still far from solving the problem but we are much nearer than men were in the 17th and 18th centuries.

43-1-83

Thus sociological material is today used by all kinds of social reforms: the organizers of childrens societies, and of schools; those who seed to help the deaf and the bling, those who want to get work for the idle; saving banks and building associations are established on carefully ascertained principles, model homes built for tenants - indeed this is the age when lasting and effective reform has become systematic and scientific and has replaced sentiment and theory.

The question now comes:

5th. What Has the First Sociological Society done?

I want to be perfectly frank in this matter and to say plainly that in my opinion this society has done nothing. I know we have organized - we have held meetings. We have had pleasant social gatherings and we have talked. But of actual work accomplished either in the line of knowing just what there is to be done, and just how we are to do it, and what there is to be learned as to method from the sociological work of the day, and above all of actual accomplished work, it seems to me perfectly fair to say that this society has done little more than nothing. Indeed I have several times seriously asked myself whether I was justified in attending those meetings and whether there was a reasonable prospect of an end of aimless talking and a beginning of definite doing. We seem to me in the first place to have no clear idea of what the society is for;

we seem again to have a tendency to fritter away precious time on trifles, we seem to forget when we are discussing ways and means that all this is not mere theory but that definite information of the experience of others in the work and of the general state of scientific knowledge on most of these points is easily obtainable. And finally we seem in the laying out of our definite practical work for committees to have not the faintest shade of an idea of the enormous difficulties and infinite complications of some of the subjects we undertake. To particularies, at the last meeting the subject for discussion was the influence of tenement life on small children - a subject of the deepest importance and of wide influence There is a perfect mass of material on the subject - studies, maps and plans, vital statistics, statistics of dwellings and occupations, measurements of children's bodies, experiments as to mental aptitude, inquiries into home life - indeed I could without difficulty gather right here in Atlanta a hundred volumes of material on the point to be discussed. If a sociological society had been going to discuss that subject what would one reasonably expect the trend of the discussion to be? They would expect first that the general conditions of slums would be wxplained: Bootha maps of London would be exhibited and studies shown of the physical envirionments; the Hull House maps and papers would have been taken next; something would have been said of the slums of New York and Philadelphia. Then the general question of children would be approached- what physical surroundings are necessary and the lack of these would be illustrated by the death rate of children in slums; the moral demands of child life would be touched upon and criminal statistics produced to show how youthful criminals are bred in the slums; finally we would have the evil social effects - lewd talk, illegimate children, prostitution, personal uncleaness, the spread of disease and the like. Those are some very elementary matters connected with the life of children in slums which any consideration of the subject must take up. But beside this the central part of the discussion ought to have been the slums of Atlanta: we ought to have had the map of several typical alleys showing the size and relation of the houses, the number of rooms, the number dwelling there, and the number and size of children; the general characteristics of the families, the ability of the children in school or at work, the number of deaths in the alley in a year, the kinds of diseases, and a general history of the alley. From one to five such studies might have been made.

43-1-85

Such is what we might reasonably expect tin the discussion of this subject by a club which calls itself sociological. And yet I doubt if any member of this society went from that discussion with a single new fact or idea. Nobody had studied the subject, nobody knew anything about the matter, noone had any information to impart. About two days before the meeting in the midst of a busy week's work I was informed that I was expected to discuss a subject which experts have been studying 10 to 20 years. And when out of sheer respect for the intelligence of these members I mildly protested that two days was not encugh time for such a subject - the society blandly waved its hand, and said "why you had three days".

I remember last year at the Altanta Conference, the president of this society gave an outline of this organization and a list of its committees. I must confess it made a splendid showing: but there was one fact that the president omitted to mention and that was that very few of those committees had done any work worth mentioning. Nor was this the fault of the president: he had urged the society again and again to do actual work and the society did attempt to help the Atlanta Conference, but of all the bad reports that came into that conference that of this clubs was the worst. If it had not been for the personal work of Dr. Butler and Mr. Matthews the Atlanta Conference would have had to omit Atlanta from the cities investigated. I said to myself, however, this society is young yet - next fall the work will begin. And lo! at the first meeting I attended the club was adopting a new constitution. I must say I was somewhat disgusted - what do we want I thought of a New Constitution when we have done nothing under the old one. A constitution is not worth the paper it is written on unless it is backed by deeds and give the deeds and I care not whether we have a constitution or not. One of the objects of the new constitution was said to be the facilitating of the organizing of other sociological clubs in other cities. I would as soon think of my baby advertising to teach persons to walk - why he can't walk himself.

After the new constitution was adopted the same difficulties appeared as last year in the apportioning of work to committees. One afternoon last year we casually discussed the matter of crime. In a moment the discussion sped - we swept through the calendar of crimes in 15 minutes and attacked the subject of criminals; pausing there a moment we sailed gaily to the matter of punishment, then to slums and education, then to the conduct of courts, then to color discrimination, then to the situation of the south and to the Negro problems. A library of 10,000 volumes would not have covered the matters we lightly discussed in that afternoon and then as I was opening my eyes in wonder, we suddenly appointed a committee and charged it with the whole matter. Does anyone wonder that we haven't heard from that committee since? It is my candid opinion that if we had appointed a committee of 100 persons and given several thousand dollars to expend they could not possibly have accomplished the work we gave them in less than 300 years.

The trouble is we despise the day of little things - we neglect little movements, small efforts, tentative experiments, and throw ourselves blindly against adamantive walls which have withstood the assaults of philanthropists for centuries. we had a simple program of work laid before us; it was suggested that we make a careful map of the Negro slums of Atlanta and see how they were situated with regard to the various agencies for ggod. This was not theory or experiment - it was simply analogous to a great work now being done in New York City. Yet this society virtually spoiled the plan by appointing an aimless committee to give pastors of various churches advice as to their mission fields in the city. The chairman of the committee protested at the time that this method of attacking the matter would not do - but no! we must have the committee. And of cours the committee never reported for it had nothing to report. Several times other promising definite proposals for small beginnings have been made but no sooner were they launched then someone proposed something else, another pointed out that this method would not reform everybody and made the sunshine 24 hours in the day and the whole plan became amended and blocked and died a peacefuly death in committees.

43-1-87

To sum up then: we as a society are not sure what we ought to do; and we have made clumsyand ineffectual attempts to do a mass of things without a knowledge of the facts or of the well-grounded theory of the subject. We add to our membership in a haphazard way, forcing people to join who simply come to visit; we appoint committees and distribute work in a way equally accidental and thoughtless and above all we yield to the temptation to talk and discuss when we have nothing to say.

But enough of criticism. I know it is much easier to find fault then to avoid fault - to pick flaws in work done than to do work. And yet candid criticism has its place - it lies at the root of all reform and after all in this devious world perhaps the wonder is that we stray so little rather than that we err so much.

Let me therefore turn to the last point I wish to consider.

6th. What this Society might and ought to do.

The aim of a society of this kind ought to be to furnish accurate information to such agencies as are engaged in the work of social reform, to endeavor to increase the cooperation between those agencies, and to seek to establish new agencies for reform in neglected and unknown fields of effort. Let me take up these 2 things in order:

First, I say, this society should aim to gather facts and information for its own and others use. I was once pursuing an elaborate piece of investigation in regard to the negroes of a certain city, when I came across a woman who could if she would give me much valuable matter. She looked at me suspiciously and said,"What's the object of this investigation?" "Simply to get at the truth", I answered. "Do you propose to do anything after you get the facts", said she. "We simply collect the facts", I returned, "Others may use them as they will" Then you are trying only to get facts and not to better things" she said. "Yes", I again answered. "Humph", she replied and I'm still waiting for that information. Now this illustrates well the attitude of many minds toward careful and systematic collection of minute facts. Men are so filled with ideas of reform that they haven't time to study the abuses which they seek to abolish and baldly assume that they know all about them. One of the most baffling things about the Negro problem today is the fact that somany people in this country are absolutely convinced that they thoroughly understand it. Especially is every Negro supposed to be born with a thorough understanding of this intricate problem in all its bearings. And yet a moment's thought will convince us all of our ignorance. How many of us hear really know very much of the history and present conditon of the eight millions of our race in this land? We call the "Negro problem" certain bits of personal experience, joined to some ready and general information and to a good deal of gossip. There is not one of us that does not need to study thououghly and minutely any part of this subject which we propose to work upon. This society should be a center for gathering such information in Atlanta. We ought to begin to study thoroughly,comprehensively,and minutely the situation of the Negroes of this city - we ought to become a bureau of accurate information for all facts connected with the Negro - wealth and poverty, business and labor, crime and pauperism, charity and reform, homes and streets, migration, wages, occupations, marriage and divorce, illegitimacy, education, church organizations, other organizations - every general fact which bears upon the condition of the Negro in this city, past and present ought to be carefully collected and recorded, and now and then published.

43-1-88

We should follow the history of alleys, compile a careful list of the worthy, study minutely the abode and history of the criminals, keep an eye upon orphans and homeless waifs - in fact, no fact or condition should escape the eye and pen of a society whose chief desire it is to know the social problems they seek to solve.

43-1-89

For this work we should have committees, and every member of the organization be a member of some committee. Each committee should work under a chairman and the chairman could if he saw fit appoint sub-committees. At every meeting it should be the work of each committee to report some carefully ascertained facts to this committee and to report in writing not orally. The facts may be small or unimportant, they may be a study of a whole district, they may be historic data, illustrative incidents, but always accurate, always reliable and always designed to teach us more of the actual situation of the people and guide our feet in matters of reform.

These committees should be standing committees and no other committee ought to be appointed during the year, save in very exceptional cases. The committees should be appointed on such subjects as Poverty, Crime, Health, Homes, Churches, Education, Occupations, the defective classes, Wealth, Reading, and etc. - That is, simple comprehensive fields where much may be learned.

Second, we should endeavor to increase cooperation among the various agencies for social betterment among the Negroes of Atlanta: these agencies are the churches, the schools, the secred and insurance societies, and the benevolent efforts of various kinds. Our object here should be not to meddle, not to interfere in the work of others, but by spreading information and pointing out fields of action we shoud seek to reduce the duplication of benevolent work to a minimum and get the widest good fellowship and cooperation possible. Mother's meeting, lectures, circulating libraries, savings associations and general reform work could in this way be spread by sheer contagion through the various church constituencies and communities. This society should stand ready to send to every single church in Atlanta two, three times a year competent persons to explain to the members some elementary matter of reform - ventilation, the use of water, sewing schools, hygienic cooking, reading, saving, and etc. In this way effort could be stimulated in existing agencies toward betterment of present conditions.

43-1-90

For this purpose there should be an executive committee under the chairmanship of the president which should arrange meetings and conferences, and tell us what other movements are doing and seek to build gradually a central board which would federate all the benevolent efforts of the city among Negroes and cooperate with similar efforts among whites.

Thirdly the society should endeavor to find out and explore fields of re reformatory effort neglected by other agencies, or forgotten or unknown. And should seek here to inaugurate new movements for betterment. In this work however great care must be exercised. Our committees stand for ears open to all sounds from everywhere and letting no whisper escape. But our efforts at actual reform must not be thus dispersed. we cannot reform the whole world at once. we must concentrate our efforts: one thing at a time and that a small thing; careful tentative effort, feeling our way slowly, making no failures and takin no backward steps and above all remembering that permanent reform is slow work and that 10 years in such work is a mere bagatelle. one thing at a time then and let that one thing take our whole strength. we mingt for instance do this: each of us here might contribut to the committee onSchools a book suitable for children to read. We each might get a few friends to give similar books. Then this modest little library of say 25 or 30 volumes properly labelled and cased might be place in one of the public schools to circulate fr a month. Then in another school for a month, then in another. Next year we might collect another small library - in 10 years we might thus place in every school house in the city a circulating library and begin to send some to the country schools - simple work, nothing great, no wholesale manufacture of saints, nothing to wave our hands about or yell, but Work, Reform and Advance such as in the past has built nations and

and empires. When this enterprise was well started and in charge of the proper committee - or possibly given over to some special organization, we could begin another and larger effort - but slowly, carefully. we could start a movement toward a penny savings bank. Not a money making institution, but a benevolent enterprise to encourage thrift run on business principles. We could select in the city three or four Negroes whose reputation for honesty and profity was unquestioned. If possible we would ask three or four interested white men to act with them and form the directory board of a Negro Penny Savings bank. Each church could be induced to hold meetings and hear talks on thrift and little things. The various schools - Spelman, Atlanta Baptist, Clark, Morris Brown and others could preach a crusade of saving at chapel exercises. At several of the larger colored stores, a small stand, a tin box, and a padlock could be placed and a member of the committee on saving could be placed there from 8 to 10 P.M. on Wednesday and Saturday night. Bankbooks with stamped receipts could be given out. The enterprise would flourish for a while then it would die down, but we would not die down - more lectures, more talks, tracts, and posters, a notice in the Constitution and habits of saving would begin to grow and we would gradually know where to place our branches - how to encourage people. In five years we might have $200 or $300 in deposits; in 10 years $2-3000. In 15 years we might hire modest quarters, use our money for a building association or surrender the whole work to a special society. Nothing great in such a movement - nothing to take ones breath away - it has been done a hundred times in other cities among other people and in a few cases among Negroes - but this true rising - which does not necessarily call for a constitution on paper but it calls for a certain mental and moral constitution in us which is too often lacking.

I might easily go on naming a hundred different methods of work distributy tracts, offering prizes in the schools and churches, a comprehensive system of neighborhood visiting, careful organized and persistently conducted series of mothers meetings and fireside schools, temporary care of waifs and foundlings, shelters for friendless girls, a social settlement house in the slums, - all these and many more - not all at once, not all in a year, but slowly, gradually, doggedly - such work lies before.

Finally as to our meetings we must stop throwing away time in endless, senseless and aimless talk. Weare here for business. First we want information on local conditions from the chairmen of committees and chairmen haveing nothing to report ought to be made to feel thoroughly ashamed for their neglect and carelessness. The reports should be brief, definite, and contain actual data. we do not want essays on what ought to be done but what your committee actually has done and when it did it and how it did it and what the result was. We do not want vague general statement but definite, brief, concise records of date, place and deeds. After these reports and a short discussion of the meaning of these facts then we should turn to the work of the meeting: somebody who has studied something and knows about it and has his knowledge in a shape to impart clearly and somewhat more briefly than I am doing, should then take the floor and teach us something, either in sociological theory, or in efforts of other lands or cities, or in local conditions. We do not want general essays, or schoolboy papers - but facts and information and carefully weighed opinion. Then we can go knowing more than when we came and better prepared for work. If noone has such a paper prepared, then let us take one of the dozens of excellent works on social questions and reading it, passing it from hand to hand and discussing it. Or let us adopt a textbook and study the subject we profess to know something of.

If in a half-century we thus increase our knowledge of social conditions and start a few movements to better abuses then this club will deserve well of the nation.

Fellow-workers, the Negro problem is in this room - between these four walls and it is the question as to whether the best ~~club~~ class of intelligent

Negroes can so cooperate in unselfish effort as to better in some degree the condition of the Negroe masses. Among the masses we have problems but not Negro problems - there are problems of crime, of poverty, of sexual lewdness, of ill-health, of heredity. The Negro problem is the question whether those who have raised themselves above this dead level of degradation can do as other nations have done - cooperate, investigate, sacrifice, and lift as they climb.

43-1-93

[incomplete]

The Problem of Negro Crime.

Once upon a time I sailed along a mighty river. Green and fertile fields stretched away on either side, heavy with harvest and dotted with city, hamlet and town. Little boats glided past us hurrying to the great seas and as the morning mists lifted dark hills gathered and grew upon the horizon. The sullen waters beneath our keels murmured amid the rocks and then the great stern mountains rose and floated beside. As we slipped by one scarred peak, some one cried aloud and we all ran to the side and saw where high on its rocky top stood a lone half-ruined tower buried in ivy and tottering with age and we had scarce done gazing at it and picturing its thousand years of life when lo! on another peak arose a black castle wall moldy and old. And all that summer's day we sailed by ruined castles and fallen towers and the grim memories of portalment (?) and battlement that cluster round the Rhine. And as we looked there were those among us that whispered the tales that lay woven round each staring ruin: of war and pillage, murder and the red-waste of a blood-delighting age. It seemed all to strange to us to hear of robber baron and red handed tyrants here in the center of Europe in the shadow of the vast cathedral of Cologne whose twin towers rose before us like the mighty figures of God pointing upward. How swiftly time has run from the day when men fortified themselves against their neighbors and robbery was the past time of the well born. So it is that the carelessness of one age becomes the crime of the next and human civilization is written no more surely than is the record of human crime.

3x-13-207

For what were these ruined walls but the picture of an age when robbery was legal - when the government had no hand to stretch out and say to the hand strong barons who swarmed in South Germany, Thou shalt and Thou shalt not. When the public opinion of the age upheld murder and assault and vislence and when personal safety demanded massive walls and stalwart defenders. Looking back today 500 years to the Middle Age, we can no more truly trace progress than by noting how different today our own conceptions of crime and wrong and unlawfulness is from what it was in the 14th century. Our conceptions of right and propriety have been enlarged, our laws have widely extended their sphere and the catalog of those human actions which we call crimes has been enormously lengthened. And so strange to say as we look on the ruined castles on the Rhine and compare life in their day and ours, we measure our progress by the increase of crime - the larger number of actions we call criminal and the narrow sphere of that individual action which escapes public censure.

It is therefore with this thought in mind that I have chosen my subject ~~tonight.~~ there is no more significant measure of civilization that the character and extent of its crime. And I have chosen to ~~speak~~ write to you on the prevalence of crime among us, believing that if we would measure our past progress by the severest criterion our attitude toward law and order would be by far the truest basis of judgment.

I want then to inquire what crime means - what its true significance is as a social phenomenon, and as an indication of human culture; next I want to see how in the history of society men have sought to deal with crime and criminals in order both to punish and prevent. Then with the general knowledge, I want to ask specifically how much crime there is among us as a people, why it exists and what we as Negroes can do to prevent its growth and decrease its present proportions.

38-13-208

Many years ago a ship sailed from Savannah eastward and southward over the seas. Past Cuba it sailed, and past the great discolored mouth of the Amazon, across the line and under the southern cross. But as it rounded the Horn storms came and angry winds. Three days the ship tossed on the mighty waters and then with a cry plunged into the sea and only ten men lived to crawl, wet and weary upon one little rocky island in the South Pacific. There they were and there for perhaps months and even years they must stay; and in order to provide themselves with food, to protect themselves against the weather and keep on a steady watch for rescurers, there must be careful work and cooperation among them. The one of their number who carelessly let the fire go out was set upon by all and beaten to death ~~Why~~ Why? Because to lose fire meant death to all - it was a crime which threatened the very existence of the community. On the other hand gambling and fighting even when once it ended in murder - went unpunished, because that said the six survivors was a private affair. Thus in this miniature government there rose a system of laws, a list of crimes and a series of punishmen Why did the need laws? for self- protection. Why did they presume to call any action of their fellows a crime? Because it endangered the lives of others. What ever these men firmly thought was necessary to their safet , was the law; and whatever infringed that law was a crime; and they punished such crimes so as to prevent their reoccurrence and insure the safety of all. This perhaps isa far-fetched illustration, but it is simple and shows what crime means to any community.

It means some action which an overwhelming public opinion in that comunity regards as dangerous to the existence wrosperity and comfort of all. If the community is simple and primitive these proscribed actions- these crimes, will be few: the taking of human life, the stealing of property and the abduction of women would gradually become the chief subjects of legislation. One can study the laws of such communities back in the third and fourth centuries when the barbarians who had descended upon Rome formed small groups governed by their own laws and customs. The tribes in Africa today have such simple criminal codes.

What effect now does advancement in civilization have on such criminal laws? Manifestly it multiplies them and makes them more specific. This is but another way of saying that the community comes to recognize that many other things beside murder, theft and adultery are dangerous to its best interests. Its view of life becomes larger and broader. It is no longer a question of life and victuals - but of personal comfort, the satisfying of growing wants, the guest of the good, the beautiful and the true. And so gradually all actions which hinder the objects of life, which bring general discomfort which hinder the satisfaction of wants which keep the community from the higher life are proscribed and frowned upon. Where public opinion is strong and well-nigh unanimous, many of these actions are proscribed as crimes; in other cases public opinion is divided and yet there is a strong feeling against certain actions. In still other cases while many recognize the hurtfullness of certain acts there is no active effort to stop them. They are merely called wrong. Thus you may see that as any community advances as its conception of life grows, its calendar of crime becomes longer and its attitide toward the distinctly anti-social acts - to wail deeds that increase the difficulty and discomfort and narrowness ou life among men, is more unbending and threatening and it seeks by every means in its power to reduce such crimes to a minimum.

38-13-210

This brings me to the next question namely, how have these communities punished the action which they denominated crimes? This is a most interesting line of inquiry and leads us back to making strange customs and ceremonies. Perhaps the earliest form of punishment for the person who dared transgress the law was to allow the injured party to wreak vengeance on the offend If one man killed another, the victim's son or brother had the right to kill the murderer on sight; and so in other cases of personal injury, the injureh man was as it were appointed to execute on the victim the popular vengeance. This was the origin of the blood feud - of that code of personal vengeance which has come down to our day in southern Italy and in the mountains of Kentucky. As communities became wiser, however, many objections arose to the blood feud as a cure for crime. First there were crimes which while they injured nobody in particular yet injured the whole community together. If public property was destroyed, if a man proved a traitor in battle, the injury was patent to all and yet there was no natural avenger. Such cases therefore came to be punished by the official haed of the community the chief of the tribe, the Earl of the county, administered the punishment of the group. Even now as the group became more developed another difficulty was magnified, namely, that of ascertaining the guilt of the accused parties before punishing him. The rough rude vilagers of early times were not nice in these matters and let a general belief in the accused one's guilt pass for proof of it. The surest sign of advancing culture in such communities was a tendency to question such quick and dangerous conclusions and to secure by deliberation and ceremony some tangible proof of guilt. These early trails took curious forms. The earliest ones sought to discover guilt by witch craft and invoking the direct aid of God. Such methods are in vogue in many barbarous countries today. Some one is susected of a crime. The tribe is assembled and the priest enters the ring. His incantations begin with rythmic dance, a waving of hands, wild cries, quicker and quicker, wilder and wilder until the whole crowd is frenzied and suddenly in the midst of the orgy, the long lean finger of the priest points out the man whom he pronounces guilty of the crime. And so firm is the general faith in the priest that nothing can save the accused. Of course natural acuteness and insight enables the priest in many, perhaps the majority of cases, to find the guilty person. Soon however such methods degenerate into imagined crime, persecutions for witch craft and the like, until again the advancing community seeks new methods of determining guilt and punishment

28-13-212

The direct appeal to God or the Ordeal was a method of trial in vogue in the Middle Age. In this form the accused person appeared before the assembled members of the community and was required to go through some public test to prove his innocence - to walk over hot plough shares, to plunge his arm in boiling water or some similar test. If he were uninjured he was innocent, if not guilty. Then too there was the trial by combat so suited to a war-like age. You have perhaps heard the beautiful story of the trial by combat which Wagner tells in his opera Lohengrin. The maiden Elsa has been falsely accused by her cousin Telramund of making way with her little brother, heir to her dead father's earldom. King Henry of Brabant seats himself under the great oak of Justice and Telramund confronts him. He accuses the maiden and cries " Here I stand, here is my sword and here before God will I make good my accusation." The king turns to Elsa, who bows trembling before him. ~~The~~ "Trial by Combat" cry the assembled warriors. And the king says, "Who shall be your champion to prove your innocence against Telramund by his sword?" And the maiden stretches her arms to the sky and calls for the shining knight of whom she has dreamed, to come and defend her. The heralds step forward and sound a blast upon the trumpets; but no one answe answers. Again the trumpets ring, Elsa peers anxiously into the distance but no one comes. A third time the blast sounds over the plain. Telramund smiles, when Lo! the music of the ~~swan~~ Swan is heard and away up the winding river comes a knight in shining armor to do battle for the maiden Elsa against the false Telramund. Fiercely they battle before the king until the shining knight heaves one mighty blow with his great sword and Telramund lies prostra before him. Lohengrin had won the trial by combat and Elsa was declared innocent.

Such tales illustrate the curious custom that for many years made men prove their innocence by fighting. This custom is the fore-parent of the modern duel and street-brawl, and soon fell into disuse when men bethought themselves that the biggest rascal might also have the strongest arm and that innocence and weakness often go hand in hand. But all the time along with the Ordeal and trial by combat went more or less of an official examination before the assembled people when the accuser faced the accused and the accused had an opportunity to defend himself.

It was this feature of the trial that gradually grew and expanded with the greater wisdom and culture of the tribe until it entirely superceded in importance the more superstitious forms and ceremonies and became the real trial. Thus in the old shires of England in the 7th and 8th centuries, every year the town meeting of grown males came together and tried cases and determined the division of the land and the like. So too representatives of the towns met together in the counties annually and tried the more important criminal cases deciding the guilt of the accused by vote. Soon however difficulties arose. First, such a court could sit but one a year and secondly while the mass of people could decide as to the facts of the case they knew little of the law of the tribe especially as this grew more and more complicated. From these causes grew the custom of having as the presiding officer of the folk court a man learned in the law who decied as to what laws applied to the case; and secondly in selecting 12 or more men to meet oftener than once a year and decide upon the facts of the case. Thus we are brought to our modern form of criminal tribunal - judge and Jury.

38-13-214

What now was the object of trial whether by orgy, ordeal, combat or jury? Manifestly it was to stop those actions which the community deemed dangerous to its securit and happiness. Now the first step towards this was to detect b the most certain means who was guilt of the crimes. And we have seen how through a course of long years the machinery for this was evolved. the next task was to prevent a repetition of the act and the universal means resorted to for hundreds of years and still used for punishment. In the earliest times it was simple and strict compensatory punishment - an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth and a life for a life. This struck the primitive mind as exact justice and as the ideal prevention of further crime. And in their small group life, where all were near equality in wealth and strength and personal rights, this system might be admirable. But soon it became apparent that natural inequalities rendered the strict carrying out of this rule impossible - the eye of the weak camp follower was not an equivalent for the eye of the valiant warrior; the life of a half grown boy would not compensate for the life of a father of a family;one ox from the poor man meant ten times as much as one ox from the rich man. So the idea of Justice was modified and men sought to inflict on the criminal not the same but equivalent punishment and if possible to make him suffer every pang the victim had suffered. For many centuries even down to our day this conception of the function of the government in dealing with crime has persisted. To this was early superadded the further idea of penalty - i.e. to increase the pangs of the perpetrator beyond those of his victim in order to deter him from such deeds and to over-awe others like him in the community. Thus death was a common punishment and many a code like Draco's was written in blood. Then torture was added - burning alive, dismembering the living victims, breaking his bones on the racks, blinding and torturing with hot irons - and such gross and horrible devices. These werefollowed by more refined and fearful tortures of the mind, the dungeon and solitary confinement, the single drop of water forever dripping on the head, the torture of kinsman and loved ones before the helpless victim - all these things the world has tried in order that the spectreof crime should become so sickening and terrible that few men would dare transgress the law.

38-13-216

And still, strange to say crime did not decrease- nay, rather there arose that curious child of modern civilization the criminal class; the social class which preyed upon the mass of community and persistently perpetrated those acts which struck at the very foundation of stable government. It was not until the 18th century that the urightful paradox of this state of affairs seemed to strike the civilized world.

What is it, people asked, that causes crime and what can prevent it? As early as 1730 the English parliament began to enquire into prison life. In 1773 the great John Howard began his work. We think our convict lease system disgraceful and without doubt it is, but it is far better than the prisons of England a century ago. They were described by Howard as " a disgrace to humanity: they were for the most part poisonous, pestiferous dens, densely overcrowded, dark , foully dirty, not only ill-ventilated but deprived alto gether of fresh air. The wretched inmates were thrown into subterranean dungeons, into wet and noisome caverns and hideous holes to rot and fester, a prey to fell disease bred and propagated in the prison house, and deprived of the commonest necessaries of life. For food they were dependent upon the daprice of their jailors or the charity of the benevolent; water was denied them except in scantiest proportions; they were half-naked or in rags; their only bedding was putrid straw reeking with exhalations and and accumulated filth. Every one in durance whether tried or untried was heavily ironed: women did not escape the infliction . All alike were subject to the rapacity of their jailor. and the extortions of their fellows . DDrunkenness was universal and quite unchecked, gambling of all kind was practiced; vice and obscenity were everywhere in the ascendant. Idleness, drunkenness, vicious intercourse, sickness, starvation, squalor, cruelty, chains, awful oppression, and everywhere culpable neglect - in these may be summed up the state of the jails of England when John Howard began his philnathropic work in 1773. Most of these prisoners moreover were not yet condemned but were merely awaiting trial. The punishment most usual when trial did come was death - death for murder, death for picking pockets, death for stealing sheep, death for forging a five dollar note; or perhaps in lieu of death transportation across the seas for life. It was thus that the mass of poor whites in Virginia, Carolina, and Georgia first came to America. They were accused and covicted criminals torn from home and transported to America and their labor sold for a term of years. They were indeed att first nothing but slaves in Virginia and Caorlina and differed from the black slaves only thru the length of their service.

Such then was the theory and practice of punishment in one of the foremost countries of the civilized world- death, pain, misery or degradation for every transgressor of the law. Meantime however the world was changing. Men were thinking and asking each other questions - why were some men poor and others rich? Why were some privileged and others without rights? Why dids some always rule and others obey? Who gave kings or any other people the divine right that the great mass of the world should be miserable while a few were lapped in wealth and luxury? Under the very thrones of the magnificent Louis XIV of France and the stubborn Charles I of England, these questioning voices were calling- and after the questioning came strange muttering and then an upheaval and a crash which men called the French Revolution The central episode of the French Revolution which drenched Europe with blood 111 years ago was the attack on the Bastile - the great gloomy prison of Paris And the central thought of the Revolution was not to be sure crime and punishment but it was the more fundamental question as to the rights and destiny of the class of human beings who supply and make the great cirminal class. Thus from the French Revolution we date that wonderful change in the attitude of the civilized world toward great social problems. The 19th century asks not what shall we do with paupers - but what causes poverty? Not what shall we do with the weak members of society - but what is the cause of their weakness? Not how shall we punish criminals, but what is the cause of crime? This distinction is so fundamental - so characteristic of this century and the century that is so near us that we must be sure we understand it. To the mediaeval mind the Thief was the object of the law; men looked on the cowering culprit and asked 1st, How can we make him repare the wrong he has done? 2nd, How can we make him suffer for his crime? 3rd, How can we keep him from repeating tie act? Thus the uppermost thought in men's minds with regard to crime and criminals was reparation, suffering, and fear. They forgot in this a far more fundamental query- Why is this man a thief or how can we make him and others like him, honest men? The 17th and 18th centuries sought to punish criminals - the 19th and 20th centuries seek to prevent crime. The Middle Ages having the one idea of Punishment before it sought to make that punishment as harsh and terrible as possible and met in spite of this failed to stop crime. The Modern Age having before it the idea of preventing crime and reforming criminals uses punishment simply as a means to an end and not as the end itself.

The first prevention of crime which the modern Age has insisted upon is the most careful methods possible of making the guilt of the accused persons clear and unmistakable. There are two formidable mistakes which courts of justice may make.; the one is to punish an innocent person, the other is to let the guilty escape. But of the two manifestly the most enormous is the first. The principal of ENglish common law is - Better ten guilty men escape than one innocent man should be punished. And the reason for this is eas to see: the punishment of one innocent man means smmpathy with him, and inevitably, sympathy with crime. The slightest tendency in a community toward sympathy with crime is a tendency toward acquiescience in acts which will ultimately destroy or debauch that community. Rather, then let 10 guilty men go than gain for crime the sympathy which men have for an innocent victim of Justice. On the other hand if criminals begin to feel that they can commit crime and escape the penalty, crime will immediately and quickly increase. For these reasons we have built up in modern lands elaborate systems of police and detective assistance, courts, judges and lawyers, elaborate proceedings and costly paraphernalia; all for the sake of securing exact justice, punishing no innocent persons, letting few guilty ones escape and above all of preventing the spread and increase of crime either through sympathy or immunity. Vast sums of money are thus spent on our courts and when we complain of this, and rail at the delays of Justice remember the object is not simply to punish this forger or yonder thief or the other murderer, it is to prevent crime and exact justice even though tedious and difficult and costly is the best preventive of crime.

The second preventive of crime is punishment. But the modern idea of punishment is not retributive Justice or the infliction of pain - it is simply the prevention of crime. If it is found that the only method of deterring men from taking human life is the fear of losing their own lives in turn, then the lives of murderers must be taken by the state- quietly, solemnly and in private, with a due sense of the awfulness of depriving a human being of life even though that being be a criminal. So too if a man persists in using his liberty so as to injure his fellows, his liberty must be taken away from him; and so through the catalog of crime the modern watch word is prevention and not retributory justice. Why? Because men have come to see the meaning of the great command- Judge not that ye be not judged. Yonder boy born in poverty and filth begotten in shame and trained in crime - who shall judge the depth of his guilt when he brains your father on the dark street to steal his purse - not you or I - only the judge of the world. And yet we can not sit idly by and permit highway robbery - no we can put this young out cast under watch and ward and say to him kindly but firmly -"Liberty is not for such as you". But can we stop here? No! The question still remains What is the real cause of such crimes? Who manufactures such criminals? At first the world looked to the criminal himself to answer these questions and in the English prison act of 1779 was the first result of these queries. This act established what we know as the penitentiaries. Few of us connect today penitence and the penitentiary and yet the penetentiary was designed to be a house of penitence. The idea of the Penetentiary as enunciated by its authors Blackstone and Howard is this: "By sobriety, cleanliness, and medical assistance, by a regular series of labor by solitary confinement during the intervals of work and by due religious instruction, to preserve and amend the health of the unhappy offenders, to insure them to habits of industry, to guard them from pernicious company, to accustom them to serious reflection and to teach them both the principles and practice of every Christian and moral duty." In other words the basic idea of the penitentiary was to give the criminal the best possible chance to reform. Another step however was soon found necessary.

Manifestly criminals are not all alike as some people seem hastily to assume. Some are old hardened rascals who never will reform; some are young boys whose crime is rather ignorance and mischief than depravity; some are are women whom temptation and adversity have overcome, some have scarcely known what decent life is - others have made one misstep after a life of probity. Manifestly such men need differing treatments and the second step of modern criminal philanthropy looked toward a careful separation of the criminals- men from women, hardened thugs from first offenders, and especially children from grown persons. For children, homes and reformatories are gradually being provided, with the idea that here we are dealing with unformed characters who by means of education industry, and discipline may develope into normal and useful men and women. For first offenders reformatories are provsded in some instances and lighter sentences to encourage good behavior and appeal to the dominant Better Self.

Nor does the modern civilized world stop here. It still asks, How did these men come to be criminals at first? And Is it not cheaper and better to prevent men from becoming criminals than to try and lift them after they fall. So them turn their faces from the actual criminals to their surroundings to the classes whence they spring. And here first they notice that the great criminal class is recruited from young men between 18 and 30. How much then depends on the proper training of boys and girls that they mam properly pass through the ages of tem tation. his was one of the strongest arguments for the modern s stem of free schools. And finaley in the present decade the true meaning and wvast im ortance of home training as a preventive of crime is just being appreciated and movements toward saving the Home, pr tecting and making it the nursery of good citizenshi are seen to be fundamental in decreasing crime.

38.13.22.2

I have thus, ~~gentlemen and ladies,~~ by a long and perhaps tedious explanation sought to make clear to you what crime really is and what attitude the best thought and striving of the age takes toward it. I have done this in order that I may the more readily and clearly discuss the prevalence of crime among us, and its remedy. For often the simplest terms used in arguments and explanations are the very ones needing themselves elucidation and illustration. And so I have sought thus far to show you.

1st. That crime is a very important phenomenon in human advancement.

2nd. That those actions are branded as criminal whcih the community thoroughly believes are dangerous to its existence and comfort.

3rd. That for this reason crime must at all hazards be prevented.

4. The earlier methods of preventing crime were almost exclusively by means of revengeful punishment.

5. The modern method is to ascertain the cause of crime and if possible remove it; to try if possible to reform the criminal, and finally to use punishment merely as a means to the great end of preventing crime.

and finally the great means of reducing crime now in vogue are Penitentiaries, for criminals, reformatories for children and first offenders, universal free education for the masses, and the strengthening of home life throughout the nation.

I now turn to the final part of my task and ask "how much crime actually exists among American Negroes, what is its cause and how can it be prevented.

In 1890 over a quarter of all the prisoners in the U.S. were Negroes - that is 1/8 of the population furnish 1/4 of the prisoners.

Now there is of course no shadow of doubt that a considerable proportion of these prisoner were in jail because they were black and not because they were prisoners; that many others were there for longer sentences than they would have received had they been white. All this is true. Nevertheless it is also true, that the American Negro is producing far more than his reasonable proportion of the crime of the land.

38-13-224

No sooner do I make this statement than someone says O yes! that is all very well - but is the number of prisoners a measure of the crime? Is not a Negro much more quickly convicted and sentenced to a longer term for the same offence than a white man? Suppose then to avoid this complication we leave the South ~~where~~ where the settlement of this great social and economic question of the rise of the freedman complicaties every other question and ask what is the case in the North where no charge of discrimination in the courts has been made?

If we take the Northern states, we find that there were 12 white prisoners to every 10,000 of the white population and 69 Negroes to every 10,000 of the Negro population. In the state of New York the Negroes contribute 5 times as many criminals in proportion to their numbers as the whites. Or to take one community, a city which has the largest Negro population of any northern city and stands in its absolute Negro population 4th among the cities of the United States- namely, Philadelphia. In Philadelphia 4% of the population are negroes yet these Negroes furnish 8% of the arrests. Again between 1890 and 1895 of the 1,500 dangerous criminals sent to the Eastern Penitentiary from Philadelphia over a fifth were Negroes, yet Negroes form but 1/25 of the population. In other words, my hearers, there is no reasonable doubt but what the Negroes of the U.S. produce annually any where from 2 to 4 times as many criminals as their white neighbors. Compared with European countires, Northern Negroes furnish three ti es as any criminals . proportionately as England or France and considerably more than Ireland.

If we analyze these crimes we find that the great mass of the misdemeanors charged against Negroes are for stealing and fighting and that from these grow the more serious burglaries assaults, and murders. Moreover the perpetrators of these crimes are young- younger indeed than among the whites by an average of 3 or 4 years, bringing the dangerous criminal age among us down to the years between 18 and 25. I dwell on these facts, my hearers, because I want you fully to realize thier significance. I know the excuses, the justifications that crowd into our heads when we read these figures - but never mmind these; let us for the moment flatly face the fact that every year the army of half grown boys and girls who live the streets of Philadelphia, of Atlanta, of Savannah, of New York - your children, your brothers and sisters are sending their recruits to that army of 25,000 black prisoners who steal from their fellow men, fight and brawl upon the streets and rob and murder in the night. And the question and buring question we have to answer is ~~How can the state be saved from degradation~~ How can They be save from degradation, how can the state be saved the danger of these criminal deeds, and how, can the Negro people be saved the odium thrown upon them by this great and growing criminal class!

38-13-225

We have already learned in our review of the attitude of men toward crime that the first question the modern world asks of the transgressor is What caused the deed? And we seek not the temporary evanescent causes but the deep lying social forces that working eternally and ceaselessly below the shifting panorama of the day, determine and guide the movement of the age. What is it then today we ask that causes Negro crime? 100 years from toda the answer to this question will be simple and direct - and so it is today to those who see clearly through the blood and dust of social strife. Negro crime is the result of Negro Emancipation; whenever there occurs a social revolution crime follows as night follows the day. And the emancipation of slaves is the greatest of human revolutions. For what indeed do we mean by "social revolution"? It means the change of old customs and laws, the overthrow of old ideals, the raising of new goals of effort, the sweeping away of former means of livelihood, the rise of new problems of living, of family life, of wages, of income and expence; the building of new land marks, the forming of new ideals of culture, the adjustment of the new to the old, and the struggling and writing, and human joy and sorrow which follows every change of human interest and every pulse of human ~~fat~~ fate. Such a social revolution was the emancipation of the American Negro. To the whites it meant the overthrow of an industrial nystem, the sweeping away of accumulated wealth, the anger and despair that ever accompanies new social institutions and the bitter disappointment born at the bier of the Lost Cause. But this social upheaval did not stop there - it was even greater and more significant for the slave than for the master. He was in a moment raised from dependence to responsibility, from being cared for to caring for himself; from ignorance and forced task work to grappling with all the intricate problems of modern life - bread and butter, clothes, the home, the rearing of children, the saving of money, the plowing a new way amid a hurrying crowding world full of selfishness, greed and wrong. Not only this but problems of government and education and economic policy were thrust upon him before he could read his ballot, or knew what education meant or had any just conception of free labor.

38-12-226

33-13-227

The result of this social upheaval was to bewilder and excite the freedman's son was far more dangerous and sinister He had behind him no restraining force of custom and reverence for surrounding social institutions; he had little or no education, poor or vicious home- traniing, and his hot youthful blood met at every turn a hostile rasping environment. The result was crime - it was bound to be crime, for what crime means is the fatal persistent lack of harmony between men and the world of work, thought and custom which surrounds them. Thus crime among Negro boys and girls comes from the difficulty of adjusting themselves to the requirements of the new social position of their race - the requirement of steady hand toil, of careful saving, of temperate spending, of pure family life, of careful rearing of children of submission to many sorts of petty insult and discrimination, of dogged faithfulness and determination to learn - all these things the present surroundings demand as absolutely prerequisite to the Negro's success and inability to adjust one's self to these conditions means failure; and open rebellion against them leads inevitably to violence and crime.

Here then is the situation plain and clear before us. The Negro is responsible for nearly twice as much crime as his numbers warrant. The cause of this is the difficult environment which emancipation from slavery has thrown about the freedmen's ill-trained sons. The question now comes how are we to prevent this - How are we to train the Negro race so that in spite of the hard economic struggle before it, in spite of the distrust of its friends and jeers of its foes, it walk steadily and doggedly along the true path of progress avoiding on the one hand the slough of hopeless despondency and on the other the suicide of crime.

We have seen how large a place punishment has held in the annals of human crime. And we are therefore prepared to find that in a community like the south which has but newly begun to grapple with its great social problems the idea of revengeful punishment especially of Negro crime should have a large place. Moreover the lawlessness and disorder which always follows social changes has taken strong hold of the whites and this but complicates the situation of adding mob-violence to the methods of criminal punishment. I doubt if the best thought of the south fully realizes the deepest harm this rule of the mob perpetrates - namely the spreading of sympathy with crime among the masses of the Negroes. The most serious phase of the problem of Negro crime is the fact that Negroes themselves do not realize its prevalence. So firmly has mob rule planted the conviction in their minds that accused Negroes are martyrs and not criminals. that it is well nigh impossible for those who see and fear the real dangers of spreading crime among us to impress the average Negro with the dangers of the situation. I have repeatedly in private and public talk sought to impress the fact that Negro crime is growing dangerously frequent, only to have my warnings answered by the dogmatic declaration " Not half the Negroes convicted are guilty". I believe that ~~Very well~~ & be the case in many sections ~~then~~, I answer; granted that the reports of Negro crime are just twice too large - even then the problem is vast and appalling and calls for earnest and effective action." Thus it is that mob violence and discrimination in the courst instead of stopping Negro crime are directly increasing it by giving the sympathy aid and comfort of honest law-abiding masses.

But beyond being careful not to be misled even by the wrongs inflicted upon us, you and I have little to do with the question as to how Negro crime should be punished. This is today the problem which the whites must face and we can only point out to them, as opportunity offers, the fact that revengeful punishment and torture has never succeeded in the world's history in stopping crime and suppressing criminals; that the one object which the state has in mind in dealing with crime is its prevention and that if crime has increased in the South plain common sense would point to lynching and the convict-lease system as one of its main causes.

But we have already learned that punishment is but one means of preventing crime and if the means of punishing crime is still far beyond our control there are other means of preventhon and far more effective means which may be used. And the chief aim and end of this power is to insist upon and emphasize these means of stopping crime which lie in our own hands - which are neglected at our peril and lie waiting our future action because of our past carelessness. And the first means is The Home. Unless the homes of the Negro people are reformed, purified, and made places for the proper training of children this race can never hope to survive in its present struggle with modern culture. It is not enough to have food and fire and furniture, it is not enough to have clothes and money and fun; you must have order and cleanliness and discipline; you must insist on obedience and reverence, on regularity and punctuality, and truthfulness and honesty, you must make the welfare of our boys and girls an object of thought and planning you must know their disposition and correct their faults not by clubs and yells but by patient persistent firmness, by kind unbending love. You must not expect boys and girls to grow up, sprout and blossom with less daily care and attention than you give to your cabbages or your house plants. Eternal vigilence, unceasing watchfulness, unerring judgment must continually stand guard at the gates of the home, if carelessness, lewdness and crime are to be kept away. If your home is dirty and ugly and unpleasant, it will send dirty, ugly and hateful children into the world; if your home is gay and careless and wasteful it will add to the spendthrifts and idlers on our streets Pleasant, attractive and well-managed homes are the great light houses which will guide our children past the rocks of the harbor of freedom and culture and truth. And such houses - naturally, but none the less unfortunately are too rare among us. Throughout the land our worse homes are poverty - stricken, dirty and immoral, and too many of our best ~~houses~~ Homes are nests of extravagance, ~~and snobbishness~~ and lack of discipline. To your ~~houses~~ Homes O Israel, if you will conquer the foe.

The second great preventive of crime is education. Some of the old enthusiasm for education born in war time has melted away, as was natural. But there are unfortunate indications that the rebound will go too far; we find parents careless in keeping their children in school, in compelling them to study hard and regularly, and in supporting the teachers in their efforts to enforce discipline and habits of real study. Much of the valuable time of teachers is taken up in explaining to disappointed parents why some careless young fellow who has whistled away his time for a whole year cannot go on with his class - when half that time spent in making that boy do his work every day would make him not only a scholar but a man. We miss in the present generation of school children evidence of training in thoroughness, regularity, and earnestness. We do not find habits of thought and reading such as must underlie education. And yet what is education but the drawing out of the child of all the ability and character that is in him, the full development of his best self - the broad building of the man and the woman. And how can we do this unless parents cooperate with teachers and the child is disciplined by both. This is the day of cultivated brains do not be misled by other arguments, do not be beguiled into thinking that the 20 th century offers any fair substitute for a brained head and heart - the man today as yesterday who doesn't know anything is bound to fail, be he a judge or a carpenter. Educate your children therefore. I do not say it will make their success certain. Nay I am glad to acknowledge that many a Negro without training has made his mark in life ~~here in Philadelphia and~~ throughout the land; nay, too I freely acknowledge that many educated Negroes and many educated white men have disgraced their training and talents. But this I do maintain and the history of the world proves it - that when to an honest heart and a willing hand is joined a trained and cultivated head then all the world must cry "Behold the Man"!

(24-13-23)

The third preventive of crime is Work. Plain hard work, continued unceasing work though it be in sweat of brow and weariness of limb - work though it be in agony and pain, Work, though it be in disappointment and poverty - the lesson that you must impress upon your sons and daughters is that life means work. That there is no disgrace on earth equal to the disgrace of idleness. That there is no work so low and menial and despised as not to be infinitely preferred to idleness. I know we want our children to rise in the world; we are unwilling that they should remain in this land the hewers of wood and drawers of water. The ambition is laudable - is just, and yet remember the one thing that will utterly spoil your plans and ruin your hopes is to let your child once learn the lesson of idleness - once get used to loafing about waiting for something to turn up - to sitting in the parlor pouting and lonnging because the particular kind of work w anted is not at hand. Pu t the children to work: let them plow, sew, cut wood, scrub or wash dishes, anything so they learn what God meant when he said "By the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread".

[FOLLOWING PAGES MISSING]

The fourth preventive of crime is Reform in social customs and the proper training of social classes. Simply because it is a custom for persons to get drunk on New Year's day is no reason why you should put the temptataon of drink in the face of your growing boy. Simply because your neighbor is wealthy or has a fine house is no reason why you should push your daughter to hell by letting her associate with her. Simply because you are afraid of being called "stuck up" or aristocatic is no reason why you should associate with questionable people, let your children run with foul-mouthed playmates or in any way cease to insist that the associates of decent people must themselves be decent. I know how much of injustice arises in the formation of social classes; I know on which flimsy and ridiculous pretexts men are admitted to or excluded from the companionship of others. With such groundless assumptions and social lines I have no patience nor sympathy but believe me my hearers, Social classes must exist as long as good and bad people live in the world and unless the Negro people quickly and unwaveringly draw the line between what is good and bad in their ranks and set their faces like flint against any or all attempts to obliterate or meddle with this line then instead of raising their worst classes up to the best, they will draw the

[INCOMPLETE]

Post-Graduate Work in Sociology in Atlanta University

c 1900

I propose to ~~bring~~ before this association tonight, a simple thesis of three propositions:

1st That outside their school work teachers ought to study

2nd That the present economic & social condition of the Negro is a fit subject of study

& finally that the Negro conference of Atlanta University furnish an opportunity for such study.

The unfortunate thing about any system of education is that it must be more or less artificial — more or less removed from real life and consequently there ever lurks in our modern systems of training the danger that the transition from school to work, from preliminary training to real life shall be so sudden & so great that the subtle delicate connection between the two shall be lost forever and that which should have trained the youth for life may indeed ~~lead~~ him into life more than untrained.

None know better the truth of these statements than you — for I speak tonight to a score of graduates — to those who on one fair morning have seen the Mountains of the Lord — the transfigured world with its halo of hope & aspiration & noble achievement. To you the question comes with deeper meaning than to others — the question: Where now is the Vision Splendid? Where now are the ideals of commencement morning? It is the shadow of the answer to the question that ever throws a certain sadness over graduating exercises; that ever forces us to mingle with the chorus of congratulation & god-speed the sad minor of warning & fear; that places in every graduate's essay vague references to the beginning of work, the entrance into real life, the end of some fair morning.

Here then lies the danger of graduation: for real mornings do not suddenly but gradually change to noonday; real beginnings do not come to sudden issues but lead slowly by each to realization. But in school life the danger of graduation — that on the very threshold of life comes a sudden — somewhat artificial change ~~of life~~, a turning of the road, which is too apt to bewilder & mislead — so that the graduate of the Normal school & college cannot flounder about blindly for many a year & when he finds himself too often he has lost his youthful vision of life.

When therefore I ask of you as graduates of institutions of learning ~~are~~ where are the ideals & aspirations of your school days, I am really asking of you: How far are you carrying out & ~~realizing~~ fulfilling the preliminary training of youth? How far are you cultivating & developing that careful intellectual ~~training~~ culture the elements of which you received in school What have you done since graduation to make your commencement morning a real commencement of deep broad learning such as the few years ahead in the best of colleges can do little more than briefly initiate, If you have done nothing — if you have allowed your intellectual life & be narrowed down to & the daily treadmill of the school, the kitchen & the sewing fashion; — If those higher broader studies which once awoke in you dim glimmers of a vaster world about you, have been allowed & struggle fade & die, then you have fulfilled not the promise and the fears of that commencement morning.

1/10/57

And too many of us — far too many have fulfilled those fears ~~We~~, have caught in school a faint revelation of the wonderful universe that hangs beneath the stars ~~We~~ have followed spiders road past brave cities & smoky mills & the seething throngs of men, till it sank beneath the sea; ~~We~~ have heard the deep & dark blue ocean roll against the shores of other lands, stored with song & the deeds of mighty men ~~We~~ have raised the dead heros of old & listened to the tale of other days; ~~We~~ have glanced at the foundations of the world, have traced it's orbit round the sun; we have sought & seen not on our souls & called some echo of the mystery of life — & then suddenly we have turned our backs upon all the wealth & rich promise of this vision of life, we & have settled ourselves for a life ~~That~~ work ~~This is lifeless~~ uncloud study, without thought, without intellectual breadth or scientific eminently, without books & periodicals, with a simple social programme, of dress & bread & butter — & a life that is lifeless & a culture that is dead.

I have not come to rail at the man or woman who after some glimmer of liberal culture has narrowed his life ~~& thus~~ by it. I know to well the temptation that had led & the necessities that force the many into so hard a life; it is a hard thing & be thoughtful among the thoughtless, & be readers among a race of talkers, & find time for study & culture when it is so hard & earn a decent living. And yet we must; unless the Negro people have a cultured aristocracy whose leaven is deeper than a lot of high-sounding titles & silly degrees, & broader than the ability to make speeches, it cannot survive. The duty of making themselves such an aristocracy lies & day increasingly in the hands of the Negro teachers: they alone as a class have had the required elementary training & they alone have some leisure time. They must constitute themselves a class cultured in the 19th century manner of the term — broad in learning, ac-aumants in scholarship, deligent + unwearied students, keeping in close touch with the best culture of the day + satisfied with no ~~the~~ accomplishment which is below the highest standards of the age. To day let us frankly acknowledge we have no such class of persons. Here and there we may find isolated cases — but a class united in plain living + high thinking, who are capable + hungry + keen upon the solution of the Negro problem trained scholarship + cultured judgement such a class the Negroes of the U S. have not yet evolved + until they do we need not — cannot look for the final solution of the greatest problem of humanity

And the creation of this class does not call so much for more schools + college as it does for discrimination on the part of graduates from present institutions. So long as these graduates surround + the temptation + ape the extravagant dressing + living of the leaders of the white world; so long as they try + live by showing off + by practising the arts of demagogueary among their simple minded people or so long as they let their efforts + earn bread + butter utterly absorb & choke the intellectual life — so long will culture & civilization fail where it is most needed.

O Rome take this somewhat elaborate method of emphasizing the fact that it is the business of a graduate to study & to study beyond the narrow requirements of the elementary school curriculum which they teach. Often one graduation has no significance. They must carry out the work of intellectual development which the best school can only begin The truly educated man is he who has learned in school how to study & all his life what to study His commencement morning has in truth the commencement of his ~~true~~ education. And this he can do — in spite of crowded surroundings in the absence of all incitement & self-culture in spite of the demands of home & school & work, he can — you can leave time for self cultivation & self development — for the realization of some of the high ideals of your youth — you can do it because others have done it & above all because you must:

So near is grandeur to our dust
So near is God to man
When duty whispers low "Thou must"
The youth replies "I can."

Granting then that every truly educated person must have time to carry on careful earnest study along with his work, the next question is What subject of study shall be chose. One subject rather than many. He must chose because no one's life can compass the realm of human learning. Every day we see men specializing more & more — seeking more & more carefully not to know it all, but to know one thing thoroughly — to be master of one small subject. Herein lies the secret of modern culture — the division of employments, the specialization of thought & effort. The particular subject of your study depends on many things: on your occupation, your surroundings, your natural bent. It would be natural for a primary teacher to become interested in child psychology & to do something more than the dilettante work laid down in school journals. Country teachers have especial opportunity for botanizing city teaches for history & sound studies. While each one of us has shrewd aptitudes & inclinations which will steer this or that path to our efforts

But one fact there is which binds us together with an interest deeper than life & broader than wisdom or surroundings: & that is that we are of one decent, children of a common sorrow & joint heirs to the same hard heritage And by the token of the black blood of our fathers there is & must be one respect above all others of eternal interest to us & that is the condition ~~of the Americas~~ & place of the Negro in the modern world. We have, I believe, been misled by shallow unintelligent discussions of this matter until we at times almost wish we might let the matter rest. But we cannot: & Englishmen England must have perennial interest — must centre their thoughts & aspirations must ~~God~~ consciously or unconsciously be the goal of all their thinking & striving. The centre of a Frenchman's world must be that vast & myriad minded nation — that that tragic history these beautiful cities which the world calls France. And as to us there is & can be but one thought & one vast effort - the solving of the Negro problem

1/0163

And yet we shut up this clear fact, it is alarming & how little we are studying the problem which we must solve. We talk of it — rather too much, perhaps; we discuss about it assuming such facts as please us; we carelessly take it for granted that every Negro is born with an intimate & careful knowledge of the situation & destiny of his 9 millions fellows & that he knows any desired information it is only necessary that he should open his mouth. And yet no sooner is such a statement made than its absurdity is apparent. How many of us realize the enormity of this problem? How many of us know that there are today as many Negroes in the U.S. as there were Englishmen in England in the time of Elizabeth & as full as many as there are Spaniards in Spain today? How many of these millions have these people met who write essays on the problem? And of these few hundreds which they have met, what do they know as to their condition struggles & their particular problems? What are people thinking of, who ~~they~~ jumble into one bunch & treat as one unwary mass the Negroes of Athens Ga, & Yazoo city, Miss. — the Negroes of New Orleans & Philadelphia, of South Georgia & California, of Texas & New York. The very fact that we do this shows with what careless ignorance we are attempting the solution of the greatest problem of the century. We must ~~do~~ put such slip-shod methods & careless ways, first ourselves know little, very little of the real condition of the Negro people & that consequently we must study that condition, minutely, faithfully & intelligently. If stones are worth microscopes & ~~human~~ organs & time & brains — if grass is worth trained experience & scientific knowledge, surely 9 millions of human beings are worth some discriminating intelligent attention from those who are so eager to dissect them.

1/10/164.

Passing by the ~~historical~~ general & scientific aspect of this strange assembly of social phenomena, I wish to touch on one of the many problems now presented, one which ~~are~~ is of peculiar significance to us as teachers: & ~~the chief of~~ this is the Problem of earning a living: The question as to how the series of young people whom we are annually sending forth from our school are going to be able to earn their bread & butter in a respectable way. It is nothing strange or unusual that this economic problem should be the question of questions for the Negro in the opening years of the 20th century. It is the logical fruit of slavery & always ~~will be~~ where there are freedmen there must be poverty the struggle for bread must be hard & the condition of survival is such economic cooperation as will furnish wages suited to the wants of the new laborer. We see this problem of poverty all about us in the south: on the one hand ~~brown~~ intelligence, ~~bodily strength~~ ~~necessary~~ skill & willing strength, on the other hand a rich land with its abundant resources only half-developed & its riches wasted every day — and yet in the midst of all this, poverty idleness & crime. Near is work to be done, here are workers who might do it & yet the scores of workers are idle ~~& [illegible]~~

10/166

& the means of the work undone

What does this mean - it means that the fault lies in the ~~system~~ organization - in the whole social situation & that unless we thoroughly understand & carefully study the delicate & intricate relations of this great group of men we shall not know how to train the head & hands of the freedmens sons & develop the rich resources of this land. Here then lies a field of study of peculiar interest & the teacher - the question of the economic situation & possibilities of the Negro. The most pressing of the numerous Negro problems

Thus far I have sought to say that it is the unpardonable duty of all & particularly of teachers to ~~pursue~~ along with their work some definite course of study. Next I have sought to point out that among the many courses of study which one might pursue none is more important than that which has for its object the thorough understanding of the Negro problem & especially of the present pressing problem of work. It is my final task

1/6/1927

I say something of the especial manner in which the teachers of Georgia may cooperate in a systematic study of the subject indicated

You will of course understand that I do not mean for a moment to assert that the study of social problems is the best study for all of you to pursue — I merely stand under the circumstance of our situation that it is of peculiar interest & value. Nor again do I say that the only method of effectively studying the Negro problems is their cooperation with the Atlanta Conference; but I do say that in unity there is strength & that only by continuous systematic effort covering wide areas & conducted according to the best & certified knowledge of the day, can we hope finally to gain such a knowledge of these social problems as will guide the statesman the philanthropist & the patriot. Such a centre of systematic effort the annual Negro Conference at Atlanta aims to be & as such needs your closest interest & trained workers. The study of society as it is carried on today ~~as it is carried on today~~ is a slow & difficult task. No sociologist claims to present in his science any exact formulae system of laws & measurements as chemistry & astronomy — it is rather a great ~~vast~~ field of study where careful observers are daily counting measuring & searching — gathering the data which another age will systematize & interpret. To realize how intricate & multitudinous these facts are we have only to look about us. What is the real difference between the man that walked the streets of Assisi 300 yrs ago & the citizen of New York: the greatest difference lies neither in ~~his~~ clothing nor ~~his~~ culture but rather in their relations to their fellow men: the nomad arab is bound closely to a few score individuals by ties of blood — known in his life, his religion, his simply living; he works for them alone & knows none other save as enemies. But the citizen of New York is bound to the whole world by ties of commerce, work, thought & ideals. He toils for India & India toils for him; he works for Africa & Africa works for him, he thinks the thoughts of London, feels with Paris, & shakes with Vienna He is part of one great ~~vast~~ thinking whole which we call modern civilization. The vast & intricate relations of men — the mutual efforts & the subtle object of that Mother Age in whose bosom we were nurtured — it is the mighty subject of human cooperation in modern society that the science of Sociology seeks to study. It does not ~~& does pretend to~~ understand yet thoroughly comprehended it & does not pretend that it has. It has ~~not~~ discovered no great & startling laws of human action & may never do so — but it has collected a mass of material of supreme interest & value, & of such a nature that no modern thinker who is interested in the condition & destiny of human beings can afford to ignore its method & results.

The Atlanta Conference seeks to apply to the study of the Negro problem the methods of sociological inquiry which the trained experience of the world has found most successful & it seeks to interpret the results in the light of similar ~~results~~ data obtained by students the world over. For the carrying out of this work we need trained workers; we need in every city & town in the South a group of intelligent and trained Negroes trained in social observation & in the most accurate methods of social measurement With such a set of machinery we could know instead of guess, we could replace spasmodic excitement with united purposeful action, we could repell build assertion with sober fact: in fine we could take the first step which a civilized people must take before all others — the step toward understanding the Social problem before they seek to solve it.

10/1/70

It may seem to you at first a very easy thing to carry out such a program
I speak feelingly & from some experience when I say it is not. Out of all the millions known to be interested in the American Negro, you would be surprised to know how difficult it is to get the cooperation of a few hundred in the collection of accurate facts. When we send out 500 letters from Atlanta University we count ourselves fortunate if 150 of the persons addressed take the trouble even to reply; & of these 150 replies perhaps not more than fifty send replies worth the making. Enjoying as I am the hospitality of Athens I shall refrain from saying how many letters I sent here but you asking for a little information not difficult to obtain before I received a

For this reason we are hoping that as the years go by larger & larger numbers of graduates who feel that they ought to continue systematic study will take advantage of the opportunities for post graduate study offered by Atlanta Univ & that they will particularly become interested in the department of History & Sociology of which the Atlanta Conference forms a part. We offer no special inducements for such students and ask the opportunity to study under guidance & the satisfaction of knowing that mental development did not stop with commencement reply. Suffice it say that in order to get the information as to Negro merchants collected by the Atlanta Conference last year we sent out and no less than 2500 communications and fully 1500 of these we have still to hear from. Furthermore the sort of information which we can ask for is seriously limited by the fact that our correspondents are largely untrained & unaccustomed to the careful accurate work required in such inquiries

1/10/1723

(FOLLOWING PAGES MISSING)

ment morning. If the department should grow there is the possibility of a summer school in social question & a wide & valuable development. Here then is the need here is the opportunity

We need ~~then~~ first to arouse among the thinking class of Negroes an interest in study for its own sake; we need to turn this interest more entirely but ~~largely~~ to some extent toward the study of the Negro problems & finally the Atlanta Conference would like to feel that it could rely on the teachers of Georgia for prompt careful & intelligent cooperation in spite of the fact that this will cost time trouble & effort. ~~And~~ Indeed only ~~in this way shall we emerge into the day.~~ We as a people are unbelievably waiting for some great movement — some

~~And especially do we want increasing~~ numbers of these young people & use their time in making themselves trained observers & valuable workers

Only by such unpaid & gratuitous efforts shall we ~~fellow teachers~~ emerge into the light. We continually

W2B. DuBois

33-3-132

1.

CASTE IN AMERICA.

There is a wide spread disposition to consider the negro problem as something apart from the life of the nation and extraneous to its other problems. I want in a few words to impress the fact upon you that the negro problems in America today are simply signs of a deeper national problem and not isolated phenomena; that were there not a single black man in this land, the essential character of this basic problem would remain to be settled and settled too, not by refusing to see it and keeping silent about it, but by resolutely attacking it. That problem is the spirit of caste that is arising in a land which was founded on the bed-rock of eternal opposition to class privileges.

32-3-132

2.

That classes should arise in any great and growing nation is perfectly natural and necessary. As long as men differ in gifts and appearance, in likes and dislikes, they will group themselves accordingly. But such class distinctions are very different from the system of class privilege and unchanging caste gradations which ever seeks to build itself on these foundations.

The excuse of caste in the first instance is always the shortcomings or deficiency of other people, but since even the high born are fallible and the low born capable of improvement, the result of a caste system is in the long run simply to enthrone over the destinies of the nation that particular form of immorality most prevalent among the ruling classes of the land.

33-3-139

3

What today then is the character of our national immorality? It is without doubt stealing. The way in which the Sanai thundered command "Thou Shalt not Steal" is broken in this land is enough to make every honest American hide his head in very shame. We have an industrial system by which it is easy and not uncommon for the earnings of thrift, efficiency and genius to be seized and appropriated by the strong, the crafty and the impudent; we have a moral code which allows the theft of truth and the flaunting of bare-faced lies in our newspapers and periodicals without an effective protest from men who consider themselves good. And with this wide-spread moral degeneration staring us in the face, we are faced by unmistakable signs of the growth of caste and class privilege based upon the resulting inequalities of greater social and political power concentrated in the hands of the already powerful. There are to be sure, mighty counteracting forces, a vast spirit of philanthropy and a still sturdy ideal of democracy, and yet none but the willing blind can fail to see a growing half-voiced feeling throughout the country, that individual manhood and desert counts for less today in the land than it used to; that the phrase "upper and lower classes" has begun to mean something among us; that strong and influential groups are coming to view with impatience any sort of education for the young which is not calculated to perpetuate our present social and economic order, and that we have outspoken contempt for such lower races as have not risen to our degree of moral obtrusemess. We are aware throughout the land of growing respect for snobbery. We are discretely silent or even mildly effusive over an open traffic in gilded maidens and foreign titles; we see greater and greater disinclination to remember humble parentage and the dirty finger nails of our grandfathers, and even our great and growing efforts at charity and reform are developing tendencies which make them quite as often agencies ~~of~~ for social separation as means of class obliteration.

33-3-140

4

33-3-141

This is nothing new in the world--it is as old as group life, and for that very reason, none the less dangerous. No sooner does the virus of caste distinction penetrate a nation's vitals than good and evil in that nation comes to be judged from the point of view of the privileged classes alone. Particularly is this altered view-point noticeable in the United States in matters of education. How shall the children of servants be trained? Once we said, as men, now we whisper, as servants and then ~~one~~ we shall have better service. How shall the children of mechanics be trained? As carpenters, we are beginning to think, and then we shall have better houses. This logic seems sound, and it is sound if house service and houses are the objects of national life; but are they? It is perfectly obvious to the mistress that good house service is sadly needed, but is it so obvious to the servant that her life ~~should be sacrificed to the whims of a modern society woman?~~ horizon should be bounded It is true that you want good houses in which to enjoy life, but has the artisan no right to some enjoyment of life outside the privilege of building houses for you? Here lies the eternal danger of class hierarchy and caste--a danger which in the past has ruined lives, overturned governments and buried civilizations. Today this noxious weed is springing up in America, right here in a land founded as a mighty protest against such world-foolishness. It is allowed to grow, but slightly molested, because its victims today are largely black people. But let us not be lulled by this fact into false security. The Negro problem is, ~~as I have said,~~ but the sign of growing class privilege and caste distinction in America and not as some fondly imagine, the cause of it.

Limited to the Comfort of an old woman's brain.

19

33-3-143

20

omit

33-3-144

8

True it is, that in the race problem its growth is most startling and its philosophy least disguised. How shall we train the children of Negroes, this nation long has asked, and to many here today this question was already sufficiently answered before I rose--that is, by industrial and some secondary training. Why? Because the south is a great waste, a land with possibilities scarcely touched, a land calling for human toil and energy. How perfectly obvious to the poor black peasant of Mississippi that he should toil like a slave for board and clothes in order that the young ladies of Des Moines should be neatly dressed? Is it going to the white people of the South & the capitalists of the North that Negro labor should develop this wealth But in it is obvious to solve his problem simply to increase his output of cotton and the efficiency of his work? No! His problem will only be solved as he is led to realize that he is a man, that life holds out to him vast possibilities, and that these possibilities may be reached through the agency of human toil and aspiration.

33-3-145

9

The object of every true system of human training is to impress these truths on the masses of men as rapidly and effectively as possible. This is the higher end of all education and the sole end of the higher training of men in colleges and universities. To deny this training to any class or race of human beings is to deny their essential humanity. And this is precisely what the reactionary leadership of the North, aided, I regret to say, by some good and distinguished ~~men~~ members of this Council -this is exactly what this leadership has for the last ten years been seeking to do. The work of Negro Colleges in the South has been ridiculed and belittled, their necessity doubted, their funds curtailed and their future clouded. The ambition of black boys to rise in the world has come to be regarded as menacing rather than laudable, and the black man today who dares to stand up and demand for his people those same human ~~regrets~~ rights which your fathers demanded for you---aye and by God and my father's black arms at last obtained---the Negro who today demands such rights for his people is being read out of the counsels of the safe and the sane; while aid and comfort is showered on such of us as are willing to out-Herod Herod

33-3-146

10

33-2-142

in reducing the rights and ambitions of ten million men to the privilege of being useful to white ~~folks~~ people

11 And yet the very men who are thus stifling the aspirations of a race and drying up the higher sources of inspiration, are the ones whose surpirse is greatest at the growth of Negro crime, forgetting that the shutting out of the light from above but emphasizes the darkness; ~~he has~~ forgetting that the closing of higher institutions of learning is never accompanied by the closing of lower institutions of depravity and death; that the increase of the cotton crop if unaccompanied by increased intelligence, broader justice and loftier ideals, will simply give unscrupulous landlords an even greater opportunity than they have today of stealing from their black tenants.

33-2-148

Among all the agencies at work for the uplifting of the south, the American Missionary Association ~~alone~~ has from the first taken the most unwavering stand for a system of real education for Negroes. It planted colleges for Negroes upon the very breast works of the struggling armies, before the smoke of battle had cleared

12 and it planted them not as luxuries or experiments, but on the one hand as foundation stones upon which to build a system of common schools and on the other hand, as great gates of opportunity through which the talented and ambitious sons of the freedman might escape from the midnight of slavery into the light.

These institutions and similar ones founded by other agencies, have stood now for a generation--they have sent 2500 ~~well~~ trained graduates into the world, including 1400 teachers; 250 clergymen; 150 physicians and 600 men in the civil service, business and other higher avenues of life. They have directly and indirectly given light, inspiration and ideals to tens of thousands of other menm women and children; they have made industrial schools possible; they have taught the teachers of the public schools and above all, they have stood as a great intelligent force to calm the fears of the multitude, stimulate their striving, restrain their passions and inspire them to buy out of their poverty and in spite of force and fraud, the twelve million acres of American soil which they own today. Notwithstanding all this, there is a persistent attempt in the South, aided by certain elements in the North to establish a new slavery; to erect barriers of color caste; to reduce black labor to such economic serfdom as to be able to use this force as a club to keep white union laborers submissive. The first step toward the accomplishment of this program was to close the doors of college training and higher opportunity in the faces of black boys and to impress upon the race the utter futility of any attempt to escape from the barriers of race contempt and class privilege.

The program which has been so successfully initiated in the south has reacted with telling power on the North. Already there is growing a feeling that certain classes of white children do not need high schools, that ~~good birth~~ social standing ought to bestow certain privileges by a sort of divine right and that the man who wrote the declaration of independence was a fool.

From those false friends who are preaching among American citizens increased race or class segregation. The Good Lord deliver us.

33-3-181

15

Such is the poison that is eating into the vitals of the nation. The relief is obvious. Let us ~~be~~ seek to make this nation honest ~~and~~ tell the truth. Let us resolutely check the granting of special privilege to the rich, the well born or the white. Let us ~~judge~~ class all men by their manhood and not by their color or their bank accounts, and finally let us open to all the gates of opportunity and keep them ~~wide~~ open.

James Oglethorpe

We have at Atlanta University this year a new institution known as the Oglethorpe School. ~~Our~~ We students as well as others often ask: Why is it called Oglethorpe? ~~They~~ We have a more or less dim recollection of James Oglethorpe as the founder of Georgia & yet this but increases the wonder for the history of this state has not meant so much & ~~this state~~ that they are usually disposed & remind themselves unnecessarily of it.

And yet James Oglethorpe is a person toward whom every citizen of Georgia black & white should turn with respect & affection

30-1-91

& especially young people like you ought & know something of his life & motives & deeds. After all there is but one guide in the darkness of life around us — in the shadowy shores of the Unknown & Forgotten that circle us & that is the lives of other men — the lives & experiences of those brothers of ours who have struggled & failed, struggled & triumphed just as we shall do.

30-1-67

James Oglethorpe was born in ~~1689~~ England in 1689. — at the end of that great 17th century that had meant so much to the world — at the beginning of a century that was to mean more.

In the 15th century the world had centered around the Mediterranean sea — here was the middle point of the universe and around "the tideless dolorous Midland sea" ~~the~~ stretched Europe Asia & Africa & the unknown & circling ocean. When came Columbus, bursting the barriers & the mist & discovering a new continent, the knowing of which shifted the world's centre & the Atlantic. During the 16th century this new continent was eagerly explored by Spanish French & English and in the 17th century the English particularly began permanent settlements. But all this must not be read alone but always with a knowledge of what was transpiring in Europe & from the European point of view To be born then as was Oglethorpe in the 17th century meant many things — His father had lived in the declining days of the Stuart kings — Those fierce stubborn men who succeeded Elizabeth & Shakespeare and tried to rule England carelessly.

30-1-68

Ere Oliver Cromwell defeated & beheaded the first Charles, & after ward the second Charles played himself to death & his brother James needed sorely the good arm & fighting qualities of the father of Oglethorpe & de-

30-1-69

30-1-70

Lord him again ~~the~~ William of Orange who came for his throne. It was but a year after William & Mary rose to the throne of England on the ruin of the Stuart kings, that the future father of Georgia was born.

In the swift sweet days of his youth there were stirring scenes in Europe The King of France - The Great Monarch was reaching his grasping hand over the world - seeking to crush little Holland, swallow Belgium, dismember Germany & conquer for Spain. So William of England fought him desperately, doggedly, until one day William fell from his horse & died. And thereupon Queen Anne, his sister-in-law still fought the aged Louis of France

Now the mother of Oglethorpe was as Johnathan Swift tells us cynically "a cunning devil" and a lady of much influence in the court of Queen Anne, and so saw well to the training of her seven children. James was well educated & sent to College where he got a smattering of those things necessary for a gentleman at least to have forgotten, and then he entered the army. ~~From~~ ~~At the~~

At the head of the army was a splended fellow - Prince Eugene of Savoy - the son of a French

30-1-21

Prince & the Niece of Cardinal Mazarin.
Angry with France he had sided with Austria & then had helped England fight the war of Spanish Succession which we know as queen Annes war. With him young Eglethorpe at the age of 15 fought & swaggered over Europe, fighting the French & the Turks and finally coming home & his fathers house & settle down at the age of thirty.

It was a fine old home
he came to — a home still standing. In front rich meadow lands slope gradually & the banks of the River Wey, while behind the ground rises & a sheer height, covered with noble trees, ~~and~~ through which glints the old sleepy town of Godalming"

Now life began in earnest. These first thirty years had been years of training when various paths stretched before the man: young rich educated & a soldier — he might have done many things: fought on in glory and blood through the never ending wars that stretched from the battle of Malplaquet to the battle of Waterloo; or he might have been a rich pleasure seeker, a wine bibber & a libertine after the manner of a day when an English dinner usually ended with all the men dead drunk under the Table, & when the shameless wishes of an English king became an English duchess & founder of one of the greatest of the present families of England.

These & other baths lay open before this man but he turned from them; not from any puritanical spirit of self righteousness, but because other things interested him more. And this is ever the way in the world We rise not by hating the bad but by loving the good.
— not by standing cold & unstimpled before the world, the flesh & the devil, but by finding greater & more absorbing interest in the better side of human life, & the higher ideals of men.

In 1722 James Oglethorpe was elected to Parliament and for thirty years he was a member of that fine old assembly which is the mother of popular government in the modern world. Oglethorpe was not an interesting speaker but when he spoke he had something to say & so people got used to listening to him.

30-1-73

Now if one of you had been young & rich & had gone to Parliament in 1722 I wonder in what you would have chiefly interested? Let's see: George I was on the throne - a sleepy unintelligent German, Sir Robert Walpole was carrying on the government by wholesale bribery; a great speculation in the South Seas had recently failed

& moved thousands; there was continual friction with Spain & Frederick the Great & Maria Theresa were fighting for central Europe — here were questions then of government, position, money & war & interest an interesting young man.
Yet they did not chain him.
On the contrary he became chiefly interested in jails. Now jails in the early 18th century were sad places — worse far worse than the prisons & chain gangs of Georgia & that is saying a great deal.

"At this day we can hardly understand how English law punished alike and thrust into the same dungeon thieves, pirates, murderers, with the man whose crime was debt — debt incurred oftentimes as security for some friend.

30-1-76

The jails of London were a disgrace to humanity. Fever, filth, smallpox, were encountered in common, while inhuman keepers plied thumbscrews and sneered at the sufferings of their prisoners.

"One Mr. Castell, a skilled architect and author ~~of an costly work, The Villas of the Ancients~~, became involved in debt, was arrested, and taken to a 'sponging-house' attached to Fleet Prison. not being able to compromise his debts, nor to satisfy the warden's demand for bribes, he was thrust into a ward in which smallpox was raging. Terrified with fear of the disease, he entreated to be sent elsewhere, even into the jail itself, but in vain. He caught the disease, and soon died, with his last breath charging the warden as his murderer. Castell was well known to Oglethorpe, who at once determined to do his utmost toward putting an end to such national crimes. At the earliest opportunity he brought the subject before Parliament. That body appointed a visiting committee of fourteen members of the House of Commons, with Oglethorpe as chairman.

30-1-77

"They promptly inspected the various prisons and presented their reports; 'the details of some', says a historian, 'were too painful and loathsome to be repeated.' In the Marshalsea's ~~two~~ rooms, not sixteen feet square, were confined forty, and even fifty, human beings. 'The floor not being sufficient for the sleepers, half of them were suspended in hammocks, and so tainted was the atmosphere that they perished for want of fresh air. The sick wards were still worse. Along the walls boards were laid on trestles; under these boards one tier of sick men lay on the floor, on the dresser was another tier, and in the hammocks overhead another tier still. x x x x x x

RL-1-33 + you remember the Marshalsea from Dickens's Little Dorrit — in their low rooms

A day never passed without death; and in spring from eight to ten prisoners died every twenty-four hours. Many well-disposed persons left money for the destitute, but it was confiscated by the jailors. The wardens grew rich on bribes. Investigation proved that one jailor received in this way £25,000 yearly. He it was who loaded Sir William Rich with irons because of a dispute with him. The committee ordered ~~his~~ Rich's release, but on making another visit found him again in chains. Mr. Oglethorpe, as chairman of the committee, reported the matter to Parliament, and the barbarous warden was himself imprisoned.

30-1-79

"Pirates and abandoned ruffians were suffered to mix with the unfortunate debtors. Their conduct became so insufferable that some decent prisoners attempted to escape. They were detected, and the officers made it an excuse for resorting to the thumbscrew, forcing blood from finger-ends.

While Oglethorpe was chairman of this prison investigating committee he had been early about in his mind for means more than temporary of relief for the kind of persons who suffered unjustly not simply in prison but elsewhere. He faced, for the first, the greatest of modern economic problems: the Problem of Poverty. Someone has sagely said that poor people can be divided in three classes: God's Poor, the Devil's poor, & the poor devils. Now Jails are designed for only one of these three classes — namely the devils poor. Those people who will not support themselves because of their own evil ways. For these the state must undertake a system of punishment, the aim of which is the reformation of the criminal — towards Thos Ogle Thorpe's parliamentary committee took some steps.

30-1-83

Another class, God's poor, are the worthy objects of help from their fellow men. This misfortune beyond their control they have lost their means of support & need aid. It is the third class however — the poor devils - who are oftenest forgotten. You cannot cure poverty in this world simply by punishment & almsgiving. There are a large number of people who are not vicious, nor can their poverty be laid to unfortunate accident. They are simply unfitted by character & education to succeed in the battle of life under the given conditions. Either then their character must be changed by education or the conditions of life must be made more favorable. Oglethorpe was impressed by this last necessity and looked about for ~~most~~ a refuge suited to the poor debtor class of England in the 18th century.

And where else should he look for asylum but thither where all the world was then looking — America || Already the outlines of the New World were shaping themselves. The French were in the valley of the St Lawrence & the Shawnees in Mexico & the isles of the sea. The puritans were in Mass.,

30-1-82

the Quakers in Penna., the Catholics in Md. & the Canaliers in Virginia.
Lockes new scheme of government had been tried in Carolina
& there lay between the English
& the Spanish & the South of the Altamaha stretching onward & the Miss. a great fertile tract of Country. The Spanish claimed it & so did the english, & both had sought & settled it but failed and yet it was as Sir Robert Montgomery wrote "the most amiable country in the universe," Oglethorpe obtained a grant of this land in 1732 from George II & immediately appealed for funds || Parliament gave £ 50,000, William

30-1-83

named it Georgia

Penn sent £500 from far off Penna.
& the trustees refused salaries & gave of their private means. Indeed as one historian has said:

30-1-84

"'The benevolent founders of the colony of Georgia may challenge the annals of any nation to produce a design more generous and praiseworthy. They voluntarily offered their money, their labor, and time for promoting what appeared to them the good of others, having nothing for reward but the inexpressible satisfaction arising from virtuous actions.'

"Tracts were now distributed describing the climate and products of the happy land. The poet Waller pictured it a veritable Eden, declaring in his enthusiasm:

Heaven sure hath kept this spot of earth uncurst,
To show how all things were created first.

"The funds raised were to feed, clothe, arm, and transport to Georgia such poor people as they should select from those who offered to go. An account was opened with the Bank of England, where a register was kept of the benefactors and their donations. They also bound themselves to make an annual statement of receipts and expenditures before the Lord Chancellor and chief of the courts. Arrangements being completed, the trustees now announced that they were ready to receive applications from those who wished to emigrate. A committee was appointed to visit the jails and obtain the discharge of such poor prisoners as were worthy, carefully investigating character, circumstances, and antecedents.

30-1-85

Thus was Georgia founded & ~~in January 1733~~ 172 yeas ago last ~~this very~~ month, ~~& on the~~ ~~for from the day of the month~~ 700
Oglethorpe & his first band of Colonists landed ~~& saw the Site of~~ from Savannah Landed in Georgia ~~on~~ the good ship Anne. || The sustaining of the naturally colony was far harder than the founding for three ~~two~~ enemies pressed them: & the earth day the Spaniards & for ten yeas Oglethorpe defended the colony against them. & the next day the Indians & these Oglethorpe subdued by straight forward honesty & courtesy. But the enemy & the North he did not subdue — & subdued him & drove him wrongfully from his beloved colony: & that enemy was Slavery

30-1-86

From the very first Oglethorpe & the trustees had prohibited the slave trade & the importation of rum & the strongest liquors into Georgia, as Oglethorpe himself said "slavery is against the gospel as well as the fundamental laws of England. We resolved as trustees to make a law forever against such a horrid crime"

"This policy greatly displeased the colonists, who from 1735, the date of the first law, to 1749, did not cease to clamor for the repeal of the restrictions. As their English agent said, they insisted that 'in Spite of all Endeavours to disguise this Point, it is as clear as Light itself, that Negroes are as essentially necessary to the Cultivation of Georgia, as Axes, Hoes, or any other Utensil of Agriculture.' Meantime, evasions and infractions of the laws became frequent and notorious Negroes were brought across from Carolina and "hired" for life." Finally, purchases were openly made in Savannah from African traders: some seizures were made by those who opposed the principle, but as a majority of the magistrates were favorable to the introduction of slaves into the province, legal decisions were suspended from time to time, and a strong disposition evidenced by the courts to evade the operation of the law". At last, in 1749, the colonists prevailed on the trustees and the government, and the trade was thrown open ~~under careful restrictions~~." This happened in

30-1-67

~~Slavery was allowed in Ga.~~ ~~in~~ 1739, ~~& three years later~~ ~~Oglethorpe~~ but Oglethorpes active connection with the colony had ceased when he left Georgia in 1743 & in 1752 Georgia became a crown colony & the authority of the trustees ~~ceased~~ was at an end.

30-1-89a

Oglethorpe had spent some $60,000 of his private fortune in founding Ga., which parliament failed to return him; indeed had he not married at the age of 55 a well to-do gentlewoman he ~~would~~ might have himself faced the inside of the debtors jail.

30-1-89b

His retirement life was peaceful ~~and~~ & varied in the main, although he fought against the young pretender and was commend

& opposed the threatened invasion of France in 1744.

His public career ended with his defeat as a candidate for Parliament 1852. Thereafter occasionally he lived at home, as associated with Oliver Goldsmith & Dr Samuel Johnson and other literary men. When the American revolution broke out it is said that Ogilthorpe was offered a place in command of the British troops but refused it; at any rate when John Adams arrived in London as American minister he was invited upon by Ogilthorpe who said "I am come to pay my respects to the first American Ambassador & his family".

For 2 years after the peace he still lived & the great age of 94.95, and ~~then~~ up till then was vigorous & healthy

As Bancroft has said:

The gentleness of Oglethorpe's nature appeared in all his actions. He was merciful to the prisoner; a father to the emigrant; the unwearied friend of Wesley; the constant benefactor of the Moravians; honestly zealous for the conversion of the Indians; working for the negro the panoply of the Gospel. He was, for a commercial age, the representative of that chivalry which knew neither fear nor reproach, and felt a stain on honor like a wound.

31-11-83

Loyal and brave; choleric yet merciful; versed in elegant letters; affable even to talkativeness; slightly boastful and tinged with vanity — he was ever ready to shed blood rather than brook an insult, but more ready to expose life for those who looked to him for defense. A monarchist in the state, friendly to the Church, he seemed like one who had survived his times — like, the relic of a former century and a more chivalrous age — illustrating to the modern world of business what a crowd of virtues and of charities could cluster around the heart of a cavalier."

P8-11-15

[FOLLOWING PAGES MISSING]

Perhaps I can best end this little sketch of his career by quoting from his obituary ~~that~~ as it stands written in Cranham Church England: 97 days

" Near this place lie the remains of James Edward Oglethorpe, Esq.,
× × × × × × × × ×
Founder of the Colony of Georgia; which (Founded on the ardent wish for liberty) Set the noble example of prohibiting the importation of slaves.
× × × × × × × × × ×
In the year in which he quitted England to found this settlement, he nobly strove to restore our true national defences by Sea and Land,
~~a free navy without impressing~~;
~~a constitutional militia~~.
But his ~~sole~~ affections were more enlarged than even the term Patriotism can express.
He was the friend of the oppressed Negro. No part of the world was too remote, no interest too unconnected or too opposed to his own, To prevent his

ST.FRANCIS OF ASSISI.

We have all been recently talking and thinking of San Francisco, that opulent, busy city which one day faced the shining western waters and next fell into poverty, death and ruin because beneath its feet the earth trembled. And then again in its staggering rise has been swept by greed and prejudice, and the throes of its new birth. Such strange catastrophe gives the whole world pause, it is not new, it is old, so old and yet ever and again we need to be reminded that back of the hurrying throbbing life of every city and every day lie the world -old things - birth and death, joy and sorrow, fraud and fear, human love and human hate - that these and these alone make life; and with these each life must deal.

We remember this all the more keenly in the case of San Francisco because of the magic spell of the city's golden history and because of the life of the man after whom this stricken metropolis was named: He stands forth in the world's annals as one of those saints and prophets who sought to read life's riddle and tell the world its true unraveling. San francisco is the Spanish form of the name of St.Francis of Assisi and it is to this life and life teaching that I want to call your attention: tonight; The fullness of his young manhood and his riper years lay in the 13th century. That last great cycle of the Middle Age,700 long years ago. It is hard to picture the life of other years and other centuries, and tyet remember that there lived boys and girls then,throbbing with life as you are,listening and waiting for the call. It was the day of Dante and Philip the Fair;the day when Venice and Genoa were in the first flush of their glory,and the German Hansa towns were building their quaint and beautiful guild halls. All through the world ran the thrill of that restless striving and awakening;then it was that a boy was born in the sweet Italian city of Assisi,in Umbria,perhaps a hundred miles north of Rome. His father, Pietro Bernadone, was a rich merchant trading to France, and while the mother would piously name the boy John, the father proudly called him Francis after his rich and beloved France, and showered his wealth upon him. Wealth then meant even more than wealth means now, and now it means much. Think of a handsome, red-blooded boy, born in the beautiful hills of a beautiful land, surrounded by luxury, pampered by his parents and flattered and bowed down to by all his little world. Accompanied by a crowd of gay young fellows he spent a glorious, roystering youth -fishing for trout and sturgeon in the mountain streams, dancing in the merry Springtime, drinking the clear white wine in Summer and feasting in the red Autumnal days.

4-7-22

422-7-14

Was not this a glorious life? Suppose that before you tonight stretched this glorious vista of wealth and laughter and gay abandon - would you not be perfectly happy? Probably you would. Probably for a time, life would be simply singing as it was for a time with Francis of

41-7-20

Assisi.

After that, however - if you were honest and unselfish, if you opened your clear eyes and looked upon the real world there would come to you as there came to this gay Italian 700 years ago a sense of vague discomfort, of unfilled destiny, of wasted power. There would rise a dim realization of the misery and sorrow of the world on which your strident gayety would fall almost as mockery, as blasphemy.

41-7-231

Not that it would seem wrong to be joyful but rather that your joy alone would not suffice - not that it would be wrong to laugh, but that laughter would not cure all the world's ills, and that the world has ills. Something would be lacking - a great dark void of crying want stretching forth out of the shadowy valley and up the tremulous sides of the great wide hills, crying, till souls must listen, even in their laughter - your soul and mine, the soul of Socrates and Jesus Christ, and the soul of St. Francis of Assisi.

This time of listening - of pausing, of sudden assumption of responsibility we call Commencement - the Beginning of Life. To some of you it ~~comes tonight~~ attaches in this celebration - to others it has come earlier than this ~~formal celebration~~ and still to others it will not come till many years have passed with their messages of warning and enlightenment. To Francis of Assisi it came just in his budding manhood and he paused in astonishment to ask these questions - old and ever new:

What am I? Ane what is this world about me? And this world andI how shall we live together in laughter and work?

So the youth sat him down in the sunshine and pondered - hearing the shouting of his companions afar, dreaming over the faint echo of music and seeing new meaning in ~~the~~ sun and river. What thought came to him? The thought of every awakening young soul. Is life joy? Yes and no - yes, because it is right to be happy and yet - no, because I cannot be happy in the midst of a world full of misery. Is life wealth? Yes and no - yes, because wealth is but that stored and garnered work which ministers to men's wants, and yet - no, because there are human wants and aspirations that no heaped treasure can satisfy. Is life glory and fame yes and no - yes, for fame is the right reward of work well done and yet - no, for much of the world's greatest applause is given for work ill done and undone.

[redacted]

41-2-232

41-7-233

So the boy pondered as all boys ponder -not consciously and clearly, but subtly and half doubtingly. When he faced the gift of joy he threw himself into the mad vortex of delight and then slowly withdrew and looked on the pain and sorrow about him; when he faced the gift of wealth, he tossed away the gold lightly, spending like a prince, wearing his silken hose and velvet doublet, drinking and feasting until he noticed men starving by the roadside. He threw them alms, they seized them and were hungry again and in their dull eyes he saw a greater, deeper hunger - "not alms but a friend!", it cried.

It ~~cried~~. Then he faced the luring glory of fame; and what was fame in the Middle Age but war? He donned the warrior's flashing uniform - he heard the martial music swelling on the olive crowned hills of Umbria - he listened to the tramping of a hundred horsemen as they cried "Long live Assisi - down with Perugia!" Among the singing waters they thundered, drunk with the mad wine of conquest, in that great yellow Italian morning - but at evening they came wandering back. There was blood upon their garments, and the horror of murder in the souls. The damp sharp wind beat mercilessly on the naked misery of a soldier, dying in a wayside ditch, and Francis of Assisi paused and undid the chased and silver buckle of his velvet cloak and lay it gently across the wrtched man. And then all silently he rode into the night.

And that night he turned suddenly, swiftly, as all men turn at the turning points of life, crying "Not by wealth nor by violence but by my spirit, saith the Lord." And he meant by this that the joy of the world was not to be gained by selfishness, not by force but by the broad bonds of human sympathy. And what was true seven hundred years ago - is it no true tonight?

11-7-234

Quaintly and cheerfully he began his life work. "Poverty shall be my bride," he said - poverty and beggary would he wed, and wandering human charity would be his life calling. He gathered a little band about him and thus St.Francis of Assisi became the little brother of the poor, a beggar and an outcast among men, a listener to birds and little children. Nor does all this sound as strange today as it did in the year of our Lord, 1208. We Americans have a certain contempt for the poor and unfortunate, but our attitude toward human misfortune is angelic beside the disdain of the 13th century. Then it was only the wealthy and well-born who were people. Beneath the knot of privileged aristocrats festered the mass of neglected and despised poor, beggars and unfortunates, poor workingmen, cripples, feeble-minded and insane, all too far below the world, the good rich world, for the world to notice. When Francis turned from his idle playing and spending of wealth, and his work of war and faced the bitter misery of the world; when he said: The greatest evil of Italy is Poverty, and I will make the Lady Poverty my bride - his proud father Pietro threw up his hands in horror and disgust. "Fool" he cried "to give up wealth, position and fame for a crazy cause - you are no son of mine." But Francis crossed his breast and cried "Pietro, Pietro Bernadone until now I have called you father but henceforth I can truly say with these "Our Father who art in heaven," for he is my wealth and hope. Out in the world then he wandered alone. His friends wagged their heads and laughed, as some friends will, but his mother waited. And then, not suddenly and triumphantly; but slowly in weary years and sickening strife, after defeat and ridicule, persecution and doubt, came the new deep revelation. Along the dusty Italian roads moved rough clad silent men, gentle of speech, preaching Peace and Patience, tending the wounded, relieving the distressed and reclaiming the erring. It was the first great mediaeval effort at social reform, at organized charity, at the work of the visiting nurse. It was the first great recognition in the Middle Age of the abject misery of the masses of men, the first listening to the wretched cry of outcast humanity.

41-7-235

11-7-29

41-7-237

The pebble thrown widened in ever circling waves of good until the beggar of 1208 stood at the head of the vast movement which swept the Christian world, dashed its spray on the strongholds of Mohammed, and has lived even to our day. So St. Francis grew to busy, blameless, gentle life the friend of birds and living things, the helper of the poor and needy, a homeless wanderer, yet standing ~~between~~ before kings and the mighty of the earth; until after less than 50 years of life he found eternal rest on the vine-clad bosom of the Appenines, and the marks of the sorrows of God, rested on his hands and heart.

Why have I brought you this old fashioned tale of the life of a mediaeval saint? Century after century has rolled by since his dust crumbled and floated in the mists that hover on the head waters of the Arno and Tiber. The world has changed in [redacted] hastening, hurrying hungry whirl of weal and woe -Why should we look backward rather than forward for our guiding star?

I have brought this life back to your memory to fix in your minds a certain attitude toward wealth and distinction, and the need and place of human training to emphasize this attitude. The lesson of the life of St. Francis of Assisi is not [redacted] the renunciation of wealth, [redacted] and the deification of poverty. It is on the contrary simply this great truth: The work of the world is to satisfy the world's great wants. Now the world wants material wealth, such as food and clothing and shelter, but this is not all, nor even [redacted]

51-7-237 a

the greater part of its need. It wants human service and human sympathy, it wants knowledge and inspiration, it wants hope and truth and beauty, and so great are these greater wants that often their satisfaction demands in some St. Francis of Assisi an utter renunciation of much of the material good of the world, that its spiritual starvation may be satisfied. In the 13th century this was peculiarly true. So poverty stricken was the world in simple human goodness that it actually needed this more than it needed food and clothes, and to this need a brave unselfish man addressed himself. Today, in the 20th century the world is rich in material resources and richer too than ever before in spiritual content. And yet even today we are not so wealthy in human sympathy that we can turn our attention wholly to material wealth and neglect the greater wants of the world-soul. On the contrary, our very excess of material accumulation and deftness of process is additional reason for increased attention toward making men more intelligent, more unselfish and more broadly human.

41-7-238

Thus is it not clear that with all the change in time and circumstances there remains the same old questions of attitude toward life. What am I, and what is the world, and this world and I, how shall we laugh and work together?

Ever in this questioning the old human drama is acted again and again, on the hard grey bosom of the earth. Ever the joyous youth arises in the great dim morning of life and sees the golden lure of endless joy and wealth beckoning on the horizon.

Ever the blood of the growing man hears the wild trumpet blast of deeds and fame, and ever then in life's commencement comes the still small voice of wisdom "Not by wealth nor by violence but by my spirit saith the Lord." This was the history of St. Francis of Assisi and this will be your history, my young friends. And for this reason I am asking you to pause tonight and listen to the old story and learn the life lesson it contains.

VI-7-239

It will be full easy let me repeat to misinterpret such a history; to tell you that joy has no part in life, that wealth is merely temptation, that fame is mockery and that only ~~xnly~~ by total renunciation can come the real good of living. Yet this would be wrong - this is untrue, and least of all does the life of St. Francis teach this contradiction to life. Rather this life emphasizes the beauty and joy of living, but not simply for ourselves rather for all men, his life emphasizes the ~~fxnx~~ need and use of work and wealth but it also emphasizes the fact that material wealth satisfies only a part of life's want and that it may be necessary to sacrifice a part or even the larger part of material well-being for the advancement of science and humanity. Indeed at all time human life must be a balancing of limited means against infinite ends, and while all these objects are desirable yet some are more desirable than others, and the poverty of human energies and resources forces us always to choose the more weighty and important and let the others wait. In St. Francis's day this choosing left him in direct physical poverty. In our day this is not necessary and yet the choosing of the greater needs of life today by any individual and any nation precludes all thought of great individual wealth, for material wealth is not man's sole aim but rather wealth of mind and soul as well as of body should be his ambition; and finally the life of St. Francis shows that true fame - the only fame worth having and striving for is the "Well done" of the master who knows the sweat of the toil and the worth of the service.

41-7-240

Such is the lesson which in a thousand places the world is seeking to teach its children, and this is the true object of the ~~public school~~ Educational system whose fruition and celebration you ~~and the throng of~~ your friends represent tonight,

427-11

Put thus in terse and concrete meaning, what does the 20th century demand of the youth who standing at the threshold ~~and consciousness~~ of life, wish to do for their world something of the work that St. Francis did for his?

It demands, I take it, four great things:

Ambition or Force

Ideal or Object

Renunciation or Unselfishness

Technique or Work.

First of all it demands ambition - the striving within your souls of every latent power of doing, of all the slumbering fire, - the quickening of muscle and stretching of sinew, and the burning, scintillating flash of brain - the whole massed might of this wonderful human machine alert, panting instinct with holy zeal to hurl its self into the world's work. That was the thing with which Francis of Assisi started; the fiery impulse, the joyous enthusiasm, the unshaken determination to make life tell for its utmost in spite of the contempt and mocking of men or the machinations of the devil - that is the spirit that must animate you, young men and women, as you step forth into the world ~~tonight.~~ I mean, too, by ambition not the mere desire for success - not the mere following up of successful endeavor, any fool can have that. put I mean grim grit - tenacious bulldog courage to face defeat and disappointment and still aspire. That defiant attitude toward the ills of life that Henley sang of when he cried:

11-7-24

Out of the night that covers me
Black as the pit from pole to pole,
I thank whatever God's may be
For my unconquerable soul.

In the fell clutch of circumstance
I have not winced or cried aloud,

41-7-243

Under the bludgeonings of chance
My head is bloody but unbowed.

It matters not how straight the gate,
How charged with punishments the scroll,
I am the master of my fate,
I am the captain of my soul.

This dynamic power is the first demand of modern life, but alone this power is dangerous. It is the bridled charger stamping at the portcullis and chafing his bit - it is thw armoured warrior gleaming in the morning sun, twisting and twirling his spear, but at the sight, the world trembles and cries whither -to murder or rescue, to good or bad, to life or death?

So tremulous with balanced possibilities of good and evil is ambitious youth at this life crisis that many good people at times half cry out against ambition, half preferring lifeless, nerveless, unawakened mediocrity

to the stirrings of such infinite power as may, to be sure, knock at the gate of Heaven and may just as surely rattle the doorposts of hell. These days ~~of Commencement my children,~~ in a few weeks are the days when you may begin the greater life, and they are days when you may start in the paths that lead to crime and debauchery and the never ending throng of unlearned dead. This is the reson that in later years we hear to little said to Negro youth of ambition power, unconquerable resolve. Men fear you and some fear lest, with the might of power of manhood you may fail, and some, I shame to say, fear lest you may succeed. But I do not fear you because I know you. I know that being but human some of you must needs fail and the very force of your energy drive you downward, but I know too that most of you will not fail but will triumph with the triumph of ten million.

The great efficient cause of this triumph when it comes will be your education. Life is not learned at a leap. This world is too old and complicated to be known by sudden inspiration. For this reason we educate children;for this reason,the state seeks to give its future citizens the knowledge of the Tree of Life,lest in the ~~evening~~ evening they see the flaming of the sword of death.

54-7-11

But what does this education teach or essay to teach? It seeks to teach the other three of the four things mentioned:

1. The ideals toward which civilization strives.
2. The good which can today be done.
3. The technical method by which each one can help do this work.

Or as I have said:Ideal - that "one far off divine event toward which the whole creation moves;"renunciation,which but means the choice of the best possible good for all out of the infinite desirable; and finally the beat actual method of doing your share. Thus stated the work of an educational system seems easy and clear and it would be if the ideal were fixed and unchangeable,the duty of renunciation clear and undoubted,and the ~~technical~~ technique of life always the same. But this is far from true. Life is flux and change. Ideals rise, expand and grow, the choice of the better among the good is the most bafflingof life's dark problems; and with every changing want, invention, and discovery, the technique of industry and work changes.

Thus the educational system has within itself eternal conflict it can never be final, it can only continually hold clear its vast aim to teach children the greater goals toward which men are striving, to teach them what of these are at present attainable, and then to give to mind and hand such training as shall make them efficient heplers in the world's work of attaining these goods.

In the working out of the details there must ever be thought, controversy and often dispute.

I doubt not that many of my younger hearers and not a few of the older ones have been sorely puzzled in these later days as to the true

aim and method as were Pietro the father, and Francis the son, 700 years ago.. On the one hand come those educators and seers crying "Hitch your wagon to a star" and on the other hand come the business men and arti sans syaing "learn by doing - earn a living". Now it does not settle the real conflict of thoight and aim her expressed by assuming that there are but two sides of the same advice. They may be and they may not be. Given a St.Francis with holy zeal to relieve the wretchedness of outcast humanity and it were the essence of wisdom to cry in his ear: Learn by doing - succor the first beggar that crosses your path, systematize your work, so that your followers may live and earn their living at this work. On the other hand given a Francis, son of Pietro, whose ideal of life was selfishly to display his wealth and fight and carouse, to tell him to learn by doing and earn that sort of living would be to send him to the devil as fast as money could pay the bills. So today, given young black men with the dynamic of ambition and add to this an education which on the one hand gives them ideals of human service and manly renunciation, and on the other hand teach them the world's experience and the technique of modern industry - given these things you have a perfect system of training. But given young boys and girls of your age starting out with the idea that the chief object of living is to gain as much cash and personal applause as can be gotten without serious infraction of the criminal code - to add an ever so thorough a knowledge of the technique of modern industry to such low and perverted ideals is to disgrace the righteous ambition of a people and ruin the hope of the Negro race.

41-7-248

So long as the world consists of the fortunate and unfortunate, the weaker and the stronger, the rich and the poor, true human service will involve ideal and renunciation. If you really have at heart the good of the world you simply cannot give your whole time and energy to the selfish seeking of your personal good. If you wish the Negro race to become honest, intelligent and rich, you cannot make the accumulation of wealth for yourself the sole object of your education and life. The object of St.Francis of Assisi was not to make the world poorer by his poverty but richer. No doctrine of universal selfishness will ever reform society and lift men to the highest plane,simply because the world is too full of careless unfortunates and incompetent and vicious souls. While you are confining yourself to the work of selfishly raising yourself,these forces are dragging down a dozen of your neighbors and children. You must be your brother's keeper as well as your own,or your brother will drag you and yours down to his ruin.

25-7-14

The life of St.Francis teaches us then that renunciation is the inevitable first payment for healthy social uplift;not renunciation to poverty such as the 13th century demanded for the 20th century is placing ~~plainly~~ physical poverty in the back ground, but certainly today among us a renunciation of dreams of great wealth and instead of contentment with humble means, along with deep unselfish devotion to a splendid cause. This is the equipment which is needed today as sadly and pressingly as in any century of the Middle Age.

41-7-251

On the other hand the further the world goes on its journey of civilization the greater the need of specialization and technique -men must know hoe to do the world's work. They must have the specialized skill,knowledge and insight to,do a practical piece of the labor well. The skilled artisan approaches today the inspired artist and both in common strive and sweat and toil. For what? For so much a day? No,for the glory of their handicraft,for the good their work does the human beings whose welfare is their welfare. Their bride is not Poverty but Carpentry or Painting or Weariness or Pain,and their reward is the reward of St.Francis,a better, truer,richer world.

Thus the work of the public school is not on the one hand to fire aimless ambition without sound ideals;not to inspire human hearts with a vision of the true,the good and the beautiful,without pointing the practical way of realizing some of these dreams here and now in their own lives; not to imagine on the one hand that Desire and Knowledge alone will lift a race out of poverty and weakness, nor dream on the other hand that infinite skill with hammer or hoe will ever lead a man to do that which his native ambition and educated aspiration do not inspire him to do; remembering that in the colored schools particularly that great as is the need of a new race for technical skill and efficiency, there is even greater need for the lifting and training of the racial consciousness in knowledge and inspiration, renunciation and ideal.

41-7-252

I trust then young men and women that the years of training which ~~these~~ this ~~public~~ schools ~~have~~ has given you ~~freely~~, with ~~vast~~ great expenditure of ~~treasure~~ money and human energy ~~have~~ has placed you tonight on that great vantage ground where the burning ambition of your youth has been, on the one hand, inspired by ideals as broad and human as those that inspired St. Francis of Assisi, and has on the other hand taught you something of the actual technique of living and earning a living. If this is true then it remains for me only to greet you and cry God speed.

41-7-253

The carreere you enter will be builded of interlaced joy and sorrow, shade and shine, and although shadow-hands from other worlds will join in that building yet in your own hands will the major part of the making of your lives lie. Build well. Build stubbornly and doggedly, build carefully and painfully with skilled technique but above all build by some large and worthy plan. Face defeat as cheerfully as triumph. Face success as coolly as defeat. Face anything that comes and then not only here tonight but there in the mists of God's great morning, when his darker children bring their hard-won triumphs up from the Gates of Despair and the Vally of the Shadow of Death, lay your laurels not on your own heads but at the feet of those mothers and fathers who have nurtured you and toiled for you and smoothed the way of your life with their own grey hairs and tears - with their own life-blood.

41-7-254

As it was the great object of St.Francis of Assisi to bring peace and succor to the down trodden of his day - let it be your highest ambition to be able one day to say to this heart hurt and weary mother race of ours:

"Thy sun shall no more go down,
Neither shall thy moon withdraw itself;
For the Lord shall be thine everlasting light,
And the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI.

--(*)--

We have all been recently talking and thinking of San Francisco, that opulent, busy city which one day faced the shining western waters and next fell into poverty, death, and ruin because beneath its feet the earth trembled. And then again in its staggering rise has been swept by greed and prejudice, and the throes of its new birth. Such strange catastrophe gives the whole world pause; it is not new, it is old, so old and yet e ever and again we need to be reminded that back of the hurrying throbbing life of every city and every day lie the world-old things - birth and death, joy and sorrow, fraud and fear, human love and human hate - that these and these alone make life; and with these each life must deal.

We remember this all the more keenly in the case of San Francisco because of the magic spell of the city's golden history and because of the life of the man after whom this stricken metropolis was named: He stands forth in the world's annals as one of those saints and prophets who sought to read life's riddle and tell the world its true unraveling. San Francisco is the Spanish form of the name of St. Francis of Assisi and it is to this life and life teaching that I want to call your attention tonight; the fullness of his young manhood and his riper years lay in the 13th Century: That last great cycle of the Middle Age, seven hundred long years ago. It is hard to picture the life of other years and other centuries, and yet remember that there lived boys and girlds then, throbbing with life as you are, listening and waiting for the call. It was the day of Dante and

and Phillip the Fair; the day when Venice and Genoa were in the first flush of their glory, and the German Hansa towns were building their quaint and beautiful halls. All through the world ran the thrill of that restless striving and awakening; then it was that a boy was born in the sóet Italian city of Assisi, in Umbria, perhaps a hundred miles north of Rome. His father, Pietro Bernadone, was a rich merchant trading to France, and while the mother would piously name the boy John, the father proudly called him Francis after his rich and beloved France , and showered his wealth upon him. Wealth then meant even more than wealth means now, and now it means much. Think of a handsome, red-blooded boy, born in the beautiful hills of a beautiful land, surrounded by luxury, pampered by his parents, and flattered and bowed down to by all his little world. Accompanied by a crowd of gay young fellows he spent a glorious, roystering youth, fishing for trout and sturgeon in the mountain streams, dancing in the merry Springtime, drinking the clear white wine in Summer and feasting in the red Autumnal days.

Was not this a glorious life? Suppose that before you tonight stretched this glorious vista of wealth and laughter and gay abandon, would you not be perfectly happy? Probably you would. Probably for a time, life would be simply singing as it was for a time with Francis of Assisi.

After that, however, if you were honest and unselfish, if you opened your clear eyes and looked upon the real world there would come to you as there came to this gay Italian seven hundred years ago a sense of vague discomfort, of unfilled destiny, of wasted power. There would rise a dim realization of the misery and sorrow of the world on which your strident gayety would fall almost as mockery, as blasphemy. Not that it would seem wrong to be joyful but rather that your joy alone would not suffice; not that it would be wrong to laugh, but that laughter would not cure all the world's ills, and that the World has ills. Something would be lacking;-a great dark void of crying want stretching forth out of the shadowy valley and up the tremulous sides of the great wide hills, crying till souls must listen, even in their laughter, your soul and mine, the soul of Socrates and Jesus Christ, and the soul of St. Francis of Assisi.

This time of listening, of pausing, of sudden assumption of responsibility we call Commencement - the Beginning of Life. To some of you it approaches in this celebration, to others it has come earlier than this and still ot others it will not come till many years have passed with their messages of warning and enlightenment. To Francis of Assisi it came just in his budding manhood and he paused in astonishment to ask these questions, old and ever new: What am I? And what is this world about me? And this world and I , how shall we live together in laughter and work?

So the youth sat him down in the sunshine and pondered, hearing the shouting of his companions afar, dreaming over the faint echo of music and seeing new meaning in sun and river. What thought came to him? The thought of every awakening young soul. Is life Joy? Yes and No. Yes because it is right to be happy and yet, No, because I cannotbe happy in the midst of a world full of misery. Is life Wealth? Yes and No. Yes, because wealth is but that stored and garnered work which ministers to men's wants, and yet, No, because there are human wants and aspirations that no heaped treasure can satisfy. Is life Glory and Fame? Yes and No. Yes, for fame is the right reward of work well done and yet , No, for much of the world's greatest applause is given for work ill done and undone.

So the boy pondered as all boys ponder, not consciously and clearly but subtly and half-doubtingly. When he faced the gift of joy he threw himself into the mad vortex of delight and then slowly withdrew and looked on the pain and sorrow about him; when he faced the gift of wealth he tossed away the gold lightly, spending like a prince, wearing his silken hose and velvet doublet, drinking and feasting until he noticed men starving by the roadside. He threw them alms, they seized them and were hungry again and intheir dull eyes he saw a greater, deeper hunger ; "Not alms buta friend!" , it cried. Then he faced the luring glory of fame; and what was fame in the Middle Age but war? He donned the warrior's flashing uniform; he heard the martial music swelling on the olive crowned hills of Umbria; he listened to the tramping of a hundred horsemen as they cried, "Long live Assisi, down with Perugia!" Among the singing waters they thundered , drunk with the mad wine of conquest, in that great yellow Italian morning, but at evening they came wandering back. There was blood upon their garments, and the horror of murder in their souls. The damp sharp wind beat mercilessly on the naked misery of a soldier dying in a wayside ditch, and Francis of Assisi paused and undid the chased and silver buckle of his velvet cloak and lay it gently across the wretched man; and then all silently he rode into the night. And that night he turned suddenly, swiftly, as all men turn at the turning points of life, crying, "Noth wealth nor by violence but by my spirit, saith the Lord." And he meant by this that the joy of the world was not to be gained by selfishness, not by force but by the broad bonds of human sympathy. And what was true seven hundred years ago is it not true tonight?

41-7-258

Quaintly and cheerfully he began his life work. "Poverty" shall be my bride," he said. Poverty and beggary would he wed, and wandering human charity would be his first calling. He gathered a little band about him and thus St. Francis of Assisi became the little brother of the poor, a beggar and an outcast among men, a listener to birds and little children. Nor does all this sound as strange today as it did in the year of our Lord 1208. We Americans have a certain contempt for the poor and unfortunate, but our attitude toward human misfortune is angelic beside the disdain of the 13th Century. Then it was only the wealthy and well-born who were people. Beneath the knot of privileged aristocrats festered the mass of neglected and despised poor - beggars and unfortunates, poor workingmen, cripples, feeble-minded and insane, all too far below the world, the good rich world, for the world to notice. When Francis turned from his idle playing and spending of wealth and his work of war and faced the bitter misery of the world; when he said "the greatest evil of Italy is Poverty, and I will make the Lady Poverty my bride", his proud father Pietro threw up his hands in horror and disgust. "Fool, he cried, "to give up wealth, position and fame for a crazy cause; you are no son of mine." But Francis crossed his breast and cried, "Pietro, Pietro Bernadone, until now I have called you father but henceforth I can truly say with these, 'Our Father who art in heaven", for he is my wealth and hope." Out in the world then he wandered alone. His friends wagged their heads and laughed, as some friends will, but his mother waited. And then, not suddenly and triumphantly, but slowly, in weary years and sickening strife, after defeat and ridicule, persecution and doubt, came the new deep revelation. Along the dusty Italian roads moved rough-clad silent men, gentle of speech, preaching Peace and Patience, tending the wounded, relieving the distressed and reclaiming the erring. It was the first great mediaeval effort at social reform, at organized charity, at the work of the visiting nurse. It was the first great recognition in the Middle Age of the abject misery of the masses of men, the first listening to the wretched cry of outcast humanity.

The pebble thrown widened in ever circling waves of good until the beggar of 1208 stood at the head of the vast movement which swept the Christian world, dashed its spray on the strongholds of Mohammed, and has lived even to our day. So St. Francis grew to busy, blameless, gentle life; the friend of birds and living things, the helper of the poor and needy; a homeless wanderer, yet standing before kings and the mighty of the earth, until le s than fifty years of life he found eternal rest on the vine-clad bosom of the Appenines, and the marks of the sorrows of God rested on his hands and heart.

Why have I brought you this old fashioned tale of the life of a mediaeval saint? Century after century has rolled by since his dust crumbled and floated in the mists that hover on the head waters of the Arno and Tiber. The world has changed in hastening, hurrying, hungry whirl of weal and woe. Why should we look backward rather than forward for our guiding star?

I have brought this life back to your memory to fix in your minds a certain attitude toward wealth and distinction, and the need and place of human training to emphasize this attitude. The lesson of the life of St. Francis of Assisi is not the renunciation of wealth and the deification of poverty; it is on the contrary simply this great truth: the work of the world is to satisfy the world's wants. Now the world wants material wealth, such as food and clothing and shelter, but this is not all, nor even the greater part of its need; it wants human service and human sympathy, it wants knowledge and inspiration, it wants hope and truth and beauty, and so great are these greater wants that often their satisfaction demands in some St. Francis of Assisi an utter renunciation of much of the material good of the world, that its spiritual starvation may be satisfied. In the 13th Century this was peculiarly true. So poverty stricken was the world in simple human goodness that it actually needed this more than it needed food and clothes, and to this need a brave unselfish man addressed himself. Today, it the 20th Century, the world is rich in material resources and richer too than ever before in spiritual content. And yet even today we are not so wealthy in human sympathy that we can turn our attention wholly to material wealth and neglect the greater wants of the world-soul. On the contrary, our very excess of material accumulation and deftness of process is additional reason for increased attention toward making men more intelligent, more unselfish and more broadly human.

41-7-261

Thus is it not clear that with all the change in time and circumstances there remain thesame old questions of attitude toward life. What am I? And what is the world? And this world and I, how shall we laugh and work together?

Ever in this questioning the old human drama is acted again and again, on the hard grey bosom of the earth. Ever the joyous

41-7-262

youth arises in the great dim morning of life and sees the golden lure of endless joy and wealth beckoning on the horizon; ever the blood of the growing man hears the wild trumpet blast of deeds and fame, and ever then in life's commencement comes the still small voice of wisdom "Not by wealth nor by violence but by my spirity saith the Lord." This was the history of St. Francis of Assisi and this will be your history, my young friends. And for this reason I am asking you to pause tonight and listen to the old story and learn the life lesson it contains.

It will be quite easy, let me repeat, to misinterpret such a history; to tell you that joy has no part in life, that wealth is merely temptation, that fame is mockery and that only by total renunciation can come the real good of living. Yet this would be wrong; this is untrue, and least of all does the life of St. Francis teach this contradiction of life. Rather this life emphasizes the beauty and joy of living, but not simply for ourselves rather for all men, his life emphasizes the need and use of work and wealth but it also emphasizes the fact that material wealth satisfies only a part of life's want and that it may be necessary to sacrifice a part or even the larger part of material well-being for the advancement of science and humanity. Indeed at all time human life must be a balancing of limited means against infinite ends, and while all these objects are desirable yet some are more desirable than others, and the poverty of human energies and resources forces us always to choose the more weighty and important and let the others wait. In St. Francis's day this choosing left him in direst physical poverty. In our day this is not necessary and yet the choosing of the greater needs of life today by an individual and any nation precludes all the thought of great individual wealth, for material wealth is not man's sole aim but rahter wealth of mind and soul as well as of body should be his ambition; and finally the life of St. Francis shows that true fame, the only fame worth having and striving for is the "Well done" of the master who knows the sweat of the toil and worth of the service.

Such is the lesson which in a thousand places the world is seeking to teach its children, and this is the true object of the educational system whose fruition and celebration you and your friends represent tonight.

But thus in terse and concrete meaning, what does the 20th Century demand of the yourth who, standing at the threshold of life, wish to do for their world something of the work that St. Francis did for his? It demands, I take it, four great things: Ambition or Force, Ideal or Object, Renunciation or Unselfishness, Technique or Work.

41-7-268

First of all it demands ambition- the striving within your soul of every latent power of doing, of all the slumbering fire, the quickening of muscle and stretching of sinew and the burning, scintillating flash of brain, the whole massed might of this wonderful human machine alert, panting, instinct with holy zeal to hurl itself into the world's work. That was the thing with which Francis of Assisi started: the fiery impulse, the joyous enthusiasm, the unshaken determination to make life tell for its utmost in spite of the contempt and mocking of men or the machinations of the devil. That is the spirit that must animate you, young men and women as you step forth into the world. I mean, too, by ambition not the mere desire for success, not the following up of successful endeavor; any fool can have that. But I mean grim grit, tenacious bull-dog courage to face defeat and disappointment and still aspire. That defiant attitude toward the ills of life that Henley sang of when he cried:

> Out of the night that covers me
> Black as the pit from pole to pole,
> I thank whatever God's may be
> For my unconquerable soul.
>
> In the fell clutch of circumstance
> I have not winced or cried aloud,
> Under the bludgeonings of chance
> My head is bloody but unbowed.
>
> It matters not how straight the gate,
> How charged with punishments the scroll,
> I am the master of my fate,
> I am the captain of my soul.

This dynamic power is the first demand of modern life, but alone this power is dangerous. It is the bridled charger stamping at the portcullis and chafing his bit; it is the armoured warrior gleaming in the morning sun, twisting and twirling his spear, but at the sight, the world trembles and cries, "Whither, to murder or rescue, to good or bad, to life or death?"

So tremulous with balanced possibilities of good and evil is ambitious youth at this life crisis that many good people at times half cry out against ambition, half preferring lifeless, nerveless, unawakened mediocrity to the stirrings of such infinite power as may, to be sure, knock at the gate of Heaven, and may just as surely rattle the doorposts of Hell. These days are the days when in a few weeks you may begin the greater life, and they are days when you may start in the paths that lead to crime and debauchery and the never ending throng of hearsed dead. This is the reason that in later years we hear so little said to Negro youth of ambition, power, and unconquerable resolve. Men fear you and some fear lest with the might of power of manhood you may

41-7-264

fail, and some, I shame to say, fear lest you may succeed. But I do not fear you because I know you. I know that being but human some of you must needs fail and the very force of your energy drive you downward, but I know too that most of you will not fail but will triumph with the triumph of ten million.

The great efficient cause of this triumph when it comes will be your education. Life is not learned at a leap. This world is too old and complicated to be known by sudden inspiration. For this reason we educate children; for this reason the state seeks to give its future citizens the knowledge of the Tree of Life, lest in the evening they see the flaming of the sword of death.

But what does this education teach or essay to teach? It seeks to teach the other three of the four things mentioned: 1. The ideals toward which civilization strives. 2. The good which can today be done. 3. The technical method by which each one can help do this work. Or, as I have said, Ideal, that "one far off divine event toward which the whole creation moves; Renunciation, which but means the choice of the best possible good for all out of the infinite desirable; and finally, the best actual method of doing your share. Thus stated the work of an educational system seems easy and clear and it would be if the ideal were fixed and unchangeable, the duty of renunciation clear and undoubted, and the technique of life always the same. But this is far from true. Life is flux and changes. Ideals rise, expand and grow, and the choice of the better among the good is the most baffling of life's dark problems; and with every changing want, invention and discovery, the technique of industry and work changes.

41-7-265

Thus the educational system has within itself eternal conflict, it can never be final, it can only continually hold clear its vast aim to teach children the greater goals toward which men are striving, to teach them what of these are at present attainable, and then to give to mind and hand such training as shall make them efficient helpers in the world's work of attaining these goods.

In the working out of the details there must ever be thought, controversy and often dispute.

I doubt not that many of my younger hearers and not a few of the older ones have been sorely puzzled in these later days as to the true aim and method of education, as were Pietro the father and Francis the son seven hundred years ago. On the one hand come those educators and seers crying, "Hitch your wagon to a star", and on the other hand come the business men and artisans saying, "learn by doing; earn a living". Now it does not settle the real conflict of thought and aim here expressed by assuming that there are but two sides of the same device. They may be and they may not be. Given a St. Francis with holy zeal to relieve the wretchedness of outcast humanity and it were the essence of wisdom to cry in his ear: Learn by doing; succor the first beggar that crosses your path; systematize your work, so that your followers may live and earn their living at this work. On the other hand, given a Francis son of Pietro, whose ideal of life was selfishly to display his wealth and fight and carouse, to tell him to learn by doing and earn that sort of living would be to send him to the devil as fast as money could pay the bills. So today, given young black men with the dynamic of ambition and add to this an education which on the one hand gives them ideals of human service and manly renunciation, and on the other teaches them something of the world's experience and the technique of modern industry, given these things you have a perfect system of training. But given young men and women of your age starting out with the idea that the chief object of living is to gain as much cash and personal applause as can be gotten without serious infraction of the criminal code, to add an ever so thorough a knowledge of the technique of modern industry to such low and perverted ideals is to disgrace the righteous ambition of a people and ruin the hope of the Negro race.

41-7-266

So long as the world consists of the fortunate and unfortunate, the weaker and the stronger, the rich and the poor, true human service will involve ideal and renunciation. If you really have at heart the good of the world, you simply cannot give your whole time and energy to the selfish seeking of your personal good. If you wish the Negro race to become honest, intelligent and rich, you cannot make the accumulation of wealth for yourself the sole object of your education and life. The object of St. Francis of Assisi was not to make the world poorer by his poverty but richer. No doctrine of universal selfishness will ever reform society and lift men to the highest plane, simply because the world is too full of careless unfortunates and incompetent vicious souls. While you are confining yourself to the work of selfishly raising yourself, these forces are dragging down a dozen of your neighbors and children. You must be your brother's keeper as well as your own, or your brother will drag you and yours down to his ruin.

The life of St. Francis teaches us then, that renunciation is the inevitable first payment for healthy social uplift, not renunciation to poverty such as the 15th Century demanded for the 20th Century is placing physical poverty in the back-ground, but certainly today among us a renunciation of dreams of great wealth and instead of contentment with humble means, along with deep unselfish devotion to a splendid cause. This is the equipment which is needed today as sadly and pressingly as in any century of the Middle Age.

41-7-208

On the other hand, the further the world goes on its journey of civilization the greater the need of specialization and technique - men must know how to do the world's work. They must have the specialized skill, knowledge and insight to do a practical piece of the labor well. The skilled artisan approaches today the inspired artist and both in common strive and sweat and toil. For what? For so much a day? No, for the glory of their handicraft, for the good their work does the human beings whose welfare is their own welfare. Their bride is not Poverty but Carpentry or Painting or Weariness or Pain, and their reward is the reward of St. Francis - a better , truer, richer world.

Thus the work of the public school is not on the one hand to fire aimless ambition without sound ideals; not to inspire human hearts with a vision of the true, the good and the beautiful without pointing the practical way of realizing some of these dreams here and now in their own lives; not to imagine on the one hand that Desire and Knowledge alone will lift a race out of poverty and weakness, nor dream on the other hand that infinite skill with hammer or hoe will ever lead a man to do that which his native ambition and educated aspiration do not inspire him to do; remembering that in the colored schools particularly that great as is the need of a new race for technical skill and efficiency, there is even greater need for the lifting and training of the racial consciousness in knowledge and inspiration, renunciation and ideal.

I trust then, young men and women that the years of training which this school has given you with great expenditure of money and human energy has placed you tonight on that great vantage ground where the burning ambition of your youth has been, on the one hand, inspired by ideals as Broad and human as those that inspired St. Francis of Assisi, and has on the other hand taught you something of the actual technique of living and earning a living. If this is true then it remains for me only to greet you and cry God speed.

The careers you enter will be builded of interlaced joy and sorrow, shade and shine, and although shadow-hands from other worlds will join in that building yet in your own hands will the major part of the making of your lives lie. Build well. Build stubbornly and doggedly, build carefully and painfully with skilled technique, but above all build by some large and worthy plan. Face defeat as cheerfully as triumph. Face success as coolly as defeat. Face anything that comes and then not only here tonight but there in the mists of God'd great morning, when his darker children bring their hard-won triumphs up from the Gates of Despair and the Valley of the Shadow of Death, lay your laurels not on your own heads but at the feet of those mothers and fathers who have nurtured you and toiled for you and smoothed the way of your life with their own grey hairs and tears - with their own life-blood.

41-7-270

As it was the great object of St. Francis of Assisi to bring peace and succor to the down-trodden of his day, let it be your highest ambition to be able one day to say to this heart-hurt and weary mother race of ours:

"Thy sun shall notmore go down,
Neither shall thy moon withdraw itself;
For the Lord shall be thine everlasting light,
And the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

----oooOO(*)OOooo----

1906 1907

GALILEO GALILEI

The man whom we know as Galileo was born in 1564 and died in 1642, born just after Elizabeth of England ascended the throne and died as the Thrity Year's War was about to end; and yet this tells us little until we understand the meaning of the Age in which he lived -- the waning 16th and the dawning 17th centuries; and unless above all it happens that we catch tonight the peculiar way in which his life and problems concern us and our problems both as individuals and as graduates of Fisk University.

Galileo was born in that great Age when the struggle for religious freedom was turning into a series of struggles for political survival. The new birth of the Spirit of the World in the 15th century had swept away the Veil of Dogmatic religion in the 16th and left the European world in the whirl of battle: in Germany a wild troubled peace flamed into a War of Wars which for a whole generation swept and devastated the land. In France a wily Italian woman planned the massacre of St. Bartholemew and with the flash of its horror lighted twenty-five years of civil strife and a century of despotism. In England, Bloody Mary had wept herself heart-broken to her grave, while her husband, son of the great Emperor whom Martin Luther faced at Worms, began that awful struggle with the Netherlands, which for eighty years crimsoned the North Sea and culminated in the Great Armada against Elizabeth of England.

But Galileo was not of war-swept Germany or intriguing France, or of proud Spain or pushing England; he was a true son of Itlay. Of that Italy which had given the world the Renaissance and those great Sons of morning Leonardo, Raphael, Titian, and the master Michael Angelo in whose death year Galileo was born.

He was born of noble rank in Pisa which we all know for its leaning tower and bronzen doors, but which stood then for a memory and a prophesy - a memory of former glory of artist, merchant, and warrior, there where its marble palaces cunning in handiwork looked

41-2-131

ward thrust; because of some vision that calls and will no answer but the Eternal Yes.

So Galileo became a learner and teacher of men and in this life career what did he accomplish three hundred years ago? The simple unexplained recore is in itself wonderful: he found the law of falling bodies, he invented the telescope, he discovered the moons of Jupiter, he explained the reflected light of planets; he laid down the laws of cohesion, he studied the law of the pendulum and applied it to the clock, and above all he adduced irrefragable proof of the correctness of the Copernican doctrine that the sun and not the earth is the centre of our universe. Simply and barely stated this accomplishment is tremendous. To few human beings has it been given in a life of four score years to advance so momentously the sum of human knowledge. But this bare recounting does not do justice to his genius. "Judge us not" cried Frederick Douglass "by the heights we have attained but rather from the depths whence we came." So too judge this World Genius not simply by the things he learned but rather by the ignorance of his Age. This was a day when falling and gravitation was a thing too slight for human minds to ponder over; when the sky was regarded as a decorated changeable roof of the world, when time depended on sundials and hour glasses, and when the grand old legend of Joshua and the sun in Ajalon was regarded as a plain literal statement of fact. It was a day when men assumed knowledge of the whole Truth and argued down to the individual fact, instead of ceaselessly, endlessly and minutely studying the fact and then guessing as we do today cautiously at the mighty shadow of Reality. Here then was a human soul that walked into this world naked and unashamed, that dared to see what his own eyes saw and think whither his own clear logic. A dangerous soul - a Revolutionist greater than Robespierre, a socialist wilder than Marx or Gorky - a very creator of a new heaven and a new Earth.

And here if I were minded I might end with this triumphant record and with a dim hint at jealousy o'erpassed and persecution surmounted, of physical blindness and suffering ignored, celebrate a triumphant death in the year of Newton's birth; and tell of the tomb that sits today in Florence to his honor -- there where the golden Arno fragrant with memories sings to the sea 'neath the olive crowned marbles of Lorenzo, the Magnificent.

41-2-133

But it is in such half finished biography that men do mischief in the world and blind the eyes of young men and women like these graduates here. It sweeps dust in their eyes and discord in their ears, and to the eternal thunder of the questioning. How, it returns only the answer to the answered question What. Easy it is to tell what men have done in this world -- Lincoln freed the slave, Grant freed Lincoln, and Hamilton made us a nation. But how - How, asks the men who will do -- Stars there are, them we see and know but How do men reach them - what of the Way, the Power, and the Opposition.

So in Galileo's life I want to turn now to three things: what was the Impulse that gave him power to do? What were the Obstacles he encountered? And how did he surmount them?

The impulse was a new vision of the world. From the time of Dante in the thirteenth up to the blossoming of Petrarch in the fifteenth Italy had been seeing life anew. Galileo was child of this awakening.

The impulse behind him was the Wonder of an open mind ar the mechanism of the universe. Two things in the world are ever Miraculous - thought and motion. After the death of the dark age the European world awoke in the Italian renaissance to a sense of the Wonders of human thought - their own keen speculation and the marvels of the rediscovered thought of the ancient world; then imperceptibly the Things thought of displaced the thought of the thinking and motion form movement held the attention of men and the genius of Galileo. Something of the same thing has happened in our day; the schools have long studied Human Thought in literature, logic and speculation. Today has come attention to the more neglected wonders of the Things round us and the technique of the world. With eye and imagination thus fixed on the mystery of motion in falling body and whirling earth and moving star, Galileo started to know, to observe, to prove, to dream.

In so doing he met the opposition - the obstacles that ever block the way of the man who proposes in thought or deed, something New. First it took the cruder and uglier form of jealousy.

41-2-134

We tell but half a truth to young men and women when we say do well and you will be successful. They are apt to interpret success in term of the world's applause and it is not true that the world ever applauds well doing. In his own alma mater, the ancient University of Pisa, Galileo did well as student and professor of physics at the early age of twenty-five. But his new teachings offended a man. If that man had been an ordinary mortal it might not have mattered, but he was Giovanni de Medici, a prince of a princely house, and in three short years at the very outset of his career Galileo was out of a job. A year later he was called to the University of Padua and finally to Florence itself. The students of all Europe flocked to him and his inventions and discoveries spread his fame. And as his fame rose so rose the jealous opposition. And now men said not that he offended man but that he blasphemed God. Blasphemy, heresy, transgression of the Dogma of the Catholic Chruch were werious things in the sixteenth century - they meant disgrace, poverty, persecution, and death if known and proven. At first then the thing was whispered as jealous rumor, then it swelled to an open war of pamphlets and books; sermons were preached and formal denouncement of the heretic was made. The Holy Office, which we know as the Inquisition - that dark and cruel child of the Reformation, with its servant the Society of Jesus - took up the matter, and finally the opposition culminated in a summons to Rome and trial before seven cardinal princes of the Holy Catholic Church.

Such was the Impulse and such the Opposition. Whither was the Path - the way through, which Galileo pursued his journey to the End. When the man who has a clear vision of Right, finds himself successfully approaching the goal, how shall he meet the Jealousy, Error, Selfishness and Ignornace. The world has given many answers to this, perhaps the greatest moral problem that rises before men. Tonight I have to tell the answer that Galileo Galilei gave: For 50 years:

He hesitated;

He explained to his friends;

He conciliated his enemies;

He promised to cease;

He argued

and finally at the age of 70

He lied - he deliberately and with full knowledge publicly and unequivocally he made one of the straightest most uncompromising denials of what he knew to be the truth ever recorded and, as the legend is, sealed that falsehood by a whispered statement that he knew he was lying.

41-2-135

I am at present neither defending nor condemning Galileo. I am simply stating the case and showing you the way in which a man whose service to humanity is unquestioned chose to save his life. For a long time Galileo was successful in dodging the main issue, namely Does the doctrine that the sun is the centre of our universt contradict the Bible? He was full seventy years of age when he was finally brought to trial. It was an imposing sight: on the rear wall of a room in the Great palace of the Vatican rose the soft outlines of a famous fresco of Raphael. Before it stretched a long crimson coated table. Here sat the prelates of the church in their gorgeous robes - the bishops of seven sees, the princes of the greatest human organization in modern times. A golden crucifix adorned one end and the seven golden candlesticks with their lighter tapers. Before the table stood two scarlet cardinals, and a corsetted soldier with drawn sword. In the midst stood Galileo -- a little old man of seventy years, decrepit, and half blind. With palsied hands and trembling lips he said these words:

"I Galileo Galilei of the age of seventy, being on my knees in the presence of you, most eminent and most reverend Lords Cardinals of the Universal Christian Commonwealth, having before my eyes the holy Gospels, on which I now lay my hands, swear that I have always believed, and now believe, and God helping, that I shall for the future always believe, whatever the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Church holds, preaches, and teaches. But because this Holy Office had enjoined me by precept, entirely to relinquish the false dogma which maintains that the Earth is the center of the world and immovable, and that the Earth is not the center, and moves; not to hold, defend, or teach by any means, or by writing, the aforesaid false doctrine.

Therefore, being willing to take out of the minds of your eminences, and of every Catholic Christian, this vehement suspicion of right conceived against me, I with sincere heart, and faith unfeigned, abjure, execrate, and detest the aforesaid errors and heresies, and generally every sect contrary to the above-said Holy Church, and I swear that I will never more hereafter say or assert, bu speech or writing, anything through which the like suspicion may be had of me; but if I shall know any one heretical, or suspected of heresy, I will denounce him to this Holy Office, or to the Inquisitor, and Ordinary of the place in which I shall be. I moreover swear and promise, that I will fulfill and observe entirely all the penitences which have been imposed upon me, or which shall be imposed by this Holy Office. But if it shall happen that I shall go contrary (which God avert) to any of my words, promises, protestations, and oaths, I subject myself to all the penalties and punishments, which, by the Holy Canons, and other Constitutions, general and particular, have been enacted and promulgated against such delinquents: So help me God, and his Holy Gospels, on which I now lay my hands."

Thus he spoke but as he rose from his knees some say he whispered "But it does move". Nine years later the blind and aged sufferer after long imprisonment and torture, died.

41-2-137

Students and graduates of Fisk University let us jidge this man: on the one hand range his service to mankind: his discovery of the great laws of motion in the solar system; on the other place the cowardice of his lie; the advantages of a mechanical knowledge of the university and the necessity of faith in one's gellow-men as the foundation stone of society - which is the greatest? Which is the sorest wound to human progress -- the loss of a valuable body of knowledge or the voluntary misdirection of human faith - a blow at the upbuilding of Truth or a blow at its very foundations? Science is a great and worthy mistress but there is one greater and that is humanity which science serves; one thing there is greater than knowledge and that is the man who knows. In the midst then of society whose life blood is faith in the name of Religion which must either be true or devilish, and in the name of Science which will know the truth that the truth may make it free, the verdict of civilization must be that not even the splendor of the service of Truth done by Galileo Galilei can wipe away the blot of his cowardly lie. By that lie civilization was halted, science was checked and bigotry was more strongly enthroned on its crimson glory. And for what? To aid the discovery of truth? No, for Galileo's great work was done twenty years before he was tried for his life. No it was for the sake of nine years of pitiable blindness and suffering for an aged and broken man who did not dare to die for the glory of a great cause and make it thus more glorious in his courageous death. Nor did he lack example. Only years before his birth a German monk had faced Christendom for one principle and cried when they shrieked "Retract" - not I will not but "I cannot do otherwise." In the midst of his young manhood right there in Rome Giordano Bruno almost the very age of Galileo, a defender of the same Copernican system, and unswerving searcher for truth, suffered himself to be burned alive after seven years in prison rather than to lend himself to a lie to the glory of the Church.

Did it pay? Was the truth worth a lie? Which was the fool Bruno or Galileo? I know that in this my judgment I speak today to ears that hear faintly and to hardening hearts. And with reason, for I speak to an age that differs from and at the same time resembles Galileo's. His age was beginning to see and sense and appreciate the rhythm of Things - the miracle of motion, the sweep of space and the dominion of matter; we today emerge from a century steeped in the awe and worship of Matter, triumphant in its mastery, insolent and in its prophesy. Despite our strongest endeavors a shade of contempt for mere thought and theorizing, for feelings, emotions, and principles tinges our culture and our life. Two miracles the world holds as I have said: Thought and Motion and the Age of thought which was the age before Galileo forgets the miracle of Motion and the Age of Motion which is our age contemns the miracle of Thought. Yet above contempt and neglect sweep both as the ultimate Wonder of Life and woe to the world that blasphemes them.

Today and on us the pressure is tremendous. What is the world cries the Present Philosophy? It is the growing of grain and the weaving of cloth, the moving of wheels and the building of walls - it is the ability to do, the earning of livelihood, the creation of wealth. And then by natural logic this doctrine advances and says if this is Life train men for life in national ways: not by latin and algebra but by arithmetic and mechanics. Is this philosophy false? No but almost as dangerous for it is half true. As one sided as the world that stood in judgment over Galileo and said: with the Bible of God and the Logic of to read what else is there worth studying in the world. The influence of this dogmatism has lasted until our day. There can be no doubt that the College curriculum of the past generation shamefully neglected the World of Things - the tangible visible universe and its laws and ways. It is certain that in the University of tomorrow the field of knowledge will include a knowledge of what the present world has done as is doing with its physical resources as well as a knowledge of its Thoughts and feelings. For this momentous change in curriculum all true educators are looking and preparing but this does not mean a stampede to industry as a substitute for life - to mechanics as an antidote for thought or to technique in place of Reason.

41-2-139

Simply because in the world of education we are fighting for change and larger fulfillment of true prophesy does not mean that any industrializing of a college curriculum, or any substitution of hands for brains is the true heralded change. For it may easily happen(and this is the gist of my message) that a mere specious and popular promise of longer and easier life may prompt the Galilean spirit of 1908 as it did in 1608 to seek to establish the mechanical success of the future building by tearing down the spiritual foundations of the past.

Many men would argue in judging Galileo: Are not the laws of Motion worth a lie? Is not the support of a great Negro College worth some deception or surrender? But the Spirit of the Ages answers No. The foundations which Galileo's lie threatened were of more infinitely difficult building and perfecting than the great discoveries he made were worth. In travail of soul and gushing of blood, in anger, hatred, sorrow and strife, in the rise and crash of empires, from Egypt and Babylonia to Beautiful Greece and imperial Rome - on all this was the world - Kingdom of Law and Order and Truth raised. They only can speak lightly of the change from the Time when each man flew at every one's throat to that when we safely look for Universal Peace among all nations - they only lightly pass that vision by who never knew of the raging billows of sorrow and blood through which this world has staggered to this goal. Which is greater the discovery of the Telephone or of universal suffrage? That man is mad who hesitates to answer.

41-2-150

So then when a man offers a discovery for a lie or Education for a bribe then must the watchman on the outer wall cry Halt - In the King's name!

And you graduates of Fisk University, are the Warchmen on the outer wall. And you Fisk University, Intangible but real Personality, builded of Song and Sorrow, and the Spirits of Just Men made perfect are as one standing Galileo -wise before the Vision of Death and the Bribe of the Lie. Not that I for a moment suppose that anyone now in authority here proposes any decisive change in the attitude of meaning of this University. But the personality of an institution is a peculiar thing. The apparently isolated - almost unconscious movements of individuals guided by the outside pressure of powerful interests easily bring that to pass of which they themselves had not dreamed. And so today this venerable institution stands before its problem of future development, with the bribe of Public Opinion and Private Wealth dangling before us, if we will either deny that our object is the highest and broadest training of Black Men, or if we will consent to call Higher Education that which you know and I know is not Higher Education. And I say we, in this case advisedly, for my brothers and sisters, if this happens: if the ideal is lowered or the lie told the responsibility rests on us. We are the University - we on whose hands it has laid immortal hands, who wear its sign and seal upon our brows. For us the trustees hold this property, as our representatives these teachers teach. If this republic of letters suffers harm, the guilt lies on us and on our children's children.

Three gifts a graduate may bring back to his Alma Mater - a gift of Gold, and surely today this is needed for more and more the burden of Negro education is destined on Negro shoulders, and the support of a College like this will eventually come from its alumni. Yet the gift of Gold is not possible to us all nor is it the greatest gift. The second and greater gift is the gift of accomplishment - of things done, success achieved, knowledge advanced and fostered. Too little of this proof of our training have we brought to Fisk, but a full glorious return did Galileo make to Pisa. Yet this is not the greatest and in the maker the Greater Gift this Man missed and marred the greatest. For the greatest gift that a scholar can bring to Learning is Reverence of Truth, a Hatred of Hypocrisy Shams, and an absolute sincerity of purpose. And if after twenty years we of the class of '88 return with little Gold, with but pitiable accomplishment - God grant we bring to this altar the incense of clean hands and unbending devotion to what we know is the truth.

41-2-141

In the pell clutch of Circumstance
I have winced or cried aloud;
Beneath the bludgeonings of Chance
My head is bloody ---- but unbowed.

First of all then the thing for we stand must be clear. We are not opposing industrial education. The vocational training of children is one of the greatest and most promising movements of modern days. But the place for that kind of training is not the College department of Fisk University. To do this would be like using a surgeon's knife for chopping wood. The world needs wood but it has axes for cutting it. There are good and deserving schools for trade teaching. There are but two or three colleges. These colleges are devoted to higher training and they must not be diverted from it. But it may be asked

are not technical and mechanical courses of study possible subjects of higher training? They are. The college course of the future is going to be enriched by the inclusion of many courses based on the technique of modern industry and the physical properties of matter. But that does not mean that every part of such knowledge is fit for the college curriculum. The milking of cows is a worthy industry but it is not a cultural study upon which any honest college can base its bachelor's degree. On the other hand the great chemical and physical laws which underly the making of many food products are matters which could profitable be treated in a college course. And the decision as to the adaptability of certain lines of thought or bodies of knowledge is not a thing to be arrived at by majority vote or racial prejudices, but is a matter of expert study. If Fisk University wants to know what technical and engineering subjects are fittest to a College course - there are in the United States, France, and Germany hundreds of universities and other institutions of the very highest standing, whose curriculums have been matters of thought, study and development among the best educational philosophers of the world - learn of these and copy their courses and hold their standards. But if on the other hand the standards of a great Negro College are to be set by schools of lower and different object, whither are the ideals of this University falling? If you find that you cannot give technical courses of rich college grade then high school courses or kindergarten courses and call them by their right names. There may often be excuse for doing things poorly in this world, but there is never any excuse for calling a poorly done thing well done - of denominating a series of lessons in the training of servants, a course in mechanical engineering.

You will I am sure pardon this frank warning and exportation. The times are perilous. A stubborn determination at this time on the part of the Negro race to uphold its ideals, keep its standards and unceasàly contend for its rights means victory, and victory a great deal sooner than any of you imagine. But a course of self abasement and surrender, of lowering of ideals and surrendering of opportunity - above all a philosophy of lieing in word or deed for the sake of conciliation or personal gain means indefinite postponement of the true emancipation of the Negro race in America for the simple reason that such a race is not fit to be freed.

41-2-143

High above the yellow marbles of Florence glistening among the shining olive leaves hangs the ancient church of the Holy Cross. Below it winds the yellow Arno past Pisa to the azure of the Midland sea; and beyond the Sea lies Africa. Once in the past the surging billows tossed a Florentine barque high on the thunders of a Storm. All seemed lost in the purple blackness of the night: with wild voices the sailors prayed to all the Saints of Florence till suddenly one cried - "A vision - a vision: The Holy Cross," and pointed our far aloft where seemed to gleam the marble splendor of the Florentine Church. The whirled the ship toward it, it leapt and dashed itself to death on the black and beatling rocks full fifty miles from where in far off Florence the Church of the Holy Cross raised silently its towers to God. And beneath these towers slept and sleep the bones of Galileo Galilei.

1906

Galileo Galilei

The man whom we know as Galileo was born in I564 and died in I642, born just after Elizabeth of England ascended the throne and died as the Thirty Years' War was about to end; and yet this tells us little until we understand the meaning of the Age in which he lived- the waning I6th and the dawning I7th centuries; and unless above all it happens that we catch tonight the peculiar way in which his life and problems concern us and our problems both as individuals and as graduates of Fisk University.

Galileo was born in that great Age when the struggle for religious freedom was turning into a series of struggles for political survival. The new birth of the Spirit of the World in the I5th century had swept away the Veil of Dogmatic religion in the I6th and left the European world in the whirl of battle: in Germany a wild troubled peace flamed into a War of Wars which for a whole generation swept and devastated the land. In France a wily Italian woman planned the massacre of St. Bartholemew and with the flash of its horror lighted twenty five years of civil strife and a century of despotism. In England, Bloody Mary had wept herself heart-broken to her grave, while her husband, son of the great Emperor whom Martin Luther faced at Worms, began that awful struggle with the Netherlands, which for eighty years crimsoned the North Sea and culminated in the Great Armada against Elizabeth of England.

4-1-2-14

41-2-145

But Galileo was not of war-swept Germany or intriguing France, or of proud Spain or pushing England; he was a true son of Italy. Of that Italy which had given the world the Renaissance and those great Sons of morning Leonardo, Raphael, Titian, and the master Michael Angelo in whose death year Galileo was born.

He was born of noble rank in Pisa which we all know for its leaning tower and bronzen doors, but which stood then for a memory and a prophesy- a memory of former glory of artist, merchant, and warrior, there where its marble palaces cunning in handiwork looked ward thrust; because of some vision that calls and with no answer but the Eternal Yes.

So Galileo became a learner and teacher of men and in this life career what did he accomplish three hundred years ago? The simple explained record is in itself wonderful: he found the law of falling bodies, he invented the telescope, he discovered the moons of Jupiter, he explained the reflected light of planets; he laid down the laws explained the phenomena of cohesion, he studied the law of pendulum and applied it to the clock, and above all he adduced irrefragable proof of the correctness of the Copernican doctrine that the sun and not the earth is the centre of our universe. Simply and barely stated this accomplishment is tremendous. To few human beings has it been given in a life of four score years to advance so momentously the sum of human knowledge. But this bare recounting does not do justice to his genius. " Judge us not" cried Frederick Douglass "by the heights we have attained but rather from the depths whence

we came." So too judge this World Genius not simply by the things he learned but rather by the ignorance of his Age. This was a day whne falling and gravitation was a thing too slight for human minds to ponder over; when the sky was regarded as a decorated changeable roof of the world, when time depended on sun dials and hpur glasses, and when the grand old legend of Joshua and the Sun in Ajalon was regarded as a plain literal statement of fact. It was a day when men ~~started with~~ assumed knowledge of the whole Truth and argued down to the individual fact, instead of ceaselessly, endlessly and minutely studying the fact and then guessing as we do today cautiously at the mighty shadow of Reality. Here then was a human soul that walked into this world naked and unashamed, that dared to see what his own eyes saw and think whither his own clear logic . A dangerous soul- a Revolutionist greater than Robespierre, a socialist wilder than Marx or Gorky- a very creator of a new heaven and a new Earth.

41-2-147

And here if I were minded, I might end with this triumphant record, and with a dim hint at jealousy o'erpassed and persecution surmounted, of physical blindness and suffering ignored, celebrate his triumphant death in the year of Newton's birth, and tell of the ~~xxxxx~~ tomb that sits today in Florence to his honor-- there where the golden Arno fragrant with memories sings to the sea neath the olive crowned marbles of ~~xxxxxx~~ Lorenzo, the Magnificient.

41-2-148

But it is in such half finished biography that men do mischief in the world and blind the eyes of young men and women like these graduates here. It sweeps dust in their eyes and discord in their ears, and to the eternal thunder of the questioning How, ~~How~~, it returns only the answer to the answered question What. Easy it is to tell what men have done in this world-- Lincoln freed the slave, Grant freed Lincoln, and Hamilton made us a nation. . But how- how asked, how asks the men who will do-- Stars there are, ~~that~~ them we see and know but how do men reach them- what of the Way, the Power, and the Opposition.

So in Galileo's life I want to turn now to three things: what was the Impulse that gave him power to do? What were the Obstacles he encountered? And how did he surmount them?

The impulse was a new vision of the world. From the time of Dante in the thirteenth up to the blossoming of Petrarch in the fifteenth Italy had been seeing life anew. Galileo was child of this awakening.

611-2-17

The impulse behind him was the Wonder of an open mind at the mechanism of the universe. Two things in the world are ever Miraculous- thought and motion. After the death of the dark age the European world awoke in the Italian renaissance to a sense of the Wonders of human thought- their own keen speculation and the marvels of the rediscovered thought of the ancient world; then imperceptibly the Things thought of displaced the thought of the thinking and motion form movement held the attention of men and the genius of Galileo. Something of the same thing has happened in our day: the schools have long studied Human Thought in literature, logic and speculation. Today has come attention to the more neglected wonders of the Things round us ans the technique of the world. With eye and imagination thus fixed on the mystery of motion in falling body and whirling earth and moving star, Galileo ~~he~~ started to know, to observe, to prove, to dream.

41-2-150

In so doing he met the opposition- the obstacles that ever block the way of the man who proposes in thought or deed, something New. First it took the cruder and uglier form of jealousy.

We tell but a half truth to young men and women when we say do well and you will be successful. They are apt to interpret success in term of the world's applause and it is not true that theworld ever applauds well doing. In his own alma mater, the ancient University of Pisa, Galileo did well as student and professor of physics at the early age of twenty-five. But his new teachings offended a man. If that man had been an ordinary mortal it might not have mattered, but he was Giovanni de Medici, a prince of a princely house, and in three short years at the very outset of his career Galileo was out of a job. A year later he was called to the University of Padua, and finally to Florence itself. The students of all Europe flocked to him and his inventions and discoveries spread his fame. And as his fame rose so rose the jealous opposition. And now men said not that he offended man but that he blasphemed God. Blasphemy, heresy, transgression of the Dogma of the Catholic Church were serious things in the sixteenth century- they meant disgrace, poverty, persecution, and death if known and proven. At first then the thing was whispered as jealous rumor, then it swelled to an open war of pamphlets and books; sermons were preached and formal denouncement of the heretic was made. The Holy Office, which we know as the Inquisition- that dark and cruel child of the Reformation, with its servant the Society of Jesus, took up the matter, and finally the opposition culminated in a summons to Rome and trial before seven cardinal princes of the Holy Catholic Church.

41-2-151

Such was the Impulse and such the Opposition. Whither was the Path- the way through which Galileo pursued his journey to the End. When the man who has a clear vision of Right, finds himself successfully approaching the goal, how shall he meet the Jealousy, Error, Selfishness and Ignorance. The world has given many answers to this, perhaps the greatest moral problem that rises before men. Tonight I have to tell the answer that Galileo Galilei gave: For 50 years

He hesitated;

He explained to his friends;

He conciliated his enemies;

He promised to cease;

He argued

and finally at the age of 70

He lied- he deliberately and with full knowledge unequivocally publicly & he made ~~told~~ one of the straightest most uncompromising denials of what he knew to be the truth ever recorded and, as the legend is, sealed that falsehood by a whispered statement that he knew he was lying.

I am at present neither defending nor condemning Galileo. I am simply stating the case and showing you the way in which a man whose service to humanity is unquestioned chose to save to his life. For a long time Galileo was successful in dodging the main issue, namely Does the doctrine that the sun is the centre of our universe contradict the Bible? He was full seventy years of age when he was finally brought to trial. It was an imposing sight: on the rear wall of a room in the Great palace of the Vatican rose thesoft outlines of a famous fresco of Raphael. Before it stretched a long crimson coated table. . Here sat the prelates of the church in their gorgeous robes- the bishops of seven secs , the princes of the greatest human organization in modern times. A golden crucifix adorned one end and the seven golden candlesticks with their lighted tapers. Before the table stood two scarlet cardinals, and a corsetted soldier with drawn sword. In the midst stood Galileo-- a little old man of seventy years, decrepit, and half blind. With palsied hands and trembling lips he said these words:

41-2-152

" I Galileo Galilei of the age of seventy, being on my knees in the presence of you, most eminent and most reverend Lords Cardinals of the Universal Christian Church Commonwealth, having before my eyes the holy Gospels, on which I now lay my hands, swear that I have always believed, and now believe, and God helping , that I shall for the the future always believe, whatever the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Roman Catholic Church holds, preaches, and teaches. But because this Holy Office had enjoined me by precept, entirely to relinquish the false dogma which maintains that the Earth is the center of the world and immovable, and that the Earth is not the center, and moves; not to hold, defend, or teach by any means, or by writing, the aforesaid false doctrine.

41-2-153

41-2-154

Therefore, being willing to take out of the minds of your eminences, and of every Catholic Christian, this vehement suspicion of right conceived against me, I with sincere heart, and faith unfeigned, abjure, execrate, and detest the afore-said errors and heresies, and generally every other sect contrary to the above-said Holy Church; and I swear that I will never any more hereafter say or assert ,by speech or writing,anything through which the like suspicion may be had of me; but if I shall know any one heretical,or suspected of heresy, I will denounce him to this Holy Office,or to the Inquisitor,and Ordinary of the place in which I shall be. I moreover swear and promise, that I will fulfil and observe entirely all the penitences which have been imposed upon me,or which shall be imposed by this Holy Office. But if it shall happen that I shall go contrary(which God avert) to any of my words,promises, protestations,and oaths, I subject myself to all the penalties and punishments,which,by the Holy Canons,and other Constitutions, general and particular,have been enacted and promulgated against such delinquents: So help me God, and his Holy Gospels ,on which I now lay my hands."

41-2-155

Thus he spoke but as he rose from his knees some say he whispered " But it does move". Nine years later the blind and aged sufferer after long imprisonement and torture, died.

41-2-158

Students and graduates of Fisk University let us judge this man: on the one hand range his service to mankind: his discovery of the great laws of motion in the solar system; on the other place the cowardice of his lie; the advantages of a mechanical knowledge of the university and the necessity of faith in one's fellow-men as the foundation stone of society- which is the greatest? Which is the sorest wound to human progress- the loss of a valuable body of knowledge or the voluntary misdirection of human faith - a blow at the upbuilding of Truth or a blow at its very foundations? Science is a great and worthy mistress but there is one greater and that is humanity which science serves; one thing there is greater than knowledge and that is the man who knows. In the midst then of society whose life blood is faith in the name of Religion which must either be true or devilish, and in the name of Science which will know the truth that the truth may make it free, the verdict of civilization must be that not even the splendor of the service of Truth done by Galileo Galilei can wipe away the blot of his cowardly lie. By that lie civilization was halted, science was checked and bigotry was more strongly enthroned on its crimson glory. And for what? To aid the discovery of truth? No for Galileo's great work was done twenty years before he was tried for his life. No it was for the sake of nine years of pitiable blindness and suffering for an aged and broken man who did not dare to die for the glory of a great cause and make it thus more glorious in his courageous death. Nor did he lack example. Only years before his birth a German monk had faced Christendom for one principle and cried when they shrieked " Retract"- not I will not but I cannot do otherwise." I n the midst of his young manhood right there in Rome Giordano Bruno almost the very age of Galileo, a defender of the same Copernican system, and unswerving searcher for truth, suffered himself to be burned alive after seven years in prison rather than to lend himself to a lie to the glory of the Church.

41-2-157

Did it pay? Was the truth worth a life? Which was the fool Bruno or Galileo? I know that in this my judgment I speak today to ears that hear faintly and to hardening hearts. And with reason, for I speak to an age that differs from and at the same time resembles Galileo's.

41-2-158

Galileo's. His age was beginning to see and sense and appreciate the rythym of Things- the miracle of motion, the sweep of space and the dominion of matter; we today emerge from a century steeped in the awe and worship of Matter, triumphant in its mastery, insolent in its prophesy. Despite our strongest endeavors a shade of contempt for mere thought and theorizing, for feelings, emotions, and principles tinges our culture and our life. Two miracles the world holds as I have said: Thought and Motion and the Age of thought which was the age before Galileo forgets the miracle of Motion and the Age of Motion which is our age contemns the miracle of Thought. Yet above contempt and neglect sweep both as the ultimate Wonder of Life and woe to the world that blasphemes them.

41-2-159

Today and on us the pressure is tremendous . What is the world cries the Present Philosophy? It is the growing of grain and the waeving of cloth, the moving of wheels and the building of walls- it is the ability to do, the earning of livelihood, the creation of wealth. And then by natural logic this doctrine advances and says if this is Life train men for life in national ways: not by latin and algebra but by arithmetic and mechanics. Is this philos o -phy false? No but almost as dangerous for it is half true. As one sided as the world that stood in judgment over Galileo and said: with the Bible of God and the Logic of to read what else is there worth studying in the world. The influence of this dogmatism has lasted until our day. There can be no doubt that the College curriculum of the past generation shamefully neglected the World of Things - the tangible visible universe and its laws and ways. It is certain that in the University of tomorrow the field of knowledge will include a knowledge of what the present world has done as is doing with its physical resources as well as a knowledge of its Thoughts and feelings. For this momentous change in curriculum all true educators are looking and preparing but this does not mean a stampede to industry as a substitute for life to mechanics as an antidote for thought or to technique in place of Reason.

41-2-160

Simply because in the world of education we are fighting for change and larger fulfilment of true prophesy does not mean that any industrializing of a college curriculum, or any substitution of hands for brains is the true heralded change. For it may easily happen (and this is the gist of my message) that a mere specious and popular promise of longer and easier life may prompt the Galilean spirit of 1908 as it did in 1608 to seek to establish the mechanical success of the future building by tearing down the spiritual foundations of the past.

41-2-161

Many men would argue in judging Galileo: Are not the laws of Motion worth a lie? Is not the support of a great Negro College worth some deception or surrender? But the Spirit of the Ages answers No. The foundations which Galileo's lie threatened were of more infinitely difficult building and perfecting than the great discoveries he made were worth. In travail of soul and gushing of blood,in anger, hatred, sorrow and strife,in the rise and crash of empires,from Egypt and Babylonia to Beautiful Greece and imperial Rome- on all this was the world,—Kingdon of Law and Order and Truth raised. They only can spoak lightly of the change from the Time when each man flew at every one's throat to that when we safely look for Univerasl Peace among all nations— they only lightly pass that vision by who never knew of the raging billows of sorrow and blood through which this world has staggered to this goal. Which is greater the discovery of the Telephone or of universal suffrage? That man is mad who hesitates to answer.

41-2-162

So then when a man offers a discovery for a lie or Education for a bribe then must the watchmen on the outer wall cry Halt- In the King(s name!

And you graduates of Fisk University,are the Watchmen on the outer wall. And you Fisk University, Intan-gible but real Personality, builded of Song and Sorrow,and theSpiritsof Just Men made perfect are as one standing Galileo-wise before the Vision of Death and the Bribe of the Lie. Not that I for amoment suppose that anyone now in authority here proposes any decisive change in the attitude or meaning of this University. But the personality of an institution is a peculiar thing . The apparently isolated - almost unconscious movements of individuals guided by the outside pressure of powerful interests easily bring that to pass of which they themselves had not dreamed. And so today this venerable institution stands before its problem of future development, with the bribe of Public Opinion and Private Wealth dangling before us, if we will either deny that our object is the highest and broadest training of Black Men, or if we will consent to call Higher Education that which you know and I know is not Higher Education. And I say we, in this case advisedly, for my brothers and sisters, if this happens: if the ideal is lowered or the lie told the responsibility rests on us. We are the University- we on whose heads it has laid immortal hands, who wear its sign and deal upon our brows. For us the trustees hold this property, as our representatives these teachers teach. If this republic of letters suffers harm, the guilt lies on us and on our children's children.

41-2-163

Three gifts a graduate may bring back to his Alma Mater- a gift of Gold, and surely today this is needed for more and more the burden of Negro education is destined on Negro shoulders, and the support of a College like this will eventually come from its alumni. Yet the gift of Gold is not possible to us all nor is it the greatest gift. The second and greater gift is the gift of accomplishment- of things done, success achieved, knowledge advanced and fostered. Too little of this proof of our training have we brought to Fisk, but a full glorious return did Galileo make to Pisa. Yet this is not the greatest and in the maker the Greater Gift this Man miss-ed and marred the greatest. For the greatest gift that a scholar can bring to Learning is the Reverence of Truth, a Hatred of Hypocrisy

Shams, and an absolute sincereity of purpose. And if after twenty years we of the class of '88 rdturn with little Gold, with but pit-iable accomplishment- God grant we bring to this altar the incense of clean hands and unbending devotion to what we know is the truth.

In the pell clutch of Circumstance
I have winced or cried aloud ;
Beneath the bludgeonings of Chance
My head is bloody------ but unbowed.

41-2-165

First of all then the thing for we stand must be clear. We are not opposing industrial education. The vocational training of children is one of the greatest and most promising movements of modern days. But the placefor that kind of training is not the College department of Fisk University. To do this would be like using a sur-geon's knife for chopping wood. The world needs wood but it has axes for cutting it. There are good and de-serving schools for trade teaching. There are but two or three colleges. These colleges are devoted to higher ~~ed~~ training and they must not be diverted from it. But it may be asked are not technical and mechanical courses of study possible subjects of higher training? They are. The college course of the future is going to be enriched by the inclusion of many courses based on the technique of modern industry and the physical properties of matter. But that does not mean that every part of such knowledge is fit for the college curriculum. The milking of cows is a worthy industry but it is not a cultural study upon which any honest college can base its bachelor's degree. On the other hand the great chomical and physical laws which underly the making of many food products are matters which could profitably be treated in a college course. And the decision as to the adaptability of certain lines of thought or bodies of knowledge is not a thing to be arrived at by majority vote or racial prejudices, but is a matter of expert study. If Fisk University wants to know what techinal and engineering subjects are fittest to a College course-there are i in the United States, France, and Germany hundreds of universities and other institutions of the very highest standing, whose curriculums have been matters of thought, study and development among the best educational philosphers of the world- learn of these and copy their courses and hold their standards. But if on the other -hand the standards of agreat Negro College are to be set by schools of lower and different object, whither are the ideals of this University falling? If you find that you cannot give technical courses of rich college grade then give high school courses or kindergarten courses and call them by their right names. There may often be excuse for doing things poorly in this world, but there is never anyexcuse for calling a poorly done thing well done- of denominating a series of lessons in the training of servants, a course in mechanical engineering.

41-2-166

41-2-167

You will I am sure pardon this frank warning and exportation. The times are perilous. A stubborn determination at this time on the part of the Negro race to uphold its ideals, keep its standards and unceasely contend for its rights means victory, and victory a great deal sooner than any of you imagine. But a course of self abasement and surrender, of lowering of ideals and surrendering of opportunity -above all a philosophy of lieing in word or deed for the sake of conciliation or personal gain means indefinite postponement of the true emancipation of the Negro race in America for the simple reason that such a race is not fit to be freed.

41-2-168

High above the yellow marbles of Florence glistening among the shining olive leaves hangs the ancient church of the Holy Cross. Be-low it winds the yellow Arno past Pisa to the azure of the Midland sea; and beyond the Sea lies Africai. Once in the past the surging billows tossed a Florentine barque high on the thunders of a Storm. All seemed lost in the purple blackness of the night: with wild voices the sailors prayed to all the Saints of Florence till sudden-ly one cried- " A vision-a vision: The Holy Cross," and pointed out far aloft where seemed to gleam the marble splendor of the Florentine Church. They whirled the ship toward it, it leapt and dashed itself to death on the black and beatling rocks fill fifty miles from where in afr off Florence the Church of the Holy Cross raised silently its towers to God. And beneath these towers slept and sleep the bones of Galileo Galilei.

41-2-169

Politics and Industry.

Abstract of Paper delivered by Prof. W. E. B. DuBois, of Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga., at the Conference on the Status of the Negro.

Monday - Day Session.

.....there came a counter-argument that practically stopped all effective opposition to the disfranchisement laws. This argument was that the economic development of the Negro in right lines demanded his exclusion from the right of suffrage at least for the present. This proposition has been insisted on so strenuously and advocated by Negroes of such prominence that it simply took the wind out of the sails of those who had proposed defending his rights, and today so deeply has this idea been driven that to most readers' minds the Negroes of the land are divided into two great parties - one asking no political rights but giving all attention to economic growth and the other wanting votes, higher education and all rights. Moreover, the phrase "take the Negro out of politics" has come to be regarded as synonomous with industrial training and property getting by black men. I want in the first place to show that in my opinion both these propositions are wrong and mischievous. In the first place there is no such division of opinion among Negroes as is assumed. They are particularly a unit in their demand for the ballot. The real difference of opinion comes as to how the ballot is to be gained. One set of opinion favors open frank agitation. The other favors influence and diplomacy; and the result, curious to say, is that the latter party has today an organized political machine which dictates the distribution of offices among black men and sometimes among southern whites and it is not too much to say that today the political power of the black race in America is in certain restricted lines very considerable. But those of us who oppose this party hold that this kind of political development by secrecy and machine methods is both dangerous and unwholesome and is not leading toward real democracy. It may and undoubtedly does put a large number of black men in office and it lessens momentary friction, but it is encouraging a coming economic conflict which will threaten the South and the Negro race.

28-2-170

.....We believe in vocational training, but we also believe that the vocation of a man in a modern civilized land includes not only the technique of his actual work but intelligent comprehension of his elementary duties as a father, citizen, and maker of public opinion, as a possible voter, a conservor of the public health, an intelligent follower of moral customs, and one who can at least appreciate if not partake something of the higher spiritual life of the world. .....

28-2-171

This brings us to the matter of voting: it is possible - easily possible - to train a working class who shall have no right to participate in the government. Most of the manual workers in the history of the world have been so trained. It is also possible, and the modern workd thinks desirable, to train a working class who shall also have the right to vote - Both these things are possible although the overwhelming trend of modern thought is toward making workers voters. But the one thing that is impossible and proven so again and again is to train two sets of workers side by side in economic competition and make one set voters and deprive the other set of all participation in government. To attempt this is madness. It invites a conflict and oppression? A nation cannot exist half slave and half free. Either the slave will rise through blood or the freeman will sink. So far tremendous effort in the South has been put forth to keep down economic competition between the races, by confining the Negroes by law and custom to certain vocations. But this effort is bound to break down.....

Moreover, the schools that increase the competition are the industrial schools and this is both natural and proper.....This competition accentuates race prejudice; when a whole community, a whole nation, pours contempt on a fellow man it seems a personal insult for that man to work beside me or at the same kind of work.....Here is a man whom all my companions say is unworthy and dangerous as a companion on the street car or steam car, as a fellow listener at a concert, theatre or lecture, as a table companion in the same house or restaurant, often as a dweller in the same street or same neighborhood and always as a worshipper in the same church or occupant of the same graveyard. If all this is so - and this the southern white working man is industriously taught from the cradle to the grave- if this is so then why should I be forced to work at the same job as this man or be engaged in similar kinds of work, or receive the same wages? If we cannot play together why should we work together?

38-2-172

Not only is there this feeling but there is also power to act. After the Atlanta riot the police and militia searched the houses of colored people and took away guns and amunition, while the sheriff almost gave away guns to some of the very men who had composed the mob. We think this monstrous, but this is but a parallel of the action of the whole nation; they have put the ballot in the hands of the white workingmen of the South and taken it away from the black fellow-workmen. The result is that the white workmen can enforce his feeling of prejudice and repulsion. Other things being equal, the employer is forced to discharge the black man and hire the white man - public opinion demands it, the administrators of government including police, magistrates, etc., render it easier since by preferring the white many intricate questions of social contact are avoided and political influence is vastly increased.

Under such circumstances there is nothing for the Negro to do but to bribe the employer by underbidding his white fellow: to work not only for less money wages, but for longer hours and under worse conditions. No sooner does he do this than he is mocked as a "scab" from Mexico to Canada and visited with all the consequent penalties. He is said to be dragging down labor and he is said to be taking bread from others mouth and he may be, but his excuse is tremendous; he is dragging others down to keep himself from complete submergence and he is taking some of the bread from others mouths lest his children starve. Does he want to do this? Does he like long hours? Ignorant as he is as a mass, has he not intelligence enough to perceive the value of labor unions and the meaning of the labor movement? No, it is not because the black man is a fool but because he is a victim that he drags labor down.

38-2-173

Faced by this situation the next step of the white workmen is to enforce by law and administration that which they cannot gain by competition. In the past these laws have been laws to separate and humiliate the blacks, but more aggressive laws are demanded today and will be in the future. The Alabama law makes the breaking of a contract to work by a farm laborer a felony punishable by a penetentiary sentence. Such a breaking of law in other industries is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine. Certain oppressive labor regulations in many southern states are only applicable to such counties as vote their enforcement. Counties with white workmen vote it down. Counties with disfranchised black workmen vote it in. In the public service no Negro can be employed at any job which any white man wants for obvious reasons. More than that no white man whose business depends on public approbation or political concession can dare to hire Negroes or if he hires them promote them as they may deserve. He must often be content with a distinctly inferior grade of white help.

Judges and juries in the South are at the absolute mercy of the white voters. Few ordinary judges would dare to oppose the momentary whim of the white mob and practically only now and then will a jury convict a white man for aggression on a Negro. Not only is this true in criminal but also in civil suits, so much so that it is a widespread custom among Negroes of property never to take a civil suit to court but to let the white complainant settle it. In all public benefits like schools and parks and gatherings and institutions: Negroes are regularly taxed for what they cannot enjoy: I am taxed for the Carnegie Public Library of Atlanta where I cannot enter to draw my own books. The Negroes of Memphis are taxed for public parks where they cannot sit down.

38-2-174

The public schools of the South on account of virulent opposition of the white working classes are (save in a few cities and a few exceptional counties) worse off than they were twenty years ago - with poorer teachers, lower salaries, and more negligent supervisors. This statement covers nine-tenths of the public Negro schools of the South. Even in serving his own people and organizing his own business the Negro is at the absolute mercy of the white voters: it is often said grandiloquentky: let the Negroes organize their own theatres, transport their own passengers, organize their own industrial companies:

but such kinds of business are absolutely dependent on public license and taxation requirements. A theatre built and equipped could by a single vote be refused a license, a transportation company could get no franchise, and annindustrial enterprise could be taxed out of existence...The voters proceed to put the industrial screws on the disfranchised. Witness the strike of the white locomotive firemen in Georgia today: Negro firemen get from 50 cents to one dollar a day less than the white firemen, have to do menial work and cannot become engineers. They can, however, by good service and behavior be promoted to the best runs by the rule of seniority. Even this the white firemen now object to and say in a manifesto: the "White people of this state refuse to accept Negro equality. This is worse than that." The other day the white automobile drivers of Atlanta made a frantic appeal in the papers for persons to stop hiring black drivers. The black drivers replied, "we have had fewer accidents than you and get less wages", but the whites simply said, "This ought to be a white man's job."

38-2-125

This sort of thing is destined to grow and develop. The fear of Negro competition in all lines is increasing in the South. The demand of tomorrow is going to be increasingly not to protect white people frommignorance and degradation, but from knowledge and efficiency - that is to so arrange the matter by law and custom as to make it possible for the inefficient and lazy white wonkman to be able to crush and keep down his black competitor at all hazards, and so that no black man shall be allowed to do his best if his success lifts him to any degree out of the place in which millions of Americans are being taught he ought to stay.

This is bad enough but this is not all. The voteless Negro is

a provocation, an invitation, to oppression, a plaything for mobs and a bonanza for demagogues. They serve always to distract attention from real issues and to ride fools and rascals into political power. The political campaign in Georgia before the last was avowedly and openly a campaign not against Negro crime and ignorance but against Negro intelligence and property owning and industrial competition as shown by an 83 % increase in their property in ten years. It swept the state and if it had not culminated in riot and bloodshed and thus scared capital, it would still be triumphant. As it is the end is not yet...

.....Fourteen years ago Mississippi began disfranchising Negroes. You were promised that the result would be to settle the Negro Problem. Is it settled? No, and it never will be until you give blank men the power to be men, until you give them the power to defend that manhood. When the Negro casts a free and intelligent vote in the south, then and not until then will the Negro Problem be settled.

38-2-176

William Lloyd Garrison

38-2-10

There are not many Americans of the present generation who have arrived at so clear & firm opinions on certain pressing human problems as had the late Mr. Garrison. And it was characteristic of the man that when once he saw the light he stood to be counted. Simply because he was in the South, for instance, he did not deem it necessary ~~even~~ to agree wholly with his neighbors or even to keep safe silence. Once, in 1906, he rose in such an audience, when suddenly called on, and spoke this clear creed:

W. E. B. Du Bois Papers (MS 312) 28-2-11

WILLIAM LLOYD GARRISON
The Younger
And the NEGRO.

--oOo--

There are not many Americans of the present generation who have arrived at so clear and firm opinions on the Negro problem as had the late Mr. Garrison. His creed as expressed in 1906 was this:

"I belong to the human race. I know no distinction of birth or color, I believe that we are only one race. There never were created different species; I believe that environment, and climate have differentiated us, and for one to appear lordly over the other is contrary to all ideas of Christianity or democracy. Democracy means the right of every one to join in the choice of his government, and to prepare men for self-government is as foolish as to prepare men for freedom. Nothing prepares for freedom but the exercise of the franchise. Mr. Lowell said that the best way to teach a man to vote is to put a ballot in his hands, to learn by doing, and not by instruction from the outside."

38-2-12

These are bold words, clearly spoken. Not many Americans of to-day believe them, and of those few, fewer still would willingly state that fact in unequivocal language. In other words the world seems in its search for truth about the Negro as far behind the younger Garrison to-day as it was behind the father yesterday. Then it was a question - not academic, not theoretical, but practical and present - as to whether it was advisable that four million human beings should have the legal mastery of their own bodies; and there were astute and honored and learned gentlemen, who once stood where I am standing to-day, and solemnly and earnestly maintained that the United States of America would be a better and more christian country if I and my fathers and my children were perpetual bondservants to ~~you.~~ others And there were intelligent citizens of this great city sitting where you are sitting who listened gravely to these arguments, and marvelled at their strength. That was but sixty years ago, and I sometimes wonder if sixty years hence an audience sitting in these same places will not find it hard to believe that in the year 1909 anyone thought it necessary to travel a thousand miles to ~~defend~~ attend the sanity of a man who maintained the practical reality of human brotherhood and the efficiency of American democracy to solve race problems

35-2-14

Whatever men may think in years to come, certain it is now that the same voices that called the father a fanatic in regard to slavery are calling the son and those who echo his belief, fanatics ~~in~~ with regard to Negro equality and Negro enfranchisment. Yet it is worth something to be crucified in such company, to hold the hand and follow the vision of those clear sighted men whose eyes were not filled with racial darkness and whose hearts beat true. But this is not enough. It is the duty of those who follow the Prophet to spread his doctrine, and surely no fitter tribute could be paid to William Lloyd Garrison to-day than a word of ~~defence~~ approval of his solution of the Negro problem.

In this case as in so many other human problems the convincing arguments are negative rather than positive: it is not possible to prove historically the unity of the human family, nor is it possible to prove beforehand that the Mass of Negroes could share the duties of government intelligently. But it is possible to point out the fatal consequences of present tendencies to exaggerated racial cleavage and it is possible and imperative as Mr. Garrison realized to show that American democracy in 1909 as 1859 cannot exist half slave and half free.

38-2-15

We are to-day with our new biological consciousness and half-learned but lightly-mouthed principles of evolution, dividing the world into airtight compartments; on the other hand our astounding economic development is striving to make those compartments permeable at least from one side. The result has been war and is bound to be war. In other words, the greatest efficient cause of the continued practice of organized murder, and the back-breaking burden of preparation therefor, is the intensification of racial lines, together with the inevitable subjection of the less organized. There is today no more pitiable sight than that of an old and venerable civilization founded on peace frantically arming her millions with Krupp guns to ward off the western followers of Jesus Christ.

38-2-16

Why is this? It is because of the wide spread contempt of races inculcated into the dominant white race and the firm and growing conviction that human brotherhood is untrue and undesirable not only as a fact but even as a dream. The reason of war ~~then~~ is because one-third of the world despises and spits upon the other two-thirds and the other two- thirds objects. To this the spirit of William Lloyd Garrison answers:

~~an attitude as utterly repugnant as one could imag~~

- an attitude utterly repugnant to Mr. Garrison, who with no shadow of patronage, loved his fellow man. This is true of all too few today +

"I know no distinction of birth or color, I believe that we are only one race. There never were created different species; I believe that environment, and climate have differentiated us, and for one to appear lordly over the other is contrary to all ideas of Christianity or democracy. Democracy means the right of every one to join in the choice of his government, and to prepare men for self-government is as foolish as to prepare men for freedom. Nothing prepares for freedom but the exercise of the franchise." Mr. Lowell said that the best way to teach a man to vote is to put the ballot in his hands, to learn by doing, and not by instruction from the outside."

Outside all science or logic, as a working hypothesis toward peace and decency and human courtesy, there could be no broader platform. And those white nations who fear that courtesy and decency and open opportunity for black and brown people will in some mysterious way hurt the world's civilization - who are so proud of themselves that they dare not permit the growth of pride in their neighbors, such nations in reality represent the threatening moral degeneracy of the 20th century. If now we frankly acknowledge that the growing race hatred of the modern world is unchristian inhuman and tremendously costly, how can we answer the man who asks flippantly, with out turned palms: what are you going to do about it?

The answer of William Lloyd Garrison is simple: admit all races to the decocracy of nations - admit citizens of every color and sex to the democracy of the United States. || If there were few that could follow Mr. Garrison in his ideal of human brotherhood there are I fear still fewer that can follow him here: the objections are legion: can sloth march beside thrift, can ignorance mate with intelligence, can efficiency work with ineffectiveness? We bring to hand our ready host of glibly learned adjectives: the Mongrel Latins, the Heathen Chinamen, the degenerate Hindus, the doomed South Sea Islands, the ignorant Negroes; and we say with an alluring candor: when all these inferiors reach our heights of accomplishment then we will open the doors of opportunity and admit them to the Brotherhood of Man! || There is a peculiar speciousness to this sort of reasoning and many honest people are content to settle race questions this way. But William Lloyd Garrison was not. He swept away the silken cobwebs of this logic and took from the vocabulary of modern education a pregnant much worked phrase: "Learn by doing." He said: If you want men to appreciate opportunities; give them opportunities; if you want a nation to take part in modern civilization, give it a part to take; if you want a race to become efficient open to it the world's best work; if you fear ignorance, get rid of ignorance; if you want men or women to learn how to vote give them the ballot. Then comes the answering chorus: This will cost: it will cost something to let the lazy waste the wealth of the thrifty, to let the ignorant blunder in the path of the intelligent, to let the untrained venal voter go to the polls. Ofcourse it will cost something, it will cost me something it will cost the world something

81-2-88

38-2-20

It cost William Lloyd Garrison something ——

And there is no human problem this wide world through, whose solution will not cost blood and treasure and patience. The trouble with us is not that the problems fronting us are insoluble but that we are unwilling to pay the cost - if the cost can be shouldered on others while we loll and dole, well and good, but when it means the sweat of our brow and the ache of our heart, we wave the fanatic languidly away, and say: Too radical - too radical by far, even when that radical had the noble humility & the fine simplicity of Mr. Garrison

38-2-21

And yet narrow the ~~matter~~ thing once to this matter of voting: on what does the survival of democracy in America depend? On the intelligence of its voters? Yes, but not solely on that: that is but one dimension - on their intelligence multiplied by their number.

If mere intelligence could make good government we could easily choose a small group of experts who would be in a way intelligent enough to rule this land without even the aid of this audience. Yet all history teaches that such an attempt would inevitably fail because omni-science is denied even to experts and no man is wise enough to have absolute control of his neighbor. Only as a large and even increasing numoer of the governed, have an influencial voice in that government, will that government tend to the welfare of all. Mr. Garrison knew this. We know it. The world knows it. The world has learned it in the blood and dust of battle, in the writhing and wailing of nations. You know it in your experience with the Irish voter of Boston, when your appeal was not to disfranchisment but to the public school. Yet to-day this nation is striving frantically to believe that the white people of the South are wise enough to govern the blacks, while those blacks are held in dumb and impotent wardship. William Lloyd Garrison believed that there is in the South to-day, no black man so ignorant that he ought to be put at the unbridled mercy of his white neighbor, not only for his sake but for that neighbor's own sake. As a responsible human being he has a right to a voice in this democracy. If his voice be ignorant strain the sinews of the nation to teach it; if the voice be foolish let it learn wisdom by bitter experience; if the voice be venal punish it for venality and not for speaking. There is no other path to peace. You know and I know that to-day we are simply building an economic serfdom in the South to replace physical slavery, and that the cataclysm which it eventually threatens will be every bit as dangerous as the upheaval of 1861.

38-2-22

In the presence of such a problem it is not simply a privilege it is a solemn duty to honor the memory of a man who saw the truth so clearly and uttered it so fearlessly.

Nor should our reverence for that memory, end in its mere honoring
It is perhaps natural that after the tremendous out-pouring of effort, blood and treasure in the civil war for settling the first phases of this particular problem of democracy in America, the nation should feel justified in sitting back with a sigh of relief and feeling deep disinclination actively to take hold again, of the social problems of the Negro in this land. But unfortunately (or fortunately) this world is one where social development refuses to wait upon our wish or feeling.

38-2-84

To-day is the time when there is needed as perhaps never before the combined wisdom of the whole country to settle this race problem right. It will be difficult to convince your children's children that you do your full duty in these days if you surrender the settlement of these problems to Mr. Tillman or Mr. Dixon or to the citizens of Brownsville, Tex. The real American patriot is one like the man we honor to-day, to whom no American norant that he ought to be put at the unbridled mercy of his white neighbor, not only for his sake but for that neighbor's own sake. As a responsible human being he has a right to a voice in this democracy. If his voice be ignorant strain the sinews of the nation to teach it; if the voice be foolish let it learn wisdom by bitter experience; if the voice be venal punish it for venality and not for speaking. There is no other path to peace. You know and I know that to-day we are simply building an economic serfdom in the South to replace physical slavery, and that the cataclysm which it eventually threatens will be every bit as dangerous as the upheaval of 1861.

38-2-23

In the presence of such a problem it is not simply a privilege it is a solemn duty to honor the memory of a man who saw the truth so clearly and uttered it so fearlessly.

[redacted]

Nor should our reverence for that memory, end in its mere honoring
It is perhaps natural that after the tremendous out-pouring of effort, blood and treasure in the civil war for settling the first phases of this particular problem of democracy in America, the nation should feel justified in sitting back with a sigh of relief and feeling deep disinclination actively to take hold again, of the social problems of the Negro in this land. But unfortunately (or fortunately) this world is one where social development refuses to wait upon our wish or feeling.

38-22-84

To-day is the time when there is needed as perhaps never before the combined wisdom of the whole country to settle this race problem right. It will be difficult to convince your children's children that you do your full duty in these days if you surrender the settlement of these problems to Mr. Tillman or Mr. Dixon or, to the citizens of Brownsville, Tex. The real American patriot is one like the man we honor to-day, to whom no American problem can possibly be merely sectional or local, if its solution affects the whole nation for weal or woe. It is right and proper that we should interfere with our neighbors' private affairs with all delicacy and courtesy but it is equally true that there are individual actions which no logic can make merely private, and for any section of this land to insist, that a policy, which undermines the very foundations of American democracy, and touches the ultimate relations, of half the world to its other half — for any locality to insist that its actions, on such a problem are merely of local interest, is utterly absurd. And for you and for me to accept such a dictum is to fail seriously in our plain duty. The problem of democracy in Georgia is the problem of democracy in Massachusetts and the problem of the color line in the South is the problem of the color line that belts the

38-2-26

the world. As citizens then of a land that cannot surely forget the memory of its foundation, and as fellow citizens and co-workers with William Lloyd Garrison father and son, let us, who truly feel the inspiration of this time and place, here and now re-dedicate our lives and services, to the words that ring from these dead lips, "I belong to the human race. I know no distinction of birth or color."

----oooooo----

19th St
opp. 4th ave Liberal Club.

John Brown.

John Brown was a moral paradox, which is another way of saying that ~~which~~ it is not easy from a conventional standpoint to pronounce ~~many~~ of his actions right or wrong. For instance, he was a hunter, an enthusiastic hunter; one to whom animal life was of little account. He ranged the forests in his boyhood to slay and kill the roaming beasts. We know this spectacle so familiar to us and so common, ~~that~~ and we would easily think that a boy who describes himself as a rambler in a wild, new country; finding birds and squirrels and sometimes a wild turkey nest, would be a callous, hard-hearted child, and yet as matter of fact, we find him ~~str~~ angely tender and recording as perhaps ~~his~~ the greatest sorrow of his early years as the finding and taming and petting and losing of a little bobtail squirrel. Then, too, he was himself a big vigorous animal in his youth; excessively fond, as he says, of the hardest and roughest kind of plays and could not get enough of it. Indeed when for a short time he was sometimes sent to school the opportunity that it offered to wrestle and snow-ball and run and jump and knock off old seedy wool hats offered to him almost the only compensation for the confinement and restraints of school." Yet it was this boisterous boy who writes these incidents of himself during the war of 1812: "During the war with England a circumstance occurred that in the end made him a most determined Abolitionist: and led him to declare, or swear: Eternal war with Slavery. He was staying for a short time with a very gentlemenly landlord once a United States Marshall who held a slave boy near his own age, very active, intelligent and good feeling; ad to whom John was under considerable obligation for numerous little acts of kindness. The master made a great pet of John: brought him to table with his first company; and friends; called their attention to every little smart thing he said, or did, and to the fact of his being more than a hundred miles from home with a company of cattle alone; while the negro boy (who was fully if not more than his equal) was badly clothed, poorly fed, and lodged in cold weather, and beaten before his eyes with Iron shovels or any thing that came first to hand. This brought John to reflect on the wretched; hopeless condition, of fatherless and motherless slave children, for such children have neither fathers nor mothers to protect and provide for them. We sometimes would raise the question, is God their Father?" // So, too in his early manhood the same apparent contradictions appear. John Brown lived at the time of the wonderful development of the United States in manufacture and industry which followed the war of 1812 and which rushed beyond ligitimate expansion and prosperity into wild speculation and common gambling. In these times John Brown was a business man and a speculator. He moved into the uplands of the Alleghanys and set up his busy tannery; was interested in a bank and speculated in land. He was rated not only as an excellent workman but as a shrewd and rising business man. But at the same time along side of this went the developing, that paradoxical other self, for he was writing this letter to his brother Frederick:

"Dear Brother: - As I have had only one letter from Hudson since you left here, and that some weeks since, I begin to get uneasy and apprehensive that all is not well I had satisfied my mind about it for some time, in expectation of seeing father here, but I begin to give that up for the present. Since you left me I have been trying to devise some means whereby I might to something in a practical way for my poor fellow-men who are in bondage, and having fully consulted the feelings of my wife and my three boys, we have agreed to get at least one negro boy or yough, and bring him up as we do our own, - viz., give him a good English education, learn him what we can about the history of the world, about business, about general subjects, and, above all, try to teach him the fear of God. We think of three ways to obtain one: First, to try to get some Christian slave-holder to release one to us. Second, to get a free one if no one will let us have one that is a slave. Third, if that does not succeed, we have all agreed to submit to considerable privation in order to buy one. This we are now using means in order to effect, in the confident expectation that God is about to bring them all out of the house of bondage.

I will just mention that when this subject was first introduced, Jason had gone to bed; but no sooner did he hear the thing hinted, than his warm heart kindled, and he turned out to have a part in the discussion of a subject of such exceeding interest. I have for years been trying to devise some way to get a school a-going here for blacks, and I think that on many accounts it would be a most favorable location. Children here would have no intercourse with vicious people of their kind, nor with openly vicious persons of any kind. There would be no powerful opposition influence against such a thing; and should there be any, I believe b settlement might be so effected in future as to have almost the whole influence of the place in favor of such a school. Write me how you would like to join me, and try to get on from Hudson and thereabouts some first-rate abolitionist families with you. I do honestly believe that our united exertions alone might soon, with the good hand of our God upon us, effect it all.

This has been with me a favorite theme of reflection for years. I think that a place which might be in some measure settled with a view to such an object would be much more favorable to such an undertaking than would any such place as Hudson, with all its conflicting interests and feelings; and I do think such advantages ought to be afforded the young blacks, whether they are all to be immediately set free or not. Perhaps we might, under God, in that way do more towards breaking their yoke effectually than in any other. If the young blacks of our country could once become enlightened, it would most assuredly operate on slavery like firing powder confined in rock, and all slaveholders know it well. Witness their heaven-daring laws against teaching blacks. If once the Christians in the free States would set to work in earnest in teaching the balcks, the people of the slaveholding States would find themselves constitutionally driven to set about the work of emancipation immediately. The laws of this State are now such that the inhabitants of any township may raise by a tax in aid of the State school-fund any amount of money they may choose by a vote, for the purpose of common schools, which any child may have access to by application. If you will join me in this undertaking, I will make with you any arrangement of our temporal concerns that shall be fair. Our health is good, and our prospects about business rather bringtening.

49-25-74

Affectionately yours,
JOHN BROWN.

1828

49-25-75

9

As John Brown grew to middle age the pioneer spirit grew in him. He had a longing to be with the advance guard of civilization on the edges of the world. As his fathers had pushed into Ohio from Connecticut so he pushed onward into W. Virginia and finally to Kansas, with the idea ever in his mind of felling the forests and tilling the soil and opening the wild world to human culture, and yet always in this work that other mysterious self was growing, so that it depends much upon the historical students' attitude of mind and predelections as to whether he calls John Brown a pioneer or an abolitionist, for down in W. Virginia he had his plans for education and abolition as well as for sheep raising and coal-mining, and in Kansas he gave up everything to push the great cause of freedom. But here again appears the paradox. There were many men in Kansas who stood for freedom, but freedom meant various things to various minds in that day as it does now. To the conservative like Governor Robinson it meant freedom for white men to work without danger of low wages; to John Brown it meant freedom for all men without color. They too to some freedom of every kind was worth a great deal but there were other things that were worth more. While John Brown could see no greater cause than the cause of freeing the slaves. When, therefore, the tide of politics and battle set strongly against the free-state cause in Kansas, the Peace Party began to do just as the peace party to day among the American Negroes are doing, that is, to give up the principle and make the best terms possible with the enemy; get all out of the situation as possible and supinely and readily acknowledge that the ideal or anything approaching the ideal of free manhood in America is impossible. John

10

Brown, however, was made of another stuff and did not believe in the policy of scuttle and surrender. He did not believe that any number of federal offices or of centenary celebrations could atone for the loss of the fundamental rights of manhood, and in the way in which he stood up for what he believed he again exhibited that curious moral paradox.

John Brown was a man of peace; of tender human sympathies. His daughter writes: "When any of the family were sick he did not often trust watchers to care for the sick one but set up himself and was like a tender mother. At one time he sat up every night for two weeks while mother was sick for fear he would over-sleep if he went to bed and then the fire would go out and she take cold." No one outside of his own family can ever know the mingled strength of his character. Yet this same man but a few years later, rose up from the ashes of the burnt free-state town of Lawrence, Kan., gathered a band of his sons and friends a out him and rode down to the most notorious pro-slavery resort in the neighborhood; there in the dead of night he and his band took five of the pro-slavery leaders from their beds and cut them down in cold blood outside of their homes. It was a terrible deed. It aroused Kansas to civil war; and the Kansas war aroused the Nation, and the Nation made Abraham Lincoln, president. But before that, there was further work for this rapidly ageing, gaunt, old, white haired man.

John Brown was essentially a law abiding man; studied in the lessons taught by the Hebrews; a strong disciplinarian in his own home; a stickler for the Rights of government; even when he planned his greatest deed of lawlessness he prefaced his work by careful and regular steps of legal semblance: a declaration of independence, a constitution, regularly elected officers; indeed a complete government, and then with that swift moral judgment he turned to Harper's Ferry and by a wild act of rebellion against state and government shook the very foundations of slavery in the United States, with all its great wall of legal and social defence. And finally, while condemned as a felon, cursed and execrated by the mass of men and in daily danger of lynch law, he preached from his prison cell with his incomparable letters a sermon on human freedom and justice and duty the exact parallel the world has seldom ~~never yet~~ seen. This then was the man. Not all of him. Not his whole life nor indeed the greater part of it, but the main points upon which the world for fifty years has been trying to pass moral judgment. And in trying tonight again to pass judgment upon this man and to interpre his meaning to us, let us first make clear the fact that no act of John Brown's life was in itself wrong: the hunter of beasts we have always with us in the world and he has his place; the speculating business man has always accompanied civilization; and the history of the world is the history of that organized murder which we call war. It is a little curious that we should honor Grant and Sherman and Lee despite the massacre of the Wilderness and the March from Atlanta to the Sea, and yet seek without question to condemn that first blow of the same Civil war in the Swamp of the Swan in Kansas. So too, the first battle of Harper's Ferry was in itself no more wrong than the last; both war and murder and insurrection we can but judge as we judge all human beings, by the motive and the result. Now, the motive of John

49-25-81

15

Brown was without shadow of doubt pure and noble. Few greater souls than his have arisen in America. His was not the shallow view of duty which knows the right and thinks it knows it intuitively; he struggled for the light.

The gloom and horror of life settled early on John Brown. His childhood had had little formal pleasure, his young manhood had been serious and filled with responsibility, and almost before he himself knew the full meaning of life, he was trying to teach it to his children. The iron of bitterness entered his soul with the coming of death, as it took away member after member of his family. In 1831 he lost a boy of four and in 1832 his first wife died insane, and her infant son was buried with her. In 1843 four children varying in ages from one to nine years were swept away. Two baby girls went in 1846 and 1850 and an infant boy in 1856. The struggle of a strong man to hold his faith is found in his words, "God has 49-25-82 seen fit to visit us with the pestilence and four of our number sleep in the dust; four of us that are still living have been more or less unwell. This has been to us all a bitter cup indeed and we have drunk deeply; but still the Lord reigneth and blessed be His holy name forever." Again three years later he writes his wife from the edge of a new-made grave: "I feel assured that notwithstanding that God has chastised us often and sore, yet He has not entirely withdrawn Himself from us not forsaken us utterly. The sudden and dreadful manner in which He has seen fit to call our dear little Kitty to take her leave of us, is, I need not tell you how much, in my mind. But before Him I will bow my head in submission and hold my peace. I have sailed over a somewhat stormy sea for nearly half a century, and have experienced enough to teach me thoroughly that I may most reasonably buckle up and be prepared for the tempest. Mary, let us try to maintain a cheerful self-command while we are tossing up and down, and let our motto still be action, action, - as we have but one life to live."

16

His soul gropes for light in the great darkness; "Sometimes my imagination follows those of my family who have passed behind the scenes; and I would almost rejoice to be permitted to make them a personal visit. I have outlived nearly half of all my numerous family, and I ought to realize that in any event a large proportion of my life is traveled over."

Then there rose grimly, as life went on in its humdrum round of failure and trouble, the thought that in some way his own sin and shortcomings were bringing upon him the vengeful punishment of God. He laments the fact that he has done little to help others and the world: "I feel considerable regret by turns that I have lived so many years and have in reality done so little to increase the amount of human happiness. I often regret that my manner is not more kind and affectionate to those I really love and esteem. But I trust my friends will overlook my harsh rough ways, when I cease to be in their way as an occasion of pain and unhappiness."

The death of a friend fills him with self-reproach: "You say he expected to die, but do not say how he felt in regard to the change as it drew near. I have to confess my unfaithfulness to my friend in regard to his most important interest. When I think how very little influence I have even tried to use with my numerous acquaintances and friends in turning their minds toward God and heaven, I feel justly condemned as a most wicked and slothful servant; and the more so as I have very seldom had any one refuse to listen when I earnestly called him to hear. I sometimes have dreadful reflections about having fled to go down to Tarshish."

4/9-25-65

Especially did the religious skepticism of his children, so like his own earlier wanderings, worry and dismay the growing man until it loomed before his vision as his great sin, calling for mighty atonement. He pleads with his older children continually: "My attachments to this world have been very strong and divine Providence has been cutting me loose, one cord after another. Up to the present time notwithstanding I have so much to remind me that all ties must soon be severed, I am still clinging like those who have hardly taken a single lesson. I really hope some of my family may understand that this world is not the home of man, and act in accordance. Why may I not hope this for you? When I look forward as regards the religious prospects of my numerous family - the most of them, - I am forced to say, and feel too, that I have

49-25-86

(p 20 missing)

see or my courage to hope. God grant you thorough conversion from sin, and full purpose of heart to continue steadfast in His way through the very short season you will have to pass."

And again he writes: "One word in regard to the religious belief of yourself and the ideas of several of my children. My affections are too deep-rooted to be alienated from them; but 'my gray hairs must go down in sorrow to the grave' unless the true God forgive their denial and rejection of Him and open their eyes."

And again: "I would fain hope that the spirit of God has not done striving in our hard hearts. (I sometimes feel encouraged to hope that my sons will give up their miserable delusions and believe in God and in His Son, our Saviour.")

All this is evidence of a striving soul, of a man ~~to whom~~ who saw the world ~~was~~ with neither the smug content of the man beyond religious doubt, nor the carelessness of the unharassed conscience. To him the world was a mighty drama. God was an actor in the play and so was John Brown. But just what his part was to be his soul in the long agony of years tried to know, and ever and again the chilling doubt assailed him lest he be unworthy of his place or had missed the call. Often the brooding masculine mind which demanded "Action! Action!" sought to pierce the mystic veil. His brother-in-law became a spiritualist, and he himself hearkened for voices from the Other Land. Once or twice he thought he heard them. Did not the spirit of Dianthe Lusk guide him again and again in his perplexity? He once said it did.

4/9-25-47

And so this saturation in Hebrew prophecy, the chastisement of death, the sense of personal sin and shortcoming and the voices from nowhere, deepened, darkened and broadened his religious life.

~~10~~

Yet with all this there went a peculiar common sense, a spirit of thrift and stickling for detail; a homely shrewd attention to all the little facts of daily existence. Sometimes this prosaic tinkering with things burdened, buried and submerged the spiritual life and striving. There was nothing left except the commonplace, unstable tanner, but ever as one is tempted thus to fix his place in the world, there wells up surging spiritual life out of great unfathomed depths - the intellectual longing to see, the moral wistfulness of the hesitating groping doer. This was the deeper, truer man, although it was not the whole man. "Certainly I never felt myself in the presence of a stronger religious influence than while in this man's house," said Frederick Douglass in 1847.

But pure and untramelled as men may be in this world, after all we, as finite beings, must in the end judge men by the result, and when we come to this judgment we find the same great difficulty of opinion; the same duelism of purpose in each and all of us as it stands forth to us clearly in the life of John Brown. It is the world fight of the practical and ideal, of the man, that feels on the one hand that he ought to settle down and earn an honest, quiet living and on the other hand is urged forward by some great quest of the Holy Grail. It is the duelism of the man who would both rest quietly and comfortably at home, and on the other hand go forth to discover the unknown things of earth and life. It is the old fight between peace and endurance, on the one hand and discontent and aggression on the other; between submitting to circumstances and fighting for the Cause. Which is right? We cannot say off-handed but we can recall certain great lessons of history. It is perfectly possible that without John Brown we should still have slavery in the United States. Certainly everything was ranging in the latter fifties for compromise and submission to the demands of the slave power. To be sure further extension of slave territory toward the West and the Northwest was probably out of the question but there was on the other hand a chance for indefinite extension of slave empire toward the Tropics and the South, but such peaceful solution of the great human problem John Brown made impossible; ~~but~~ however he did it, at a bitter cost: at the cost of the Civil war in Kansas, which was a disgrace to civilization; at a cost of red murder and insurrection, but the question is if the cost that John Brown paid, added to the more terrific cost of the Civil War, was too much to pay for human freedom. To take another illustration: there was a day when practily the magnificent organization reared by the Catholic Church in the middle age was in serious danger of internal decay. Compromise after compromise had been accepted and reform after reform had been urged but not until Martin Luther, placing himself definitely outside the Church and in opposition to it, made himself the center of reform, did real reform begin both within and without the Catholic Church. And so to come back again to our own day, we all have known a young man who was teacher in the a school at Atlanta Ga., apparently an ordinary man, earning an ordinary living. The combined advice of all worldly-wise people would have been: Stick to your work; hold to your job, and earn a modest living. Yet Henry O. Tanner had a dream - a dream of things impossible to most men . He dropped the reality and followed the dream and that is the reason his name means something to us tonight. Thinking over such examples of the eternal conflict between the real present fact and the ideal vision, what must be our decision as to what we ~~must~~ ought to do? Must we be always ready to give up the substance for the mirage or must we be always too wise to exchange possible future for present fact? The truth is that both attitudes of mind are at times right. But that does not mean that they are both right at the same time. There are times when the world needs and must have the sword of Gideon like John Brown and there are other times when it needs the wise, compromising statesman like Abraham Lincoln. To say that John Brown was right does not mean that Lincoln was wrong, nor does the praise of Lincoln's optimism imply necessarily condemnation to Brown's radicalism. If we look over the rhythm of history we can find continually in varying ways this development taking place. A time of quite persistent advance among men or portions of them - an advance which because of its successes becomes slower and slower and less and less noticeable until the forward movement quietly and unobtrusive ceases and the backward slower retrogressive movement replaces it. Once the forces of reaction in the saddle and before people know it the retrogression is swifter and swifter until there comes trouble, unrest and even physical violence which we call war. If the war for the right is won the people of the Nation are aroused and there is riot, turmoil, and heathless pressing forward; mistakes are made; the forward movement becomes slower and slower and then before we know it the slow retrogression has set in again. This great rhythm of history does not always take just these lines, and yet again and again we can trace much of this general development; and the kind of leader that is needed depends, I need not say, upon the phase of development in which the Nation finds itself. In times of

~~11~~

~~18~~

29

~~15~~

quiet persistent advance it is perfectly possible that the opportunist should have his day, that to the man who complains and says that our advance is not fast enough; we are not reachin the heights, ~~it is sufficient to~~ learned say, nevertheless, we are advancing and if we have not reached, we have at least approached the heights, and as long as the world is moving on in ~~the right in~~ the right direction it is best to let well enough alone. || On the other hand, when we come to the period of slow advancement and the beginnings of retrogression, then is the day when the views of the complainer and the dreamer and idealist can not and must not lightly be hushed; then is the time when careful thought and just prophesy and successful interpretations of the lessons of the past can save a nation and a group infinite trouble and harm. That is the day when men can be reasoned with and shown the threatening future and that is the day, as I see it, is now facing the Negro race in America. It is not yet the time that calls for another sacrifice of a John Brown and the horror of physical resistence and war, but it is one of those great turning points of history, where with quiet persistence and unwavering determination the idealist may say to the thoughtless satisfaction of the opportunist, there is danger ahead and this is the time to correct it, and if John Brown has left any legacy to America it is this great legacy of warning, lest the same denial of human rights; the placing of moral successes before moral justification will lead men in America and in the world to the terrible result of the past.

30

JOHN BROWN.

I am to tell you to-night of a man whose life was a failure and yet one who in his failufes made a most triumphant success;and I speak of this all the more willingly because as John Brown himself said the great bulk of mankind estimate each others actions and motives by the measure of success or otherwise that attends them through life. Consequently in this fevered age especially we continually put the criterion of success as the one thing which determines whether or not a man's life is great. Did he do something; did he accomplish deeds? Then by that token he was great. Nor are we careful always to make a distinction as to whether the things which he has done are good or not. We call Napoleon great in the same breath that pronounces . also great;we come to consider that if a man accomplishes a deed for that reason the world should honor him. And yet this, of course, is not so. The world's honor should go not simply to the man who does the thing, but to the man who does the thing well and those things too worth the doing. Also honor must go to the man who tries to do good and fails. Failure in a good cause is worth more applause than success in a bad one. As I have said John Brown's life measured by nearly every yard stick was a failure: Five especial and conspicuous failures I want to point to you to-night. First, there was the matter of his education; his training for life; he was a poor boy, poor not only in wealth but in parentage, in his social, surroundings having none of the great advantages of the modern world. His training had to come for the most part in the midst of his work and it was hard work; manual toil on the frontiers of life. Yet he had his ambition and his dream; some members of his family in other days, some neighbors had gone off to the great school of New England and he wanted to go too. So at last when he was an over-grown lad of nineteen he took his little store of goods and came to Plainfield Mass., where there was a little school in which men were fitted for Amherst college; he was a homely boy and gawky. He brought along with him leather and soled his shoes and even brought new precious book; he brought indomitable will and a determination never to be discouraged, and yet at the very threshold he failed. He was unable on account of a disease of his eyes to carry on his study and he had to turn back homeward and confess that it would be impossible that he should receive a liberal education. He came back home and took up the work which his father had taught him, namely the trade of tanning. Now the tanners trade is one of great importance in this country's history and in the world's development. It calls for care and skill and John Brown learned the trade . He carried it on in his father's tanning shop in eastern Ohio and western Pennsylvania until the establishment became one of considerable size and importance, Yet in spite of that the business went down in the panic of 1857, and John Brown became not only a bankrupt but for a few days was actually in jail. Then he turned again after some days of bewilderment and deep sorrow and entered into business. It happened in this way: From a boy as he writes he had a certain fasination for the calling of shepherd . He bought a small flock of sheep and managed to sustain them by helping to take care of other flocks. Gradually the sheep under his care became the most valuable flock in the United States. Then he saw how the wool business was developing; he became the agent for other wool- gxxx growers, and in partnership with a rich man established a ware-house in Springfield, Mass. There his business prospered. Thousands of dollars a year passed through his hands; wealth even was in sight and he within less than ten years after the business was established, it had failed. He was harassed with loses after loses and people were him with his lack of business sense. So again he had to look back upon work unaccomplished or poorly done. Piled upon that came the fourth failure. In the midst of all his thoughts of education his work as an argument and his work as a merchant/he had gradually come to have more and more one great object in life, And that was because in his younger days he had met the slave boy; the boy had been kind to him and yet he found to his astonishment that this boy, as bright and good as he was was nevertheless without father and mother and subjected to the most brutal treatment. He could not understand it until he found that the boy was a slave and then he asked, Is God the father of the slave too? From that day not suddenly but gradually gathering imputence with the years, John Brown came to hate slavery with perfect hatred and when at last in I854 three of his sons decided to go to Kansas, he stopped and listened for the call. Even before that he had his design upon slavery, he had hoped to found a school and teach the slaves, he had hoped to go South and own a plantation and spread sedition among the slaves; he had thought of various plans. But here came more and more distinct the call to go and fight for freedom in Kansas, and he went. His object was not to make Kansas a slave state; his object was to attack slavery throughout the nation by fighting against it in Kansas. But the people with whom he was fighting had no such broad ideas. They did not hate slavery they simply hated slaves; they wanted to get rid of Negroes; they wanted to establish a state where there were no Negro slaves and no free Negroes, where both alike were excluded, where no suffrage could be granted to Negroes. For this gradually they became willing and more and more eager to fight. John Brown tried to lead them further, when he saw them willing to compromise he struck a terrible blow for freedom. On one wild night he and his companions rode down in the midst of a pro-slavery den and in cold blood killed five of the worst of the border-ruffians, left their mangled bodies lying there and their wives and children wailing. The deed was a terrible one; it startled all Kansas; it began the claim of civil war; it made people fight for freedom when they were about to compromise and give up the battle. But even after that they were not willing to go very far. Just as soon as there were signs of some yielding on the part of the pro-slavery party they threw down their arms and made Kansas a free state, but determined under no circumstances to oppose slavery no where else. When that had happened John Brown saw that in his chief reason for coming to Kansas he had failed, and he quietly laid down his arms

46-25-2

46-25-3

49-25-4

49-25-5

49-25-6

It was the fourth great failure of his life. Yet one thing there was about this man's failing it never doubted him, he never hesitated. Today when any of us fail in two or three things we begin to get superstitious; we begin to think that we had better give up the object with which we started out. If for instance we are starting out and asking for the Negro people of the United States their full rights as American citizens, and if on top of that we find a supreme court decision against us, a newspaper editorial condemning our views, no notoriety or praise for those of us who stand for these particular . If all this happens to us we are apt to throw up our hands and give up the battle and say we must stand for those things in which there is a chance for success., now. To fight for things which we cannot win right off is foolish. John Brown, however, had no such ideas; he hesitated and wavered no more after his fourth failure than he did after his first. He determined to shake slavery to its foundation. His idea had been, even before he came to Kansas, that the place to attack slavery was in the Alleghany mountains. He said once quietly but with terrible impressiveness, God made those mountains from the beginning of the world as a way of escape for the slaves. Having failed in his object in Kansas therefore, he came back again to the Alleghany mountains with a determination to organize a great raid into the south which should succeed in freeing larger and larger numbers of slaves. The plans which he had were startling bold. He intended to enter the south at that mighty gate-way known as Harper's Ferry where the Shenandoah and the Potomac rivers hurling themselves against the mast of the mountains, and cut their way to the side. Passing across the rivers there, and penetrating the great mountain fastnesses, he intended there to make a series of strongholds and to entice small numbers of slaves from time to time into the mountains and to make raids upon the plantations for food and clothes, and so retreat southward along the Great Black Way, because beginning with the mountains at Harper's Ferry one can pass in a continuous line down south and southwest to Louisiana through counties which in John Brown's time, and even today, contain a majority of black folk. If once those people could be started in small numbers to escaping systematically through this mighty highway, John Brown argued that slavery in the South could be made so unstabled that it would have to be given up. He did not plan for a wholesale slave insurrection; he did not plan for bloody vengeance upon the masters, no such idea had any place in his thoughts; he did plan to make the slaves free by a bloodless but effective resistance and organizations among themselves. He started about the carrying out of this plan with the utmost care and forethought. In Canada among the fugitive slaves who had gone there and were possessed of property and an independent spirit. He gathered in I858 a convention composed principally of Negroes. They adopted a constitution suited to the kind of guerilla war-fare which Brown determined to carry out. He gathered a number of recruits and passed the declaration of Independance , then with a small number of men, one -third of whom were Negroes, he silently and secretly moved to Harper's Ferry on the I7th of October Fifty years ago struck the blow heard round the world. Within a few hours he was a prisoner; half of his men and more were killed , and a few had escaped. As he lay weltering in his own blood on the floor of the fort which he had defended, he said "calmly," My name is John Brown, I have been well-known as Old Brown of Kansas; two of my sons were killed here today and I am dying too. I came here to liberate the slaves and was to receive no reward, I have acted from a sense of duty and am content to await my fate. I am an old man, and yesterday I could have killed whom I chose but had no desire to kill any person. I could have sacked and burned the town but did not; I have treated the persons whom I took as hostages kindly

29-25-7

49-25-8

49-25-4

If I had succeeded in running off slaves this time I could have raised twenty times as many men as I have now for a similar expedition, but I have failed." This then was a life of a man. Could there be on the surface a more complete record of failure? He was born at the beginning of the nineteenth century and migrated to Ohio when a lad of five; he married when he was twenty-one and raised a great family. His bankrupt came in I837, then he started into the wool business in I84I but had to leave it in I854. He went to Kansas a year later and stayed there for a year; his convention in Canada took place in I858; in I859 his raid at Harper's Ferry was made, and in December of that year, fifty years ago, he was hanged at Charleston, W. Va.

And yet despite all that we are celebrating his martyrdom today, and we are doing beaause despite all appearance there was something more than mere failure in John Brown's lack of apparent success. Whenever you see a failure in the world it pays to ask why the thing has failed and your judgement of it must depend largely upon that reason. Simply to fail is no mark of condemnation. Every thing depends upon the reason, moreover, failures depend largely upon time. A thing which is apparently a failure today may not be a failure tomorrow, and life which is a failure may after death prove to have been an astounding success. Let us, therefore, go back and ask again for the reason of some of John Brown's failure.

The first thing that confronts us is the matter of his failure to get an education. The reason was something beyond his control; he had been working outdoors all his life; he had been working in a tannery which was especially bad on the eyes; It was perfectly natural that when he came to use his eyes in close application it should be found that the inflamation which set up made it impossible. Now here was a failure and an exasperating failure but a failure that had nothing to do with character; a failure that was not the cause of anything that John Brown had done amist. Moreover, although, he did fail to get the formal education of the school, yet such a failure is not irretrieveable. A school is a short cut to knowledge, but if men cannot take the short way to a thing they can round the highway, and if they have the pluck to go round it may easily happen that they will get more for their fame than the man who does not appreciate the short cut. Every one who can ought to save his time and the time of the world by getting a formal education, but no one cannot do that ought by any means to despair. John Brown of all men never despaired; he lost no time because of that initialed difficulty.

49-25-11

Now again when it came to the work of John Brown as an there is another phase of apparent failure at which we must look. When you see a carpenter, how do you judge his success? We judge him to-day, I regret to remind you, by the amount of money he is making. You say such and such a carpenter is a successful man because he has an income, because he lives on such and such a scale. But after all that is not the honest way of judging a man's work. A carpenter ought to be judged not by the money he gets but by the work he does. Of course, in any perfect society the reward of a man would not be measured by the goodness of his work, but we all know that in the imperfect society in which we live, this is not so. It is not the man who does the best work that necessarily earns the most money. When, therefore, we judge the success or the failure of a man who is working with his hands or working with his brain, we must not make these two criterions of failure.

49-25-12

A man may be a good carpenter and be poor, and a man may be a poor carpenter and get rich. John Brown was a good tanner, when he went off to school he carried some little bits of sheepskin only an eighth of an inch wide. The boys in the school tried to break them they could not, John Brown had them seven years. The principal of the school looked at him mockingly and said" I shall snap this in two, but the tall brave young countryman stood and saw him try and strain in vain. There was absolutely no doubt about the fact that John Brown was an excellent tanner, one of the best of his day, an honest tanner who would not sell wet leather unless he received money for water and not for leather. Yet despite of this he failed but the failure was due to no lack of excellency in his work; it was due to the unfortunate economic organization of this land in 1837, which made it possible for honest hard working people to have their fortunes swept away because speculators and drones and dishonest men could get hold of the reward which ought to have gone to honest industry. The panic of 1837 was a panic brought on by speculation . Speculation is simply gambling. It was the gamblers therefore of the day that made John Brown fail. There was nothing of disgrace in such a failure, but there was a great deal of sorrow and suffering. Out of two such failures as these as I have related could come and did come a strong chaste of character. A man whose face though young was already graven with wrinkles of trouble but who nevertheless was steadfast and honest and straight-forward , and absolutely certain that God had a great work for him to do in the world. Then came his chance to go into the wool business;he hailed it as an auspicious opening. But when John Brown went into business he understood business to be a philanthropy, that is he understood that if he went into business for the good of the people and not simply for his own good. Now today we are coming to see that public business is a public trust, for the good of all people;that business is a philanthropy. We are coming to see it we do not quite see it yet; it is not yet true but it is going to be true as time goes on. In John Brown's day people did not recognize that. They thought a man who went into business for anything else but his own gain was a fool, and they so managed in practically all cases as to prove that man as a fool before the world. John Brown knew the wool business. He was one of themost expert sorters of the wool that the United States has seen, he was one of the best raisers of sheep that could be gotten; his tenderness toward the sheep and lambs was only exceeded by his tenderness toward human beings. He put his whole soul and thought into his work. He soon came to see that the wool business needed to be organized and directed, that as it was the wool was gathered in a haphazard manner and sold by people who had very little idea of its worth, and bought in turn by people who did not know how to grade it, and yet the best kind buy themselves. John Brown undretook to buy wool, to grade it and to sell it at a reasonable price. In that way he did a greatvdeal for the wool industry of the United States, and not only were the wool growers thankful, but the manufacturers of woolen cloth. However, the manaufacturers of woolen cloth soon came to see that John Brown was demanding a high price for his wool. He said that it was fair that he should, that he was demanding no higher price than similar wools were selling for in England. They, however, said that he could make his fortune if he would sell wool to them more cheaper. He refused. Then they began to boycott him, nevertheless he kept straight on his way. He said this wool is worth so much money; it is fair that the wool-growers receive this amount for it; if you do not want to get it then leave it alone.

49-25-13

14-25-14

49-25-13

The difficulty, however, with this position was that John Brown was not master of the market. And while his wool was of undoubted goodness, nevertheless, if the wool buyers refused to buy of him they could starve him out. When he saw that they were doing this he said " I will take my wool to England and sell it" But here he reckoned without a for the English people are people of strong prejudice. (prestiges?) They did not believe that wool grown in America was good, they would not believe the evidence of their own sense and consequently although they said that apparently John Brown wool was excellent, they would not buy it at his price. The venture cost John Brown so much money that he had to go out of business. Here it was an undoubted failure. But it after all was a kind of failure in which the lover of human nature takes delight. It was a failure of a man with a great ideal beaten by selfishness and narrow-prejudice. No man ever impugned John Brown's honesty; no man impugned him to kill; no man said for a moment that he was not trying to do the best for the wool trade. The greatest criticism that was brought against him was that he missed the opportunity of making a fortune. Such a failure is not a failure. It is a man of life.

49-25-17

While then John Brown had made these three failures nevertheless he had in his heart a greater thing to accomplish than success in any of these three things would have brought. He looked upon slavery as the sum of all villainies, he was determined to be rid of it. Nevertheless when he turned toward Kansasa he could not convince men that slavery in itseelf was a great evil, and that simply to bring in one new free state was not settling the matter. He saw even more clearly than Abraham Lincoln saw that this country could not exist half slave and half free. He believed that with a comparatively small number of men and with some but little bloodshed he could get rid of slavery. He tried it in Kansasabut the men with whom he had to deal there were politicians and compromisers and they never realized how great a soul they were dealing with until he had gone. They still acknowledge today that John Brown made Kansas a free state, but they do not acknowledge that their own obtuseness and blindness kept John Brown from possibly from warding off Civil war. When now, he turned toward Harper's Ferry. His failure was not due to any defect in his plan. It is possible that the plan which he had in mind could not have been carried out, but the more we look upon the map and the organization which he had the more it seems possible and even probable that had it not been for extraordianry and unwarranted delay on the part of the men who left on the northern side of the Potomac river that John Brown might have carried out his ideas. As a matter of fact he captured Harper's Ferry without snaping a gun; he had the whole arsenal at his mercy; he held the town. If his supply, wagons and ammunition had come up he might have escaped to the southward in the great fastnesses of the Alleghany mountains and it would have been, to say the least, an extremely difficult thing to dislodge him. Fully twenty-five slaves helped in the raid and hundreds of others were ready to help when once he had made his escape to the mountains. The men, however, who were bringing on the guns and ammunition delayed an unconscionable time. Instead of arriving at the Ferry at ten o'clock in the morning which they easily could have done, four o'clock in the afternoon still found them lingering. By that time the militia had gathered and John Brown was hemmed in. Even then if he had been willing to shed the blood of his hostages he might of escaped but he would not do it. There again, the failure was tremendous but the dream was glorious. And if by the killing of a few men John Brown had been able to make slave property so unsafe in the South that the South had voluntarily freed the slaves, think of the tremendous savings that there would have been in treasure and in human life. Out then of the five great failures of John Brown's life came a tremendous triumph, and that triumph was three fold. First, it produced a man; secondly it laid before the world the supreme technical of an unselfish sacrifice, and thirdly it brought freedom to four million of human beings.

47-25-14

40-25-19

30-26-4

(+) What is there now in the present condition of our race that should cause us apprehension. Our progress has been undeniable — point and criticise you will weaknesses and short comings, and still the forward movement cannot be disputed. Why not then rest easy, keep up the progress and accelerate it, stop complaint and let well enough alone. Certainly the program of do nothing and say nothing ~~is~~ attractions & is comfortable. Few people voluntarily choose the darker and look — few normal minds prefer complaint & applause And yet the very comfortableness of the doctrine warns us to be watchful. ~~Good~~ If we look around us carefully we shall note a tremendous change in public opinion the world over touching us & our interests — a change so gradually and momentous [redacted] that no sane man can see it incessant alarm and action

& Yield all has to.

30-26-5

To realize the full weight & meaning of this new altitude let us return & the philosophy of John Dewey & see how he viewed the world and us.

30-26-6

undated

38-13-260

RACE PREJUDICE

It is easy to realize the historical place which human prejudices have held in the development of mankind. They have epitomized the experience of the fathers handed down to the children for their guidance in a fight with a hard world. Without such traditions and prejudices human society might have survived but it could not have made those advances which distinguish mankind from other animals. It is right, therefore, that we should look upon the history of prejudice as in a sense the history of human endeavor to preserve the best of the past and hand it down to help the future. At the same time, it is equally true that more error than truth has thus been handed down from father to son and that thw work of men has long been

38-13-201

to sift from the heritage of the past those assumptions which were untrue and false and mischievous, and to transmit the residue as the real heritage of mankind. The method of accomplishing this has always been to apply the criterian of thought and reason to the mass of given prejudice, and in so far as men have allowed reason and truth to guide the character of their prejudices in just so far has human advance been real and rapid.

So that while we, who stand as inheritors of Yesterday, may today receive with no little pride the mass of judgement which our forefathers have handed down to us, we will receive it with all the more equanimity and faith if we know that the unerring yardstick of trained reason will measure and value it. The history then of the triumph of reason and truth over fear and prejudice is the history of civilization, and when we look to see the work which human culture has yet to accomplish among men we look instinctively at the last bulwarks of prejudice which lie in the realm of Religion and Race. It is perfectly natural that prejudice should reign in the realm of the Unknown; since religion is designed to interpret the Unknown and Unknowable, and race is the present emphasis laid on the characteristics of people who know each other least. It is natural, therefore, that here we should meet the last great resting-place of deep-seated and long cherished prejudice.

38-13-262

38-13-2b3

The history of the advance of reason in the dark and awful forests of religious prejudice is a story that asks for more than one chapter of its own! It is my task this evening to speak more particular of prejudices of race. They are to be sure more or less connected with religious or other prejudices but it is perhaps fairly true to say that today the racial aspect of religious prejudice and indeed the racial aspect of nearly all of the larger and more widespread prejudices of mankind is the one which is at once the most appalling and the one which demands the most careful attention; it demands attention more particularly because it is apt to express itself in the most unobtrusive and harmless form.

38-13-264

It comes ###### more often as a mere matter of likes and dislikes so diaphanous and unimportant that men do not wish to attribute it to the harsher word, prejudice. They say: "I have no prejudice against Japanese. I would not harm them; I simply do not like them." or "I do not wish ill to negroes, but I do not want to associate with them," or again "Jews and Chinese and Indians have, I am ready to admit, their places in the world but I do not wish that place to be too near my own." The argument that begins thus lightly and even flippantly is apt, however, if followed to become larger and reappear in a different form with more subtle and farreaching reasons would stigmatize or traduce or decry any of the less popular races in the United States. Under such circumstances the work of science in settling the questions which race prejudice bring to the front is abnormally slow. Science does not and cannot answer quickly with Yes or No. It must wait through long years of experiment and repeated questioning, and when that experiment and questioning is hindered by frank endeavor to mislead and by unconscious thirsting for evidence to prove an already assumed conclusion, the work of the scientist is doubly hard.

[pp 6-7 missing]

58-13-265

Meantime, however, while men are waiting for the final word of science as to the physical status and mental ability and moral worth of various groups of men, mean time men are living and working and dying; hearts are throbbing; human souls are suffering; and the assumption that some people make, that here is a case where waiting costs little or nothing to human advance, is an assumption ludicrously, indeed criminally untrue. This racial prejudice exhibited today all over the world, and nowhere more viciously than here in America, is not a matter of mere whim. It is a mass of assumptions and judgments, the holding of which is costing Civilization a tremendous sum - a sum that can be measured only in part by money and is more properly measured in the retarded foot-steps of human advance and the increase of human suffering.

23-13-82

Let us note some of the obvious elements of this cost. As I have said before, racial prejudice rested primarily upon the

[pp 10-12 MISSING]

38-13-278

~~A7~~ 25 13

where they are not known to exist or to ignore talent and desert because it does not appear where you would prefer to see it. Taking then this practical stand the true citizen of the world will refuse further to pay the cost of racial prejudices and will lay down five rights which every sane grown inhabitant of the world as it exists should demand: first, the right to INDIVIDUALITY, and I mean by this the right to his own color and his own way of thinking and to his own prejudices so far as these things do not interfere with other people's rights to the same things. People continually say to the Negro race and to other races "We can settle this matter of color in a few hundred years because you will be by that time absorbed into the American people." But that will be no solution. What I ask of a civilized world is a world where it is possible to be black and see black

26

yet be treated as a man and unhindered in development.

38-13-279

38-13-267

prejudice. The third cost is the imparrment of national efficiency through disease. The slums of Northern cities, the black South, the tropics and semi-tropics of the world are today made pest-houses for the spread of disease because most people come slowly to believe that sick foreigners, "dagos", brown and black folk are not really worth saving. Something very like a hymn of praise would go up in this land if the next census showed Negroes to be decimated by consumption. Only when men realize that disease is no respecter of races do they awake to this cost of race prejudice.

A fourth cost of this prejudice is in the condition of women. We have so long been used to flattering the women of cultured nations boasting of their high eminence above their darker sisters that it is hard for us to realize that white women cannot remain far above the degradation of these same darker sisters; that their pre-eminence has in a large degree been built upon and has been the cause of that degradation, and that that degradation knows neither race or color and can be found as well in New York or Paris or London as it can in South America or Central Africa. The question of the uplift of women to a place of economic independence and political freedom is one that never can be answered so long as most of the women of the world are regarded as the rightful prey of irresponsible and debauched men. It is perfectly easy for those who have helped degrade womankind to sneer at the virtue and capacity of the degraded. And this whether it takes place in New Orleans or New York, whether it is an expression of race prejudice or of class prejudice amounts to the same thing, namely, the despising of human beings; and it is another one of those tremendous costs which the civilized world is paying today for the privilege of indulging in its whims and prejudices.

38-13-268

28-13-269

In the same way I might call to your mind the matter of child labor. Great advertisement and sensation has been raised in the United States recently because of the disclosure of the wide extent to which children are being used as beasts of burden, and practically every attempt to illiminate that situation has been confined to the white children of the North and South. Almost nothing has been said of the widespread and almost universal Negro child labor of the South. Yet, everybody knows the way in which Negro children are used systematically and regularly as the ligitimate tools of exploitation in one group of industries and among one group of people. It is practically impossible to stop the spread of such an evil to other groups. The capitalist who invests money in the South and can make dividends on black child labor is not going to be squeamish if his dividends are increased by white child labor and it is, therefore, perfectly natural to see going on with the expanding industries of the South a worse public school system for Negro children than existed twenty years ago - in other words, the desire and endeavor to stop and suppress the spread of intelligence among black people. Why? Because intelligence spoils labor; intelligence spoils house-servants; in the 19th Century intelligence spoiled the early factory system of England; intelligence will spoil the present plantation system of the South. All this is historical and inevitable. If present labor conditions are to proceed in the South then the public schools for Negroes must go. Ignorance must be more and more the rule, and this definitely entertained program of ignorance among children is another cost of race prejudice in the United States.

38-13-270

But above and beyond these more or less material costs comes a cost of prejudice more indefinite and yet greater than perhaps all the others together: that is the distinct retrogression today in the spirit of humanity. A careful observer may see it everywhere: he may view it in the appalling increase of unpunished murder; in the recrudescence in delight in public torture; in the careless contemplation of human suffering and in the widespread and noticeable hilarity over the systematic humiliation of human beings. We would have to go back many hundred years to match the present low ebb of the feeling of human brotherhood in certain broad fields and this is due mainly to the increase and nourishing of unreasoning and unreasonable prejudices against certain human beings solely because of race.

28-13-271

38-13-272

Moreover, human prejudices grow to by what they feed upon and one of their worst effects is the killing of human individuality. We have just passed through a great century of levelling; we have wanted to make men of one pattern, and now finding that this is impossible, instead of accepting the verdict we have tried to rush to the conclusion that any people who cannot be made upon the one pattern should be exterminated; from this argument in the physical realm it is but a step to the spiritual realm, and to the extermination of all thought and desire that does not agree with ours. Consequently, today we see a group of prejudices which are altogether abnormal and which arise because people dare not follow their own likes and dislikes. The average child and the average foreign emmigrant and indeed the average American has very little racial prejudice. Black children and white children have played together in the South for ~~numbers of years~~ centuries never knowing until they were laboriously told that color made all the difference in the world. All kinds and sorts of people meet and mingle in New York and most of them would not know and would not care about differences of race - indeed would be disposed consciously and gladly to live in a realm above such differences did they not have it pointed out to them and forced upon their minds that survival in America is impossible for black , improbable for red men and undesirable for any one not of English descent. The result is now a current demand for equality and similarity - similarity in thought; similarity in likes and dislikes; similarity in dress, and similarity in the degree in which one hates Negroes. Here we have a growth not of prejudice but of all the outward signs of prejudice - a growth all the more bitter and dangerous because it is not only beyond reason, as all prejudice is, but it is even beyond instinct which real honest prejudice is not; it is simply a desire to outdo ones neighbors in hurting the feelings of the helpless. This is the reason why in the South some of the worst people for the Negroes to get along with are not the native Southerners but the transplanted Northerners who are trying to show their recently acquired aristocracy. So throughout all America some of the worst jingoes and fighters of Japan and the East and haters of ~~the~~/Mongrel South America are not native Americans but new-comers, eager to make peace by emulating the worst American characteristics.

38-13-273

38-13-274

The end of course, of this whole tendency is a monstrous assumption that the world of the future is going to consist of the progeny of a few people whom we think ought to be in our racial set. Here in America the unspoken assumption is that this future wonder-land is to consist primarily of people of English descent.

28-13-275

58-13.276

Jews and American Indians may be admitted, if they will deny themselves of their Jewish rights and Indian color and pass into the melting pot, but not otherwise; Germans may be admitted if they will try to be as little German as possible; Frenchmen if they will not be too Latin; Negroes and mulattoes are to be left out under all circumstances; Japanese, Chinese and East Indians are to be excluded if the power to exclude them can be found.

Here then we have the situation, the recrudescence of racial prejudices which is causing war and labor injustice; the danger to health; the subjection of women and the increase of ignorance and the narrowing of human brotherhood; and as the realm of this prejudice becomes greater more and more people begin to think it is a sign of aristocracy; and together with this goes [redacted] the assumption of an aristocratic world of the future on the most whimsical basis of appearance and descent. Under such circumstances it is certain that modern civilization cannot afford the continually increasing cost of racial prejudice and continue to advance. On the other hand, it is also certain that no final scientific dictum on the abilities and desert of mankind can be looked for in a hundred years or more. What then must be the practical path to peace and humanity? It must be assumed that a normal human being, regardless of race or color has a natural right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It is right and just to recognize differences of individual endowment and desert, but it is wrong and dangerous to assume differences Second, the right to public courtesy. This world from now on is going to be a world of contact of races. It is going to be utterly impossible to seperate and isolate men. In the past contact meant war, caste and slavery, but today it must not and cannot mean ### these for these will cost too much to be indulged in. If then this is to be a world of contact, each being in it has the right of public courtesy; to visit public places without insult and to travel in public conveyances unmolested, and to be entertained in public hostelries. Any denial of these rights is not only wrong but in the end suicidal for it attempts to assume that the advantages of community life belong to a few people in the community, and are the exclusive property of those who have benefited most by that community life - a monstrous and revolutionary assumption. As a citizen of the world of men I have the right to contact with that world, and so far as that contact is of public and general nature no one can in justice and decency deny it to me.

38-13-277

31-9-10

Third, a citizen of the world should have the right of opportunity. We used to say the right of education, but this demand should be broadened to the right of opportunity; the right to be educated in his childhood and then to have the doors of economic and political development thrown open to him according to his ability. Herein lies the answer to that great search for ability which human culture must make. Hitherto we have said not that we must have men of ability but they must be English or that they must belong to the first families. Now the Lord in his great wisdom did not confine the ability to acquire wisdom to any one class of people, but distributed to men of any races and all degrees of color, and this ability must be found and honored and put in command regardless of prejudice.

23-b-13

Fourth, the citizen of the New World must have the right of peace. The protection from force and violence in the prosecution of work, and this cannot be done until a stop is put to war and lynching and peonage and wage-slavery.

Fifth, he has a right to the truth. If he has a right to be protected against physical violence he has a great right to protection against moral lies. Race prejudice in this land could not stand for a day if as much effort was made to have the truth in regard to all human beings known as is now made in trying to spread lies about them.

38-13-280

lies about them.

These, then, are the five rights which all men, white and black, and of all religions have a right to demand: the right to Individuality; the right to Public Courtesy; the right to Opportunity; the right to Peace, and the right to Truth; and when men have these five rights the last bulwarks of prejudice must fall.

Race Prejudice.

It is easy to realize the historical place which human prejudices have held in the development of mankind. They have epitomized the experiences of the fathers handed down to the children for their guidance in a fight with a hard world. Without such traditions and prejudices human society might have survived but it could not have made those advances which distinguish mankind from other animals. It is right therefore, that we should look upon the history of prejudice as in a sense the history of human endeavor to preserve the best of the past and hand it down to help the future. At the same time it is equally true that more error than truth has thus been handed down from father to son and that the work of men has long been to sift from the heritage of the past those assumptions which were untrue and false and mischievous and to transmit the residue as the real heritage of mankind. The method of accomplishing this has always been to apply the criterian of thought and reason to the mass of given prejudice, and in so far as men have allowed reason and truth to guide the charater of their prejudices in just so far has human advance been real and rapid. So that while we who stand as heritors of yesterday may today receive with no little pride the mass of judgement which our forefathers have handed down to us, We will receive it with all the more equanimity and faith we know that the unerring yard stick of trained reason will measure and value it. The history then of the triumph of reason and truth over fear and prejudice is the history of civilization and when we look to see the work which human culture has yet to accomplish among men we look instinctively at ~~this~~ the last bulwarks of prejudice which lie in tne realm of Religion and Race. It is perfectly natural tha: prejudice should reign in the realm of the Unknown; ~~and~~ since religion ~~being~~ is designed & interpret ~~difided and follow of~~ the Unknown and Unknowable, and race ~~being~~ is the present emphasis laid onthe characteristics of ~~this~~ people who know each other least. It is natural, therefore that here we should meet the last great resting place of deep-seated and long cherished prejudice. The history of the advance of reason in the dark and awful forests of religious prejudice is ~~not~~ a story that asks for more than one chapter of its own. It is my task this morning to speak more particular of prejudices of race. They are to be sure more or less connected with religious and other prejudice but it is perhaps, fairly true ~~to say~~ that today the racial aspect of religious prejudice and indeed the racial ~~prejudice~~ aspect of nearly all of the larger and more widespread prejudices of mankind is the one which is at once the most appalling and one which demands the most careful attention; ~~and~~ it demands attention more particularly because it is apt to express itself in the most unobtrusive and harmless form. It comes more often as a mere matter of likes and dislikes so diafanous and unimportant that man do not wish to attribute it to the harsher word prejudice. They say "I have no prejudice against Japanese. I would not harm them; I simply do not like them." or "I do not wish ill to negroes but I do not want to associate with them." or again "Jews and Chinese and Indians have, I am ready to admit, their places inthe world but I do not wish that place to be too near my own." The argument that begins thus lightly and even flippantly is apt, however, if followed to become larger and reappear in a different form with more subtle and far-reaching reasons. The average man today pressed for his underlying reasons ~~by which he~~ in regard to ~~boasts~~ his likes and dislikes in matters of race is apt to confess th t he does not believe in the physical stamina of the negro, of in the mental efficiency of the Japanese or in the moral worth of other peoples ~~the Jew.~~ He will point out the excessive death rate among Negroes from their liability to consumption and other enemies of the human body; then turning to the historical argument he will deny all evidence of civilization to the black race and whatever he may yield to the yellow race he will qualify it by asking why it stopped short ~~where it did~~ and did not accomplish ~~any~~ more for the world., and finally coming to races whose physical stamina ~~count for a moment~~ mental accomplishment is undoubted he will nevertheless point out what seem to ~~me abhorrent~~ him moral reasons for saying that ~~his reasons~~ his methods of work and thought should survive in the world rather than ~~others.~~ theirs. Directly one drops from misty and indefinite likes and dislikes into such questions of historic and scientific fact as this ~~we have to apply to reason which~~ approach solid ground. Here we can appeal to science & reason & this every student of the race problem should welcome. ~~but which is welcomed~~ They all do welcome this but they show it in a way that makes us strongly suspect ~~and~~ a desire on the part of ~~the rabble of the people~~ many of them to pick the jury and anticipate the verdict. When a few years ago a young scientist thought he had discovered some physical deficiencies in dissecting the Negro brain, he was not only able to rush into print but he was able to have that print in one of the oldest and most respected magazines in ~~the United States, and~~ New York; today ~~the record of practically every state in~~ throughout the United States ~~will show~~

37-10-107

37-10-108

37-10-109

37-10-110

~~that~~ the pages of magazines and all the resources of the local & Associated Press are open to any person who can furnish ~~it~~ such any degree of plausibility an article which would stigmatize or traduce or decry ~~any~~ of the less popular races in the United States. Under such circumstances the work of science in ~~settling~~ settling the questions which race prejudice bring to the front is abnormally slow. Science does not and cannot answer quickly with Yes or No. It must wait through long years of experiment and repeated questioning, and when that experiment and questioning is hindered by frank endeavor to mislead, and by ~~its~~ unconscious ~~painting~~ distortion for evidence to prove ~~the~~ an already assumed conclusion, the work of the scientist is doubly hard. Meantime, however, while men are waiting for the final word of science as to the physical status and mental ability and moral worth of various groups of men ~~mankind~~, meantime men are living and working and dying; hearts are throbbing ; human souls are suffering; and the assumption that some people make, that here is a case where waiting costs little or nothing to human advance, ~~still goes on as~~ is an assumption ludicrously, ~~almost~~ indeed criminally untrue. This racial prejudice ~~is~~ exhibited today all over the world, and nowhere more viciously than here in America, ~~are~~ is not a matter of mere whim. ~~They are the~~ It is a mass of assumptions and judgments, the holding of which is costing ~~us~~ civilization a tremendous sum - a sum that cannot be measured only in part by money ~~but~~ is more properly measured in the retarded foot steps of human advance and the increase of human suffering. Let us note some of the obvious elements of this cost. As I have said before, racial prejudice rested primarily upon the likes and dislikes of unknown groups of people. The merest contact of such groups formerly meant war.

Today the existence of exclusive separate groups is being made more and more impossible. The economic organization of the world is binding its ends together. We not only want contact of nations but with ~~contact~~ our present tastes and desires we must have such contact. The result of this contact coupled with strong racial prejudice is war, and war in its crudest and worst form. It is the shooting down of unarmed natives with the machine guns; the wholesale murder of the ignorant and helpless by the strong and resourceful; the starving and mutilating of laborers in the Congo; the enslaving of them in Mexico; the selling of them in North Africa and the renting of them in South Africa. So far as possible we keep this cruelty at our back doors, and far from the polite conversation of our dinner tables. We know it and we know that we are profiting by it. In a few cases we are ~~apt to put reason before~~ unable to get rid of the facts by force history and the contact of races is brought before our eyes, as right here in America where we try hard to shut out eyes to lynching and everyday injustice. Nevertheless the conclusion is perfectly clear: race prejudice to day means war; war means increased race prejudice. So long as racial contempt and injury and exploitation is encouraged in the world, just so long the abolition of war will be impossible., and of all survival human barbarities the organized murder which has characterized the history of mankind is the most indefensible, and horrible as it is, it is today one of the costs of race prejudice. Take a step further in the great question of the distribution of wealth, particularly among the mass of laborers. The greatest hinderance to justice and understanding is prejudice of race. Right here in the United States, Southern white cotton spinners are taking the bread out of mouth of Northern spinners and they are doing it willingly and with open eyes because they had rather do this than give the black man of the South a chance to earn a decent ~~living~~ wages. Throughout the South the white laborer, organized and unorganized, is more interested in keeping the black man under his feet than he is in fighting the cause of social justice for the labor class the world over; and so long as this is true in any large portion of the United States the cause of the laboring class is retarded if not held ~~people is wholly~~ helpless. They may gain temporary or local victories but they cannot make any permanent advance so long as they seek to make that advance on the necks of their fellow men. What is true locally in the United States is true on a larger scale in international labor problems. So long as well paid English labor is willing to fatten on the Chinese serf and Mexican peon and black slave just so long the white laborer must help the cause of the exploiter and cannot be counted on the side of human justice. This maladjustment of the economic situation and the arrested cause of labor uplift is then a second cost of race prejudice. The third cost is in the condition of women. We have so long been used to flattering the women of cultured nations, boasting of their high eminence above their darker sisters that it hard for us to realize that white women cannot remain far above the degradation of these same darker sisters, that their preeminence has in a large degree been built upon and has been the cause of that degradation, and that that degradation knows neither race or color and can be found as well in New York or Paris or London as it can in South America or Central Africa. The question of the uplift of women to a place of economic independence and political freedom is one that is the unfamiliarity national efficiency this disease. The slums of northern cities, the black south, the tropics & semi-tropics of the world are today made safe homes for the spread of disease because most people come blindly & believe that rich foreigners, "dagoes", brown & black folk are deadly with ray. Equally very like a hydra-ray disease would go up in the back if the next census showed negroes & the dominated by consumption. Only when men realize that disease is no respecter of races do they awake to the cost of race prejudice.

37-10-112

P The fourth cost of this prejudice never can be answered so long as most of the women of the world are regarded as rightfully the prey of ~~white~~ men. It is perfectly easy for those who have helped ~~the great~~ womankind to sneer at the virtue and capacity of the degraded. And ~~this~~ whether it takes place in New Orleans or New York, whether it is an expression of race prejudice or of ~~the of~~ class prejudice amounts to the same thing, namely, the despising of human beings, and it is another one of those tremendous costs of which the civilized world is paying today for the privilege of indulging in its whims and prejudices. In the same way I might call to you mind the matter of child labor. Great advertisement and sensation has been raised in the United States recently because of the disclosure of the wide extent to which children are being used as beasts of burden, and practically every attempt to illiminate that situation has been confined to the white children of the North and South. Almost nothing has been said of the widespread and almost universal Negro child labor of the South. Yet, everbody knows the way in which Negro children are used systematically and regularly as the ligitimate tools of exploitation in one group of industries and among one group of people. It is practically impossible to stop the spread of such an evil to other groups. The capitalist who invests money in the South and can make dividends on black child labor is not going to be squeamish if his dividends are increased by white child labor, and it is therefore perfectly natural to see going on with the expanding industries of the South a worse public school system for the Negro children than existed twenty years ago. In other words, the desire and endeavor to stop and suppress the spread of intelligence among black people. Why? Because intelligence spoils labor; intelligence spoils house servants; in the 19th Century intelligence spoiled the early factory system of England; intelligence will spoil the present plantation system of the South. All this is historical and inevitable. If present labor conditions are to proceed in the South then ~~at least~~ the public schools for Negroes must go. Ignorance must be more and more the rule, and this definitely entertained program of ignorance among children is another cost of race prejudice in the United States. But above and beyond ~~all~~ these more or less material costs comes ~~the~~ a cost of prejudice more definite and greater than perhaps all the others together; that is the distinct retrogression today in the spirit of the ~~community~~ humanity. A careful observer may see it everywhere: he may view it in the appalling increase of unpunished murder; in the recrudescence ~~in the like of~~ in delight in public torture; in the careless contemplation of human suffering and in the widespread and ~~rapid~~ reluctantly hilarity over the systematic humiliation of human beings. We would have to go back many hundred years to match the present low ebb of the feeling of human brotherhood in certain broad fields, and this is due ~~more~~ mainly to the increase and nurishing of unreasoning and unreasonable prejudices against certain human beings solely because of race. Moreover, human prejudices grow to be what they feed ~~are fed~~ upon and one of their worst effects is the killing of human individuality. We have just passed through a great century of levelling; we have wanted to make men of one patern, and now finding that this is impossible instead of accepting the verdict we have tried to rush to the conclusion that ~~this~~ any people who cannot be made upon the one pattern ~~the patern that patern~~ should be exterminated; ~~and~~ from this argument in the physical realm it is but a step to the spiritual realm, and to the extermination of all thought and desire that does not agree with ours. Consequently, today we see a group of prejudices which are ~~is~~ altogether abnormal and which arise because people dare not follow their own likes and dislikes. The average child and the average foreign emmigrant and indeed the average American has very little racial prejudice. Black children and white children have played together in the South for numbers of years never knowing until they were Laboriously told that color made all the difference in the world. All kinds ~~of peo~~ and sorts of people meet and mingle in New York and most of them would not know ~~the~~ and would not care about differences of race, indeed would be disposed consciously and gladly to live in a realm above such differences did they not have it pointed out to them and forced upon their minds that survival in America is impossible for ~~black~~ unfortunate red men & undesirable for anyone not of English descent. The result is now a current demand for equality and similarity.- similarity in thought similarity in likes and dislikes; similarity in ~~class~~ dress and similarity in the degree in which one hates Negroes. Here we have a growth not of prejudice but of all the outward signs of prejudice - a growth all the more bitter and dangerous because it is not only beyond reason as all prejudice is but it is even beyond instinct which real honest prejudice is not, it is simply a desire to outdo ones neighbors in hurting the feelings of the helpless. Thus the reason why in the South some of the worst people for the Negroes to get along with are not the native Southerners but the transplanted Northerners who are trying to show their recently acquired aristocracy. So all throughout America some of the worst jingos and fighters of Japan and the East and haters of the ~~Mongul~~ mongrel South are not native Americans but new-comers, eager to make peace by emulating the worst American characteristics. The end of course of this whole tendency is a monstrous assumption that the world of the future is going to consist of the progeny of a few people whom we think ought to be in our racial set. Here in America the unspoken assumption is that this future wonder-world is to consist primarily of people of English descent. Jews may be admitted if they will deny themselves of their Jewish rights and ~~adopt the English~~ but not otherwise ~~as Jews~~; Germans may be admitted if they will try to be as little German as possible; Frenchmen if they will ~~try~~ not be too Latin.

37-10-114

37-10-116

Negroes and mulattoes are to be left out under all circumstances; Japanese, Chinese and Indians, ~~east and west,~~ are to be excluded if the power to exclude them can be found. Here then we have the situation, the recrudescence of racial prejudices which is causing war and labor injustices; the subjection of women and the increase of ignorance, and as the ~~increase~~ realm of this prejudice becomes greater, some people think it is a sign of aristocracy; together with this goes the assumption of an aristocratic world of the future on the most whimsical basis of ~~aristocracy~~ descent. Two things are certain: if we are to advance in civilization we cannot much longer pay the cost which racial prejudice is forcing upon us, and secondly the assumption that the inherent racial endowment is neither more nor less than freckles. It is one

~~[illegible]~~ a superiority of a minority of mankind ~~[illegible]~~ to exclude the mass of men from their heritage ~~[illegible]~~ danger ~~[illegible]~~

OVER

~~It is quite a different thing to say that all men who resemble in physical appearance are responsible & those who resemble~~

Under such ~~circ~~ circumstances it is certain that ~~the~~ modern ~~state~~ civilization cannot afford the continually increasing cost of racial prejudice & continue to advance. On the other hand it is also certain that no final scientific decision on the abilities & destiny of mankind can be looked for in a hundred years or more. What then must be the standard fair & peace & humanity? It must be assumed that a normal human being, regardless of race or color has a natural right to life liberty & the pursuit of happiness. It is right & just to recognize differences of individual endowment & merit, but it is wrong & dangerous to assume differences where they are not known & exist or to ignore talent & desert because it does not appear where you wanted & expected to see it.

Taking then this practical stand the true citizen
11. of the world will refuse further to play the court of racial prejudices & will ~~What then must the civilized man of today say when he faces racial~~ ~~such Gods, such assumptions — such~~ ~~prejudice? It seems to me he must~~ lay down five rights which came grown every inhabitant of the world as it exists, ~~ought, who is of full age~~ ~~and in his right mind,~~ should ~~have a right to ask~~ demand: first, the right to individuality, and I mean by this the right to his own color and his own way of thinking and to his own prejudices so far as these things do not interfere with other people's rights. To the same thing People continually say to the Negro race & to other races "We can settle this matter of color in a few hundred years because you will be by that time absorbed in the ~~white race~~ American people." But I ask of a civilized world, world where it is ~~practically~~ possible to be black and yet be treated as a man and ~~to rise to a degree of advance~~ unhindered in development. ~~Where do~~ ~~men grant such a right?~~

37-10-117

Second, the right to public courtesy. This world from now on is going to be a world of contact of races. It is going to be utterly impossible to separate and isolate men. In ~~time~~ the past contact meant mean war, caste and slavery, ~~all of which do~~ but today it must not and cannot mean these or these will cost too much to be indulged in. If then this is to be a world of contact each being in it has the right of public courtesy; to visit public places ~~unmolested~~ without insult and to travel in public conveyances uninsulted; and to ~~visit places of~~ be entertained in public ~~amusement~~ hostelries. Any denial of these rights is not only wrong but in the end suicidal for it attempts to assume ~~oppose the right, namely,~~ that the advantages of the community life belong to ~~but~~ a few people in the community, and are the exclusive property of those who have benefited most by that community right ~~is~~ a monstrous and revolutionary assumption. As a citizen of ~~the~~ a world of men

I have the right to ~~the choice of~~ contact with that world, and so far as that contact is of public and general nature no one can in justice and decency deny it to me.

Third, ~~as~~ a cutizen of the world ~~he~~ should have the right of demand Opportunity. We used to say the right of education but this should be broadened to the right of opportunity. The right to be educated in his childhood and then to have the doors of economic and political development thrown open to him according to his ability. Herein lies the answer to that great search for ability which human culture must make. Hitherto we have said not that we must have men of ability but they must be English or that they must belong to the first families. Now the lord in his great wisdom did not confine the ability to acquire wisdom to any one class of people, but distributed it among men of many races & all degrees & color & this ability must be found & honored ~~recognition~~ & put in command regardless of prejudice

Fourth, the citizens of the New World must have the right of Peace. The protection from force and violence in the prosecution of ~~his~~ work ~~and~~ This cannot be done until a stop is put to war and lynching and peonage and wage- slavery.

Fifth, he has a right to the Truth. He has a right to be protected against physical violence and against moral lies. Race prejudice in this land could not stand for a day if as much effort was made to have the truth in regard to all human beings as known is now made use trying to spread lies about them.

These then are the five rights which all men white and black and of all religions have a right to demand: the right to inuividuality; the right to public courtesy; the right to opportunity; the right to peace, and the right to the truth; and when men have these five rights the last bulwarks of prejudice ~~will be overthrown~~ must fall.

811-01-23

he has a great right & darkness

38-2-95

1910(?)

The Forward Movement

W. E. B. DuB.

1910

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT

The fall

October is the real beginning of the year. It is then that revivified, if not from rest at least from change of work, we come back to the old path and take up the burden again with new interest. We also rightly at such times pause a while to take new bearings and test the old, so as to be sure whither we are going and how great is the progress made; and I think we who belong to the Negro race here in America and who in the fall of 1910 pause to look at the present and forecaste the future must feel that we are at the beginning of a new cycle in the problem of our ad[redacted].

38-2-96

It is now some fifteen years since the dominant thought of the Negro race tried a new experiment in Negro advance, that is, new so far as the free Negro is concerned. It was in earlier years the only pathway open to the slave. He could not ask for freedom, or at least such asking was a waste of words, but he could by careful attention to the masters interests, real or supposed, obtain great concessions, and on the whole a comfortable living for at least himself and some of his race. This perfectly defensible polity of slavery days has been, as I have said, for the last fifteen years a more or less popular expressed theory of action among a large part of the race in America.

2

38-2-97

Some five years ago it seemed to me that the time was ripe to attack the logical foundations of this mode of thinking, and I did so with vehemence and sincerity. Tonight I come not so much to attack the theory as to undertake, from the unbiased point of view of the student of social affairs, to extimate the effect of this theory and others in the past and to ask what we may hope to accomplish in the future. I do not, of course, in this view assume or pretend to assume any change of belief myself, but I do attempt to judge present facts impartially.

38-2-98

Of one thing we may today be reasonably certain and that is that the Negro race has made in the last fifteen years notable and substantial advance in many lines. This advance is subject to a good deal of exaggeration on both sides; an esaggeration on the one hand which makes our progress appear unbelievably

phenominal, and an exaggeration on the other hand which claims absence of substantial progress. A careful unbiased judgment of the facts before us point to indubitable proofs of advance. There is doubt, for instance, that never before in the history of the Negro race has the race owned so much material wealth. It is probably that the current estimates of $600,000,000 are not at all exaggerated. While an average of $60 a head by no means spells affluence for a people, it does , without doubt, mean more than its mere figures would indicate. Beside this, or rather with it, has come a higher standard of living. Negroes are bringing their homes out of the alleys to the front streets in the towns, and in the country districts to a considerable degree out of the one-room cabin. There is,too, a larger and larger part of Negro

38-2-99

38-2-100

youth who are receiving higher education, and while the number as compared with the total who ought to be educated is still lamentably small, yet the Negro student is making his impression. Further it cannot be denied that unhealthy as the race is, it is growing slowly but decidedly healthier and is paying more attention to the laws of physical well-being. The organization of the race for general purposes which has been asked for among us for years has come at last in bewildering profusion. No one who considers the meetings of ~~this~~ last summer, from the seven thousand people at the National Baptist Convention at New Orleans to the couple of dozen at the Niagara Movement meeting at Sea Isle City, including such notable gatherings as the Odd Fellows, the Elks, the Physicians, the Negro Business League, the Woman's Clubs, the Political

League and many others can fail to realize that suddenly the organization for which we have been asking has come, and the real question before us is what are we going to do with the organizations we have.

38-2-101

When, now, we turn from wealth, education and organization to other matters of mind and morals, it is more difficult to give any certain answer. We have not developed in the last fifteen years many new names in the lines of literature and science, but we have a few, and on the whole I think the most of us would agree that the tone in Negro society in towns and cities show marks of genuine improvement. Thus in fifteen years we can point to positive advance. Nor can this advance be said to be due to any particular cause. The accumulation of property is not due to the Business Leagues but the Business Leagues to the accumulation of property, and again, education is not due to the advocates of higher training but vice versa. Of course the insistence on thrift and material well-being in these fifteen years has undoubtedly stimulated thrift and set new business ideals. So that on the whole we find a restless, almost nervous, pushing forward on the part of ten million men and with this a two-fold philosophy of its aims and meaning.

38-2-102

Now along with the undoubted evidences of advance among Negroes have gone an overwhelming number of causes for dismay and apprehension. So far as the Negroes themselves are concerned perhaps the only matter of distinct apprehension is their changed attitude toward education. After the War there was a desire, almost a craze, for education of any and all kinds. Today the children of the rank and file of the Negro race are not being sent to school with any such unanimity and while one cause of this is there are few schools to send children to, it is also partially because parents are losing faith in education.

38-2-103

Outside of the Negro race, however, and in the attitude of the dominant race there has come in the last fifteen years a series of disastrous events which calls for serious thought on our part. The disfranchisement movement which had reached only two states in 1895, has today swept over the whole Southern South, is pending in the border states and is actually trying to envade the North. The movement to cut down and discourage Negro education has been so successful that in the Southern South, the Negro public schools are worse than they were fifteen years ago, and in the border states

they have not made reasonable advance. Not only this, but the support given to Negro private schools has been growing smaller and smaller while the Negro secondary schools supported by the st states have had their corriculum progressively cheapened and spoiled in nearly every instance. Discrimination in civil rights has gone so far that the battle against it has apparently been given up, even in the North, and we face today continually an opinion among our own people that the wave of prejudice against Negroes in the United States is inevitable and that there is no use fighting it.

Now, while I think it is perfectly true that the advance of the Negro race can be claimed as due to no one party or set of doctrines, on the other hand it seems to me certain that the policy of trying to make friends with the enemies of the Negro race, of surrendering ground to them, of yielding without protest or argument has undoubtedly been responsible for a great many of the calamities which are threatening us. I think it is perfectly true that if therehad been no such philosophy formulated we should have had to meet reaction from the sentimentalism of the War period, we would have had to meet wide-spread disfranchisement, attack upon our civil rights and attack upon the education of our children; but I cannot believe that such a movement could have triumphed withthe ease with which it has had it been met on our part, not by submission and surrender, but by thoughtful, dogged and persistent and unwavering opposition.

But be that as it may, the question is, now what might have been but what we are going to do about it now, and in order that we shall approach this question in its true proportions we ought to consider not simply our position here as Negroes in the United States, but our position as blood-relatives of the Negro race throughout the world and as near or distant cousins of the darker races throughout the world; for it is of the utmost importance that whatever battles we wage in the future shall be based upon a thorough and wide-spread knowledge of the things which we are fighting for and of the attitude of the world toward us.

38.2-106

Before then discussing further our imperative needs under the present circumstances, I want to ask you to glance with me over the world and consider how its race problems are affecting us.

38-2-107

Primarily the problems of the world are today economic problems, the earning of a living and possibilities of enjoying the living justly earned; These economic problems resolve themselves very largely into the matter of regulating trade between the warmer and cooler regions of the earth, or in other words, between the world's whiter and darker peoples. In this vast problem of commerce there are three strategic points: America, Asia and Africa.

In America we have forst the United States, an example of tremendous industrial organization, whose problems are today not the problems of creating wealth, but the problems of justly distributing and consuming it, and the Negro problem arises from the fact that color prejudice is being used as a method of denying to black men a fair share of the product of their hands and brains and denying them an opportunity to enjoy the consumption of that meagre part which they get. Outside of the United States there are industrial problems which arrange themselves even more largely around the color line. There is, for instance, Mexico, a country held by the throat through United States capital invested there, where the darker Indian and Negroid peasantry are struggling piteously for the elementary rights of manhood. If they should gain such rights, it is possible that Mexico would afford the greatest asylum for the Negroes of the United States. Further down in Central America we have from the building of the Panama Canal a number of intricate racial problems and these problems intermingled with the industrial problems connected on the one hand with the West Indies and on the other hand with Asia. Our coffee and our fruit, our sugar and a large part of the available laboring class is furnished by the West Indies, where the Negro people are overwhelmingly dominant. The problem of the West Indies can never be settled until these Negroes are given a status which will make them content, and thus far these Negroes have, I thank God, showed no disposition to be content with anything short of political power, civic liberty and social equality.

32-2-108

32-2-109

Further down in South America the demand of Negro and Indian people for manhood rights has been won through a progressive amalgamation of the races and it only stands as a continuing problem on account of the rampant race prejudice in the United States. Industrially, America is one continent, but the color line still cuts off South America and binds her to Europe instead of North America; and the question is how long is that condition going to be continued.

38-2-110

Turning from the Western to the Eastern Indies we have a plain example of the lack of sympathy which the striving of the Negroes in the United States is able to gain in England and the peculiar reason why England is willing to welcome anybody who can say that the suppression of ten million people in the United States is not a burning problem and is in process of social solution. In the East Indies we have a mass of highly paid English officials at the top ruling a mass of millions of poorly paid, wretchedly conditioned darker people. These people have, however, just begun to get a class of educated leaders, and these educated leaders are doing the only thing that honest educated leadership could do under the circumstances: they are fighting for freedom. The fight while little noised aborad and holding but scant space in our newspapers is one of the greatest and most interesting battles of modern time, and its outcome depends simply upon the courage and endurance of the fighters.

38-2-111

Further east in China and Japan we have a development of the race problem which is of especial interest because these people began the fight before subjection to the West had taken place. China was on the verge of dismemberment and Japan was about to be shut in on a few islands of the Sea, when Japan undertook what the world called a foolish fight and won. This gave to the yellow race a position where it can defend itself successfully against the aggressions of the white race and assert its right to self-development and respect.

211-2-88

How is it now with the black race at home in Africa? What chance is there that the black race is going to have the freedom for self-development, the right to become not simply useful to the white race but useful to itself? The problem in Africa is so complicated that it is extremely difficult to answer this question and any answer given today is simply guess work. In Egypt with its dark native races and large infiltration of Negro blood a fight similar to that in India has begun and apparently has a fair chance to succeed within a few decades. In the Soudan which is predominantly Negro and Negroid a development of the black race is taking place under white leadership which looks unusually promising.

On the other hand, the intimidation of the blacks on the West Coast and their attempted suppression in South Africa is ominous. But no one , as I have said, can made final conclusions as to the outcome. There, at least, the Negro is overwhelmingly in the majority, the climate is fighting for him, and much of what he will do in the future depends upon what we, his brothers, prove we can do here in the present.

211-2-88

When now, Europe looks upon so vast an aggregation of problems which though industrial at bottom, are complicated tremendously by the fact of an unreasoning racial prejudice, it is not unnatural that there should come movements toward understanding and amelioration. There is the great Peace movement, but it is hampered by an unfortunate political situation in Europe itself. Nevertheless, it has gained a great victory in the Hague Conferences and out of them comes a still further advance in the Races Congress which is to meet in London in July, 1911, and in which all the races of the world, including ours here in America are to be represented. This is perhaps the most definite attack upon racial prejudice that the better thought of Europe has yet made.

38-2-114

This then is the situation the world over.

Let us now return to our own land and ask in view of this world ramification of the color line, what you and I are going to do? It has often been said that we have within the Negro race the conservative and the radical factions: the conservatives who want to leave things as they are for fear of making them worse, and the radicals who want to change everything in a moment. No such extreme description fits our situation. What we really have is the Opportunist and the Path-finder. The Opportunist who says the situation is not agreeable, who wants to make things better, but who believes the chances are that nothing can be done by our moving; we must wait until the opportunity is offered and then take hold of it. On the other hand, the Path-finder says that such sitting still and waiting is most dangerous, and it is of the greatest importance all the time that organized effort should be made for advance. This historic difference between opportunism and road-breaking can be seen in many historic movements. At the time of the Protestant Revolution the whole Catholic Church practically, except a few who were profiting by its plight, knew the need of radical reform, was sure that conditions were bad, but how should satisfactory reform be brought about? Should it be brought about by widespread war and carnage or by slow and quiet internal movement? It was finally brought about by revolt and revolution, and that revolt and revolution not only gave birth to Protestantism but it gave birth to a counter reform inside, which helped the church to purify itself; and those who since that time have objected to Martin Luther and the horrible thirty years' war have to prove that the reformation within and without the church was possible at slighter cost. Or take the fight of Englishmen for the ballot; it might have been said in England in the early 19th Century that the rank and file of the English people were bound in time to get the ballot. Good-hearted men might have assured the leaders who protested against rotten burroughs that in time the rotten burrough was bound to go. But

38-2-115

men who depend upon time to right wrongs always unconsciously include in time the inevitable human action that time always brings forth; the protest against wrong and lawlessness and oppression, the determined, unceasing action of men who will not be satisfied with injustice. If , of course, you take these things out of time, then there is nothing in time itself that is going to settle any question; and if you put them in, then you have to ask how far we can count upon the power of human protest and what form shall it take.

Consider for instance the situation in Russia today. After the Japanese War it seemed as though the day of freedom had dawned. A representative assembly sat ant the voices of the people for the first time in hundreds of years became articulate; their wrongs

38-2-118

were expressed and their rights demanded. Today Russia grows silent, the present Duma chosen by the restricted electorate is but a tool in the hands of the dominant class and oppression and injustice flourish. What should Russia do today? Make terms with the enemy and wait, or protest and keep protesting and continue to use every legitimate method in order to restore to the Russian people their long withheld rights?

But take an even more opposite example - Ireland. For many long years Ireland has been fighting for Home Rule - the right to have unhampered control of her local affairs. She has not yet gained this but she has gained many things: government aid in buying land, wide-spread philanthropic efforts of social uplift, educational foundations and industrial encouragement.

Is not this enough? Ought she not stop fighting and sit down and assure the world of her progress? Perhaps you think so - indeed I am afraid you do - but Ireland doesn't. Ireland is fighting as doggedly for Home Rule today as she ever fought and the Irishman that dared to cross the water and assure the world that his country was satisfied and happy would find it safer and healthier to stay across the water.

38-2-119

Ought we then as Negroes with ten times as much to complain of as the Irish - Ought we to complain? For my part, the question is easily answered. We Negroes inthe United States must go forward. The policy of the mere opportunist is doubly dangerous. It is dangerous first because it gives aid and moral support to the enemy, and it is dangerous in the second place because it encourages the worse tendencies among ourselfes.

To take the first point: I wonder if many of you will believe me when I say that the greatest and on the whole most unbearable argument that has been brought against my attitude in the last ten years has been the assertion which I have met time and time again that I am practically the only Negro in the United States who objects to present conditions; that I and a small group of personal friends are protesting and making a good deal of noise about disfranchisement, civil rights and the curtailment of education, while, as matter of fact, not only are the great mass of the colored people satisfied with their condition, but the real leaders of the race also are satisfied; that they are making no protest, that they are (to use the current phrase) "Optimists", and on the whole are well-satisfied with conditions as they now exist.

I have had several times sympathetic persons suggest to me that since the Negro race is satisfied with conditions and I was not satisfied the proper thing for me to do would be to go to France or to South America where I could be a man. They have said to me in most sympathetic tones that they understood my position perfectly well, that if they were in a similar position that they would feel and act and talk precisely as I have done, but that the Negroes of America did not feel so and that I was starting them to protest against things which did not particularly bother them. I have had men, Southern and Northern, white and black, use these arguments repeatedly to me. I know, as you know, that it is perfectly false. I know, as you know, that of the educated, thinking colored people, nine out of ten, demand precisely the things which I have been trying to demand, but the thing that exasperates me is that when I seek to prove this to doubting people who come to me for information, I find it exceedingly difficult to do so. If I send them for personal interviews to colored people, these colored people have their glib word of contentment ready. They are sure that the Negro has advanced, and that the white man is going to give them their rights while they sit still to receive them. If I refer them to the Negro newspapers, I will find in their columns today almost no straight out protest against present conditions. Personal enuendos, factional fights, petty jealousies and social doings practically fill them. If I refer to the speeches and the doings of our leading men, I find on the one hand Mr. Washington in Europe assuring the world that all is well in the United States, and on the other hand Mr. Vernon in Washington urging a Jim-Crow school system in Kansas, and again and again men among us of education and ability meekly and silently submitting to humiliation and insult such as no ~~well-bred dog could~~ man ought to bear without protest. All of which flatly contradicts my assertion that the Negroes in the United States are not only not satisfied with present conditions but are exceedingly dissatisfied and apprehensive of the future; that they regard disfranchisement as a denial of the fundamental rights of men, that they see in civil discrimination a denial of their manhood, and that they know that educational discrimination is deliberately seeking to deprive them of trained leadership. I know and you know that there sits in this room tonight not a single black man or woman who would not privately tell me ~~tonight~~ a tale of personal humiliation and insult, wanton discrimination, blighting of ambition and discouragement, systematic repression and callous hurt which would make anyhuman being mad from head to foot.

38-2-121

38-2-122

38-2-123

Yet those same people in nine cases out of ten will turn to the newspaper reporter beside and assure him that they have no cause for complaint. Imagine my friends the peculiar position in which this attitude puts the white friends of this race through out the world when they are asked to fight for those who not only will not fight for themselves but who even declare fighting unnecessary. I have seen in ~~this very~~ in one city of Washington one white man make more and louder protest over a street car transfer than the whole hundred thousand black people of this city have made over the disgraceful conditions at the Union Station. What is the cause of this? Is it a race trait? No my friends, its cause is clear. Its cause is slavery. It is the penalty we pay for three centuries of degradation. The blood of servility is yet in our veins. We are not only not free without, we are still servile within and unless you would hand down the taint to your children - to youn tents, O Israel. Under such circumstances it seems to me it is the business of the Negro race to nail this wide-spread lie that they are content and that in such a way as they will - quietly or noisily, privately or in public, in speech or personal conversation, lose no opportunity to let the people of the United States and the people of the world know that ten million human beings in this country are not willing today to be classed less than men.

38-2-124

In the second place our opportunist attitude is putting a premium upon selfishness and mediocrity among us. Twenty years ago when I was coming through school the Negro race said to me with one voice: "Get the best education possible and seek the highest". Today if the Negro race is saying anything openly and plainly to its children, I am at a loss to know just what that word is, but I am certainly sure that among the young people with whom I have worked for fffteen years the tendency is to question very materially whether it is worth while for a Negro boy to seek the best, whether it is not a good deal better to seek the biggest thing, the one that pays most or most quickly. And certainly the policy of the opportunist is putting forward today a set of men who owe their advancement neither to their brains nor to their work, not to their moral desert, but almost solely to their callousness or their sycophancy. And if this sort of thing goes on too long it will absolutely kill all the self-respect of the race, it will lead the race astray, and will set up false ideals and furnish proof of the incapacity of the Negro to their enemies. We have criticized and criticized harshly the policy of President Taft on Negro appointments to office. But recently I have been shown an authoritative statement saying that the policy "had the full approval" before it was uttered of several well-known leaders of the Negro race. In the light of that extraordinary revelation, I am not sure but that it is President Taft who has the best right to be angry and to ask if chosen leaders cannot speak for you, who in God's name can?

38-2-125

38-2-126

After, now this long trial of Opportunism with whatever business revival may be put to its credit to offset its wretched failure in all things else, is there not need of a new enlightened selfishness to start an upward and forward movement? I do not ask, and no one has a right to ask, any unusual and disinterested unselfishness; this is an exceptional thing at any time and in any race and when it comes it does not have to be asked, it comes of its own free will. We have got a living to earn and families to support; we must fight with our eyes upon our bread and butter, remembering all the time that without bread and butter there will in the end be no fighting, but remembering also that under some circumstances the best of food is tasteless. Then, too, we must not forget for whose bread and butter we are fighting. If we were merely fighting for our own then we could bargain according to individual taste. But it is for the lives and careers and surroundings of our children and our children's children that we strive today. Are we willing that they should live as we have lived?

38-2-127

Is it not time, then, that after fifteen years of experiment we should step forward in three definite directions: First, that we should seek to get a systematic and definite knowledge of ourselves; Second, that we should seek to make a systematic and continued protest against injustice, and Thirdly, that we should in every direction increase our organized endeavor. It does seem to me that this program is not one of frightful or forbidding radicalism, nor does it exclude anything for which an honest opportunist rightly strives. If we were living in a land by ourselves, knowledge would be supplied by a Census and by departmental reports

38-2-35

38-2-129

and by newspapers. As it is, we have to depend for our knowledge of ourselves upon prejudiced and ill-informed official reports and upon newspapers whose business often is to disseminate what is not the truth. It seems to me that systematic gatherings of knowledge concerning conditions among us is a matter of first-hand importance, both for our own satisfaction, for purposes of social reform, and the refutation of slanders.

Then, as to protest: I think most men have in mind when they speak of agitation a wild haired man yelling and waving his arms in some place where he has no business to be. Personally, I have a good deal of respect for that sort of agitator and he has played his part in the world; it ill becomes you and me standing before the memory of William Lloyd Garrison and Frederick Douglass

38-2-130

to object to the agitator, but I am not asking today of all of you agitation of that sort. I am asking for a systematic protest. I would wish the Negro race so organized that the newspaper to-morrow which printed an unfair report concerning Negroes would receive in its very next mail from ten to one thousand letters of respectful but firm protest and that these letters should not come simply from the colored people but from fair-minded white people whom you and I had induced to protest. It seems to me that the man who is afraid or unwilling to carry on protest of this sort - by writing, by personal visits, by attending decently conducted meetings of protest,- it seems to me that the man who is not willing to do these things for the preserving of his rights, for the safe-guarding of the future of his children, is unworthy to hold any position of preferment or to claim to be a man.

We minimize the effect of such protest. Unless we can see mountains tumbling after one prayer we are done with praying. We think the little thing, the silent persistent endeavor, the continually dropping is useless because its results are not immediately apparent. Yet believe me the little meeting of twenty-nine poor and uninfluential black men at Niagara Falls six years ago has done more to let the world know that American Negroes are dissatisfied with conditions than anything else in a decade. Has it bettered those conditions? No. But it has bettered us. It is a great thing for a man to gain his own self-respect. And when that spirit of persistent protest and dissatisfaction pervades ten millions, does anyone doubt but that conditions will yield?

38-2-131

Thirdly, as to organized endeavor: If today we take into account the Negro church, secret societies, insurance associations and business organizations, the various philanthropic endeavors, we shall find that practically every member of the Negro race is a member of one or more organization. The problem before us is how shall we get these organizations to work for the best interests of the Negro race - to work for social uplift and cooperation in all lines and ways which shall make them affective and worthy organizations. To bring about such organized cooperation and set forth the lines of work and emphasize the need, calls in itself for organized endeavor, and toward this, it seems to me, you and I are called upon to start and to start right off. But first of all what is the goal? What is the Ideal? What do we want? Can we formulate a reasonable platform of Negro demands today which will unite conservative and radical, opportunist and

38-2-132

and Path-finder?

I think we can. Certainly we can in private. Among Negroes themselves of all schools and any school there is substantial agreement on what we want; it is only when we come to tell white folks, that we get cautious and begin to express the most extraordinary differences of opinion. What do we want:

38-2-133

We want to be treated like men.

We want the legal rights of American citizens - the right to vote, the ~~right~~ to travel without public stigma, and the right to enjoy public conveniences on the same terms as other people.

X

We want education for our children - an education suited to their capacities and not simply to somebody's ideas of their capacities, and finally, we want the opportunity for self-development and self-expression.

When we formulate our demands thus it may be objected: there are plenty of white people who do not get what you ask and what is the use of akking ~~what~~ all this when you know you cannot get all you ask. The answer is clear: the argument that a wrong is wide-spread is no excuse for its existence. If there are millions of people black and white who are today treated as beasts of burden, stunted by caste restrictions and denied opportunity this is reason for more and not less endeavor on the part of all thinking men to right these wrongs. If men stop asking for justice because some injustice will surely remain, then human progress is a dream. I do not expect to get all I ask today as a Negro, but I do expect to get something and I do expect to keep asking until the trump of doom.

38-2-134

28-2-135

I am willing, nay eager, to accept every small concession, every inch of advance and be thankful for it, but I will not pay for it with the lying assertion that its all I want. Nor does the counter-argument of desert determ me in the least. If everybody got what they deserved in this universe, there would be a good many rich people begging, many white people in slaveyy and several saints in hell.

But the key-note of the world today is not desert but opportunity , not the grudging dole of charity to the guilty but the rich flood of inspiration and uplift to all, that whosoever will may come and drink of the waters of life freely.

To accomplish this the world is using social investigation of conditions, persistent protest against evil and organized effort toward betterment. When we are advocating these methods for the Negro we are not advocating untried methods, for all the great movements of the present time are organized absolutely on these lines - Child Labor, the Peace Movement, the Protest against Poverty, the New Education - all these movements are organized with these three things in view: to gather the facts, protest against the wrong, and to gain organized cooperation to bring the right. If the cause of ten million people who want to be free is not worth the use of these time-honored instruments of civilization - what is it worth? Today we have for this purpose in New York a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. And this association differentiates itself from other organizations in this one unusual respect, that is, it is organized in conjunction with those who are working in similar ways along other lines of social uplift. We comprise among us ~~Republican~~

28-2-136

58-2-137

social workers and reformers interested in nearly every line of social uplift. Hitherto, the Negro in the United States has had little interest in the work of these people. Strange to say, he has rather sided with the great capitalists and philanthropists and is even found speaking against social reform, against races like the Jews and against all people who are fighting for a cause. The time for this foolishness has passed. These are the people who are revolutionizing the world. We must recognize that the cause of the Negro is one with every cause of world uplift and one which employs the same methods and uses the same arguments, and we must therefore, join hands with all people throughout the world who are working for the world's good.

----oooo----

[Oct. 1910]

48-2-43

THE FORWARD MOVEMENT

October is the real beginning of the year. It is then that revivified, if not from rest at least from change of work, we come back to the old path and take up the burden again with new interest. We also rightly at such times pause a while to take new bearings and test the old, so as to be sure whither we are going and how great is the progress made; and I think we who belong to the Negro race here in America and who in the fall of 1910 pause to look at the present and forecaste the future must feel that we are at the beginning of a new cycle in the problem of our advance.

48-2-44

It is now some fifteen years since the dominant thought of the Negro race tried a new experiment in Negro advance, that is, new so far as the free Negro is concerned. It was in earlier years the only pathway open to the slave. He could not ask for freedom, or at least such asking, ~~was~~ seemed a waste of words, but he could by careful attention to the masters' interests, real or supposed, obtain great concessions, and on the whole a comfortable living for at least himself and some of his race. This ~~perfectly~~ defensible policy of slavery days has been, as I have said, for the last fifteen years a more or less popular expressed theory of action among a large part of the race in America.

Some five years ago it seemed ~~to me~~ come to us that the time was ripe to attack the logical foundations of this mode of thinking, and we did so with vehemence and sincerity. Tonight I come not so much to attack the theory as to undertake, from the unbiased point of view of the student of social affairs, to estimate the effect of this theory and others in the past and to ask what we may hope to accomplish in the future. I do not, of course, in this view assume or pretend to assume any change of belief myself, but I do attempt to judge present facts impartially.

Of one thing we may today be reasonably certain and that is that the Negro race has made in the last fifteen years notable and substantial advance in many lines. This advance is subject to a good deal of exaggeration on both sides; an exaggeration on the one hand which makes our progress appear unbelievably phenominal, and an exaggeration on the other hand which claims absence of substantial progress. A careful unbiased judgment of the facts before us point to indubitable proofs of advance. There is doubt, for instance, that never before in the history of the Negro race has the race owned so much material wealth. It is probable that the current estimates of $600,000,000 are not at all exaggerated. While an average of $60 a head by no means spells affluence for a people, it does , without doubt, mean more than its mere figures would indicate. Beside this, or rather with it, has come a higher standard of living. Negroes are bringing their homes out of the alleys to the front streets in the towns, and in the country districts to a considerable degree out of the one-room cabin. There is, too, a larger and larger part of Negro.

48-2-47

youth who are receiving higher education, and while the number as compared with the total who ought to be educated is still lamentably small, yet the Negro student is making his impression. ¶ Further it cannot be denied that unhealthy as the race is, it is growing slowly but decidedly healthier and is paying more attention to the laws of physical well-being. ¶ The organization of the race for general purposes which has been asked for among us for years has come at last in bewildering profusion. No one who considers the meetings of this summer, from the seven thousand people at the National Baptist Convention at New Orleans to the couple of dozen at the Niagara Movement meeting at Sea Isle City, including such notable gatherings as the Odd Fellows, the Elks, the Physicians, the Negro Business League, the Woman's Clubs, the Political

48-2-48

League and many others, can fail to realize that suddenly the organization for which we have been asking has come, and the real question before us is what are we going to do with the organizations we have.

When, now, we turn from wealth, education and organization to other matters of mind and morals, it is more difficult to give any certain answer. We have not developed in the last fifteen years many new names in the lines of literature and science, but we have a few, and on the whole I think the most of us would agree that the tone in Negro society in towns and cities show marks of genuine improvement. ¶ Thus in fifteen years we can point to positive advance. Nor can this advance be said to be due, whole, to any particular cause. The accumulation of property is not due alone to the Business Leagues but the Business Leagues to the accumulation of property, and again, education is not due to the advocates of higher training but vice versa. Of course the insistence on thrift and material well-being in these fifteen years has undoubtedly stimulated thrift and set new business ideals. & the crusading college men has encouraged college IP So that on the whole we find a restless, almost nervous, pushing forward on the part of ten million men and with this a two-fold philosophy of its aims and meaning.

48-2-49

Now along with the undoubted evidences of advance among Negroes have gone an overwhelming number of causes for dismay and apprehension. So far as the Negroes themselves are concerned perhaps the only matter of distinct apprehension is their changed attitude toward education. After the War there was a desire, almost a craze, for education of any and all kinds. Today the children of the rank and file of the Negro race are not being sent to school with any such unanimity and while one cause of this is there are few schools to send children to, it is also partially because parents are losing faith in education.

48-2-50

Outside of the Negro race, however, and in the attitude of the dominant race there has come in the last fifteen years a series of disastrous events which calls for serious thought on our part. The disfranchisement movement which had reached only two states in 1895, has today swept over the whole Southern South, is pending in the border states and is actually trying to envade the North. The movement to cut down and discourage Negro education has been so successful that in the Southern South, the Negro public schools are worse than they were fifteen years ago, and in the border states

they have not made reasonable advance. Not only this, but the support given to Negro private schools has been growing smaller and smaller while the Negro secondary schools supported by the st states have had their corriculum progressively cheapened and spoiled in nearly every instance. Discrimination in civil rights has gone so far that the battle against it has apparently been given up, even in the North, and we face today continually an opinion among our own people that the wave of prejudice against Negroes in the United States is inevitable and that there is no use fighting it.

Now, while I think it is perfectly true that the advance of the Negro race can be claimed as due to no one party or set of doctrines, on the other hand it seems tome certain that the policy of trying to make friends with the enemies of the Negro race, of surrendering ground to them, of yielding without protest or argument has undoubtedly been responsible for a great many of the calamities which are threatening us. I think it is perfectly true that if therehad been no such philosophy formulated we should have had to meet reaction from the sentimentalism of the War period, we would have had to meet wide-spread disfranchisement, attack upon our civil rights and attack upon the education of our children; but I cannot believe that such a movement could have triumphed withthe ease with which it has had it been met on our part, not by submission and surrender, but by thoughtful, dogged and persistent and unwavering opposition.

But be that as it may, the question is, not what might have been but what we are going to do about it now, and in order that we shall approach this question in its true proportions we ought to consider not simply our position here as Negroes in the United States, but our position as blood-relatives of the Negro race throughout the world and as near or distant cousins of the darker races throughout the world; for it is of the utmost importance that whatever battles we wage in the future shall be based upon a thorough and wide-spread knowledge of the things which we are fighting for and of the attitude of the world toward us.

Before then discussing further our imperative needs under the present circumstances, I want to ask you to glance with me over the world and consider how its race problems are affecting us.

Primarily the problems of the world are today economic problems, the earning of a living and possibilities of enjoying the living justly earned; These economic problems resolve themselves very largely into the matter of regulating trade between the warmer and cooler regions of the earth, or in other words, between the world's whiter and darker peoples. In this vast problem of commerce there are three strategic points: America, Asia and Africa.

In America we have first the United States, an example of tremendous industrial organization, whose problems are today not the problems of creating wealth, but the problems of justly distributing and consuming it, and the Negro problem arises from the fact that color prejudice is being used as a method of denying to black men a fair share of the product of their hands and brains and denying them an opportunity to enjoy the consumption of that meagre part which they get. Outside of the United States there are industrial problems which arrange themselves even more largely around the color line. There is, for instance, Mexico, a country held by the throat through United States capital invested there, where the darker Indian and Negroid peasantry are struggling piteously for the elementary rights of manhood. If they should gain such rights, it is possible that Mexico would afford the greatest asylum for the Negroes of the United States. Further down in Central America we have from the building of the Panama Canal a number of intricate racial problems and these problems intermingled with the industrial problems connected on the one hand with the West Indies and on the other hand with Asia. Our coffee and our fruit, our sugar and a large part of the available laboring class is furnished by the West Indies, where the Negro people are overwhelmingly dominant. The problem of the West Indies can never be settled until these Negroes are given a status which will make them content, and thus far these Negroes have, I thank God, showed no disposition to be content with anything short of political power, civic liberty and social equality.

48-2-55

48-2-56

Further down in South America the demand of Negro and Indian people for manhood rights has been won through a progressive amalgamation of the races and it only stands as a continuing problem on account of the rampant race prejudice in the United States. Industrially, America is one continent, but the color line still cuts off South America and binds her to Europe instead of North America; and the question is how long is that condition going to be continued.

48-2-57

Turning from the Western to the Eastern Indies we have a plain example of the lack of sympathy which the striving of the Negroes in the United States is able to gain in England and the peculiar reason why England is willing to welcome anybody who can say that the suppression of ten million people in the United States is not a burning problem and is in process of social solution. In the East Indies we have ~~a mass of~~ highly paid English officials at the top ruling a mass of millions of poorly paid, wretchedly conditioned darker people. These people have, however, just begun to get a class of educated leaders, and these educated leaders are doing the only thing that honest educated leadership could do under the circumstances: they are fighting for freedom. The fight while little noised aborad and holding but scant space in our newspapers is one of the greatest and most interesting battles of modern time, and its outcome depends simply upon the courage and endurance of the fighters.

48-2-58

Further east in China and Japan we have a development of the race problem which is of especial interest because these people began the fight before subjection to the West had taken place. China was on the verge of dismemberment and Japan was about to be shut in on a few islands of the Sea, when Japan undertook what the world called a foolish fight and won. This gave to the yellow race a position where it can defend itself successfully against the aggressions of the white race and assert its right to self-development and respect.

How is it now with the black race at home in Africa? What chance is there that the black race is going to have the freedom for self-development, the right to become not simply useful to the white race but useful to itself? The problem in Africa is so complicated that it is extremely difficult to answer this question and any answer given today is simply guess work. In Egypt with its dark native races and large infiltration of Negro blood a fight similar to that in India has begun and apparently has a fair chance to succeed within a few decades. In the Soudan which is predominantly Negro and Negroid a development of the black race is taking place under white leadership which looks unusually promising.

On the other hand, the intimidation of the blacks on the West Coast and their attempted suppression in South Africa is ominous. But no one , as I have said, can made final conclusions as to the outcome. There, at least, the Negro is overwhelmingly in the majority, the climate is fighting for him, and much of what he will do in the future depends upon what we, his brothers, prove we can do here in the present.

When now, Europe looks upon so vast an aggregation of problems which though industrial at bottom, are complicated tremendously by the fact of an unreasoning racial prejudice, it is not unnatural that there should come movements toward understanding and amelioration. There is the great Peace movement, but it is hampered by an unfortunate political situation in Europe itself. Nevertheless, it has gained a great victory in the Hague Conferences and out of them comes a still further advance in the Races Congress which is to meet in London in July, 1911, and in which all the races of the world, including ours here in America are to be represented. This is perhaps the most definite attack upon racial prejudice that the better thought of Europe has yet made.

This then is the situation the world over.

Let us now return to our own land and ask in view of this world ramification of the color line, what you and I are going to do? It has often been said that we have within the Negro race the conservative and the radical factions: the conservatives who want to leave things as they are for fear of making them worse, and the radicals who want to change everything in a moment. No such extreme description fits our situation. What we really have is the Opportunist and the Path-finder. The Opportunist who says the situation is not agreeable, who wants to make things better, but who believes the chances are that nothing can be done by our moving; we must wait until the opportunity is offered and then take hold of it. On the other hand, the Path-finder says that such sitting still and waiting is most dangerous, and it is of the greatest importance all the time that organized effort should be made for advance. This historic difference between opportunism and road-breaking can be seen in many historic movements. At the time of the Protestant Revolution the whole Catholic Church practically, except a few who were profiting by its plight, knew the need of radical reform, was sure that conditions were bad, but how should satisfactory reform be brought about? Should it be brought about by widespread war and carnage or by slow and quiet internal movement? It was finally brought about by revolt and revolution, and that revolt and revolution not only gave birth to Protestantism but it gave birth to a counter reform inside, which helped the church to purify itself; and those who since that time have objected to Martin Luther and the horrible thirty years' war have to prove that the reformation within and without the church was possible at slighter cost. Or take the fight of Englishmen for the ballot; it might have been said in England in the early 19th Century that the rank and file of the English people were bound in time to get the ballot. Good-hearted men might have assured the leaders who protested against rotten burroughs that in time the rotten burrough was bound to go/ But

48-2-63

48-2-64

~~28~~

men who depend upon time to right wrongs always unconsciously include in time the inevitable human action that time always brings forth; the protest against wrong and lawlessness and oppression, the determined, unceasing action of men who will not be satisfied with injustice. If , of course, you take these things out of time, then there is nothing in time itself that is going to settle any question; and if you put them in, then you have to ask how far we can count upon the power of human protest and what form shall it take.

Consider for instance the situation in Russia today. After the Japanese War it seemed as though the day of freedom had dawned. A representative assembly sat and the voices of the people for the first time in hundreds of years became articulate; their wrongs

were expressed and their rights demanded. Today Russia grows silent, the present Duma chosen by the restricted electorate is but a tool in the hands of the dominant class and oppression and injustice flourish. What should Russia do today? Make terms with the enemy and wait, or protest and keep protesting and continue to use every legitimate method in order to restore to the Russian people their long withheld rights?

But take an even more opposite example - Ireland. For many long years Ireland has been fighting for Home Rule - the right to have unhampered control of her local affairs. She has not yet gained this but she has gained many things: government aid in buying land, wide-spread philanthropic efforts of social uplift, educational foundations and industrial encouragement.

Is not this enough? Ought she not stop fighting and sit down and assure the world of her progress? Perhaps you think so - indeed I am afraid you do - but Ireland doesn't. Ireland is fighting as doggedly for Home Rule today as she ever fought and the Irishman that dared to cross the water and assure the world that his country was satisfied and happy would find it safer and healthier to stay across the water.

Ought we then as Negroes with ten times as much to complain of as the Irish - Ought we to complain? For my part, the question is easily answered. We Negroes inthe United States must go forward. The policy of the mere opportunist is doubly dangerous. It is dangerous first because it gives aid and moral support to the enemy, and it is dangerous in the second place because it encourages the worse tendencies among ourselves.

48-2-67

To take the first point: I wonder if many of you will believe me when I say that the greatest and on the whole most unbearable argument that has been brought against my attitude in the last ten years has been the assertion which I have met time and time again that I am ~~practically~~ + a half dozen others are the only Negro in the United States who objects to present conditions; that I and a small group of personal friends are protesting and making a good deal of noise about disfranchisement, civil rights and the curtailment of education, while, as matter of fact, not only are the great mass of the colored people satisfied with their condition, but the real leaders of the race also are satisfied; that they are making no protest, that they are (to use the current phrase) "Optimists", and on the whole are well-satisfied with conditions as they now

48-2-68

exist.

I have had several times sympathetic persons suggest to me that since the Negro race is satisfied with conditions and I was not satisfied the proper thing for me to do would be to go to France or to South America where I could be a man. They have said to me in most sympathetic tones that they understood my position perfectly well, that if they were in a similar position that they would feel and act and talk precisely as I have done, but that the Negroes of America did not feel so and that I was starting them to protest against things which did not particularly bother them. I have had men, Southern and Northern, white and black, use these arguments repeatedly to me. I know, as you know, that it is perfectly false. I know, as you know, that of the

48-2-69

educated, thinking colored people, nine out of ten, demand precisely the things which I have been trying to demand, but the thing that exasperates me is that when I seek to prove this to doubting people who come to me for information, I find it exceedingly difficult to do so. If I send them for personal interviews to colored people, these colored people have their glib word of contentment ready. They are sure that the Negro has advanced, and that the white man is going to give them their rights while they sit still to receive them. If I refer them to the Negro newspapers, I will find in their columns today almost no straight out protest against present conditions. Personal enuendos, factional fights, petty jealousies and social doings practically fill them. If I refer to the speeches and the doings of our leading men, I find on the one hand Mr. Washington in 48-2-70 Europe assuring the world that all is well in the United States, and on the other hand Mr. Vernon in Washington urging a Jim-Crow school system in Kansas, and again and again men among us of education and ability meekly and silently submitting to humiliation and insult such as no well-bred dog could bear without protest. All of which flatly contradicts my assertion that the Negroes in the United States are not only not satisfied with present conditions but are exceedingly dissatisfied and apprehensive of the future; that they regard disfranchisement as a denial of the fundamental rights of men, that they see in civil discrimination a denial of their manhood, and that they know that educational discrimination is deliberately seeking to deprive them of trained leadership. I know and you know that there sits in this room tonight not a single black man or woman who would not privately tell me ~~tonight~~ a tale of personal humiliation and insult, wanton discrimination, blighting of ambition and discouragement, systematic repression and callous hurt which would make anyhuman being mad from head to foot.

48-2-71

Yet those same people in nine cases out of ten will turn to the newspaper reporter beside them and assure him that they have no cause for complaint. Imagine my friends the peculiar position in which this attitude puts the white friends of this race through out the world when they are asked to fight for those who not only will not fight for themselves but who even declare fighting unnecessary. I have seen in this very city one white man make more and louder protest over a street car transfer than the whole hundred thousand black people ~~of this city~~ have made over the disgraceful conditions at the Union Station. What is the cause of this? Is it a race trait? No my friends, its cause is perfectly clear. Its cause is slavery. It is the penalty we pay for three centuries of degradation. The blood of servility is yet in our veins. We are not only not free without, we are still servile within and unless you would hand down the taint to your children - to your tents, O Israel. Under such circumstances it seems to me it is the business of the Negro race to nail this wide-spread lie that they are content and that in such a way as they will - quietly or noisily, privately or in public, in speech or personal conversation, lose no opportunity to let the people of the United States and the people of the world know that ten million human beings in this country are not willing today to be classed less than men.

48-2-72

In the second place our opportunist attitude is putting a premium upon selfishness and mediocrity among us. Twenty years ago when I was coming through school the Negro race said to me with one voice: "Get the best education possible and seek the highest". Today if the Negro race is saying anything openly and plainly to its children, I am at a loss to know just what that word is, but I am certainly sure that among the young people with whom I have worked for fifteen years the tendency is to question very materially whether it is worth while for a Negro boy to seek the best, whether it is not a good deal better to seek the biggest thing, the one that pays most or most quickly. And certainly the policy of the opportunist is putting forward today a set of men who owe their advancement neither to their brains nor to their work, not to their moral desert, but almost solely to their callousness or their sycophancy. And if this sort of thing goes on too long it will absolutely kill all the self-respect of the race, it will lead the race astray, and will set up false ideals and furnish proof of the incapacity of the Negro to their enemies. We have criticized and criticized harshly the policy of President Taft on Negro appointments to office. But recently I have been shown an authoritative statement saying that the policy "had the full approval" before it was uttered of several well-known leaders of the Negro race. In the light of that extraordinary revelation, I am not sure but that it is President Taft who has the best right to be angry and to ask if chosen leaders cannot speak for you, who in God's name can?

After, now this long trial of Opportunism with whatever

business revival may be put to its credit to offset its wretched failure in all things else, is there not need of a new enlightened selfishness to start an upward and forward movement? I do not ask, and no one has a right to ask, any unusual and disinterested unselfishness; this is an exceptional thing at any time and in any race and when it comes it does not have to be asked, it comes of its own free will. We have got a living to earn and families to support; we must fight with our eyes upon our bread and butter, remembering all the time that without bread and butter there will in the end be no fighting, but remembering also that under some circumstances the best of food is tasteless. Then, too, we must not forget for whose bread and butter we are fighting. If we were merely fighting for our own then we could bargain according to individual taste. But it is for the lives and careers and

There is no great no small
To the soul that maketh all Where it cometh all things are & it cometh everywhere

~~(one)~~

To such high souls I do not now need to speak but I speak to common men

(one)

48-2-76

surroundings of our children and our children's children that we strive today. Are we willing that they should live as we have lived?

Is it not time, then, that after fifteen years of experiment we should step forward in three definite directions: First, that we should seek to get a systematic and definite knowledge of ourselves; Second, that we should seek to make a systematic and continued protest against injustice, and Thirdly, that we should in every direction increase our organized endeavor. It does seem to me that this program is not one of frightful or forbidding radicalism, nor does it exclude anything for which an honest opportunist rightly strives. If we were living in a land by ourselves, knowledge would be supplied by a Census and by departmental reports and by newspapers. As it is, we have to depend for our knowledge of ourselves upon prejudiced and ill-informed official reports and upon newspapers whose business often is to disseminate what is not the truth. It seems to me that systematic gatherings of knowledge concerning conditions among us is a matter of first-hand importance, both for our own satisfaction, for purposes of social reform, and the refutation of slanders.

Then, as to protest: I think most men have in mind when they speak of agitation a wild haired man yelling and waving his arms in some place where he has no business to be. Personally, I have a good deal of respect for that sort of agitator and he has played his part in the world; it ill becomes you and me standing before the memory of William Lloyd Garrison and Frederick Douglass

to object to the agitator, but I am not asking today of all of you agitation of that sort. I am asking for a systematic protest. I would wish the Negro race so organized that the newspaper to-morrow which printed an unfair report concerning Negroes would receive in its very next mail from ten to one thousand letters of respectful but firm protest and that these letters should not come simply from the colored people but from fair-minded white people whom you and I had induced to protest. It seems to me that the man who is afraid or unwilling to carry on protest of this sort - by writing, by personal visits, by attending decently conducted meetings of protest,- It seems to me that the man who is not willing to do these things for the preserving of his rights, for the safe-guarding of the future of his children, is unworthy to hold any position of preferment or to claim to be a man.

We minimize the effect of such protest. Unless we can see mountains tumbling after one prayer we are done with praying. We think the little thing, the silent persistent endeavor, the continually dropping is useless because its results are not immediately apparent. Yet believe me the little meeting of twenty-nine poor and uninfluential black men at Niagara Falls six years ago has done more to let the world know that American Negroes are dissatisfied with conditions than anything else in a decade. Has it bettered those conditions? No. But it has bettered us. It is a great thing for a man to gain his own self-respect. And when that spirit of persistent protest and dissatisfaction pervades ten millions, does anyone doubt but that conditions will yield? * over

There never has been in human history a case where the wishes & ambitions of 10 million people has been permanently & successfully ignored unless they themselves gave up & surrendered & quickly crawled

48-2-80

Thirdly, as to organized endeavor: If today we take into account the Negro church, secret societies, insurance associations and business organizations, the various philanthropic endeavors, we shall find that practically every member of the Negro race is a member of one or more organization. The problem before us is how shall we get these organizations to work for the best interests of the Negro race - to work for social uplift and cooperation in all lines and ways which shall make them affective and worthy organizations. To bring about such organized cooperation and set forth the lines of work and emphasize the need, calls in itself for organized endeavor, and toward this, it seems to me, you and I are called upon to start and to start right off. But first of all what is the goal? What is the Ideal? What do we want? Can we formulate a reasonable platform of Negro demands today which will unite conservative and radical, opportunist and

48-2-81

and Path-finder?

I think we can. Certainly we can in private. Among Negroes themselves of all schools and any school there is substantial agreement on what we want; it is only when we come to tell white folks, that we get cautious and begin to express the most extraordinary differences of opinion. What do we want:

We want to be treated like men.

We want the legal rights of American citizens - the right to vote, the right to travel without public stigma, and the right to enjoy public conveniences on the same terms as other people.

We want education for our children - an education suited to their capacities and not simply to somebody's idea of their capacities, and finally, we want the opportunity for self-development and self-expression.

48-2-82

When we formulate our demands thus it may be objected: there are plenty of white people who do not get what you ask and what is the use of asking ~~what~~ all this when you know you cannot get all you ask. The answer is clear: the argument that a wrong is wide-spread is no excuse for its existence. If there are millions of people black and white who are today treated as beasts of burden, stunted by caste restrictions and denied opportunity this is reason for more and not less endeavor on the part of all thinking men to right these wrongs. If men stop asking for justice because some injustice will surely remain, then human progress is a dream. I do not expect to get all I ask today as a Negro, but I do expect to get something and I do expect to keep asking until the trump of doom.

I am willing, nay eager, to accept every small concession, every inch of advance and be thankful for it, but I will not pay for it with the lying assertion that its all I want. Nor does the counter-argument of desert deter me in the least. If everybody got what they deserved in this universe, there would be a good ~~many~~ several rich people begging, ~~many~~ several white people in slavery and several saints in hell.

But the key-note of the World today is not desert but opportunity, not the grudging dole of charity to the guilty but the rich flood of inspiration and uplift to all, that whosoever will may come and drink of the waters of life freely.

To accomplish this the world is using social investigation of conditions, persistent protest against evil and organized effort toward betterment. When we are advocating these methods for the Negro we are not advocating untried methods, for all the great movements of the present time are organized absolutely on these lines - Child Labor, the Peace Movement, the Protest against Poverty, the New Education - all these movements are organized with these three things in view: to gather the facts, protest against the wrong, and to gain organized cooperation to bring the right. If the cause of ten million people who want to be free is not worth the use of these time-honored instruments of civilization - what is it worth? Today we have for this purpose in New York a National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. And this association differentiates itself from other organizations in this one unusual respect, that is, it is organized in conjunction with those who are working in similar ways along other lines of social uplift. We comprise among us ~~Republican~~ social workers and reformers interested in nearly every line of social uplift. Hitherto, the Negro in the United States has had little interest in the work of these people. Strange to say, he has rather sided with the great capitalists and philanthropists and is even found speaking against social reform, against races like the Jews and against all people who are fighting for a cause. The time for this foolishness has passed. These are the people who are revolutionizing the world. We must recognize that the cause of the Negro is one with every cause of world uplift and one which employs the same methods and uses the same arguments, and we must therefore, join hands with all people throughout the world who are working for the world's good.

48-2-85

(over)

We want your help.
We want your Cooperation
We want you to Contribute Thought & effort
We want you to give us money whether 10 cents or 10 dollars And we ask that not in our own names but in the name of 10 million suffering people who by the Grace of God & your right hands shall set their faces toward the stars

(1)

1910

38-2-49

THE CITY NEGRO

In 1900 twenty-three per cent of the Negro population (or, about two millions of people) lived in cities and towns, and about one and a half million lived in cities of eight thousand or more inhabitants, while in the large cities of one hundred thousand, there were about 650,000 persons of Negro descent. As compared with the white population, therefore, the Negroes are essentially a country people, and there are those among us who argue that they should remain such. Notwithstanding this, the proportion of city Negroes is increasing steadily and will increase. Probably the census of the present year will show nearly three millions living in the cities and towns. Now the reasons for this are ~~obvious~~ perfectly obvious. The same forces that have put forty-three percent of the white people in towns are operating among Negroes. They are attracted by the more interesting life and larger social opportunities, a greater economic return, a better chance for civilization and culture. But in the case of Negroes there are additional reasons: the country life of the Negro still savours of slavery and often the only way to escape peonage is to run away to town. In fact there are today many resemblances between the situation of the Negro in the country districts of the United States, and the serf of the Middle Age who ran away to town to escape serfdom. Under such circumstances, the person who wishes the Negro to stay in the country districts of the South, must make those country districts places where human beings with reasonable aspirations will want to stay: the crop lein system and contract labor laws must go; land ownership must be made possible to the poor; law and order must be established and above all, public schools maintained. Until this is possible in the country districts of the South, the rush to town and city among black people is going to continue; and for my part I do not see that we can blame people for such migration. Not only that, but practically the whole migration from South to North is a migration to cities. The reasons for this, too, are obvious: Northern agriculture is unknown to the Negro and farmland is high. On the other hand there are some economic openings in the city and of these the Negro takes advantage. Consequently we face ~~this situation of the~~ various Negro problems in the United States involving ~~which involves~~ many different circumstances and surroundings and conditions.

(2)

38-2-50

38-2-51

38-2-52

One of these problems we are to talk about tonight, that is the problem of the city Negro in the North. When one first comes to face such a problem there are one or two answers that spring to the lips: the first is, why should one single out the colored people in the North and call them a problem any different from the problem of a half dozen other nationalities who are crowding ~~crowded here~~ our large cities? and secondly, why is it that Negroes trained in the United States & particularly in the North for long years, and with opportunities for education and work, should remain a problem. In answer to these questions we must remember that much as we may deplore it there is a line of demarcation and a line of discrimination against Negroes which is drawn, in the United States, against almost no other race; and that it is this discrimination which makes the Negro problem in our Northern cities call, in some degree, for special treatment. Primarily the discrimination is economic. It resolves itself into a difficulty, a very great difficulty, ~~to find~~ in finding remunerative employment. This is ~~not~~ sometimes but not always on account of lack of ability among the colored applicants ~~, but on~~ in too many cases it is on account of the distaste of workingmen to work with them ~~on the same money basis,~~ and also ~~from too~~ on account of the feeling of the employers that Negroes on the whole should be kept in certain more or less menial positions. The result is , of course, that such positions carry with them a certain mark of degradation, ~~and~~ so long as a proscribed people are forced into certain kinds of work, ~~despite their~~ regardless of their ability and fitness, the work itself becomes proscribed. All the difficulties of the house servant problem do not, or course, arise from this fact. But No one can deny that the coupling of a partially emancipated people with certain kinds of domestic service has tended to make a perfectly honorable line of employment degraded in the eyes of working people. Many would say, to this that if the economic opportunities of Negroes are so small in Northern cities why do they come? and also they would silently add ~~say~~ is it not best on the whole to discourage their coming.[2] The difficulty is that while the economic opportunities of Negroes in ~~the~~ a city like New York are small as compared with the economic opportunities offered to white people they are on the other hand, large as compared to what is opened to them in the South, either in city or country. We have, therefore, this peculiar situation: people are attracted to certain centers by wages and opportunities ~~higher and~~ better than they can get at home; but, at the same time, these wages and opportunities are much less ~~and differ~~ than what their fellow workingmen get in these same centers. The result, now, is going to be a two-fold difficulty. First, the tendency is going to be that the Negroes earning more than they have been used to before are going to be lulled to a certain indifference to conditions. These conditions, however, both of work and home and daily life are going to be below the standard of the community in ~~the~~ which they live, and they are going to bring upon the Negroes, not only the moral condemnation of their neighbors who object to their mode of life, but also the economic condemnation of their fellow workingmen who object to the standard of living which allows the Negroes to lower the general level of wages. If now the complications stopped here, the remedy would be obvious, namely: to raise the standard of living, to encourage cooperation among colored people and ambition among colored children. Here, however, is where the discrimination along the color line works. The young Jew who is bright and aspiring, the young Pole who has ability, the young Italian who is ambitious finds on the whole, a pretty open way before him, and large encouragement. The young Negro not only finds the way difficult and the encouragement hesitating, but he always must face the fact, that no matter how high he may force himself by sheer ability and desert, he will in the judgment of his neighbors be continually classed with the worst of his fellows who happen to be of the same color; to illustrate this, note the history of the Negro in New York City: in the eighteenth century there were 1500 Negroes living in the city, at the beginning of the nineteenth there were 6,000 in Manhattan and 600 in Brooklyn, at the beginning of the twentieth century there were 38,000 in Manhattan and the Bronx, and 18,000 in Brooklyn. These Negroes up until 1850 were largely distributed among different white families or in scattered districts among themselves. In 1850 there began a segregation of them, which culminated perhaps in 1890, — a movement which, After the Civil war, sent much of the Negro population to Brooklyn. Such a group has had a history and an interesting history, and that history has this peculiarity, which differentiates it from similar groups of men, namely: that the attempt of the best of the group to climb higher in the organized life of the community, has been continually so frustrated by racial prejudice, that the oncoming new emigrants have unwittingly but certainly buried the higher life beneath their lower standard. This has been the history of the Negro not only in New York, but in Philadelphia, Chicago and nearly all of the large cities. To turn to New York again: The first Negro school of the United States was opened at the beginning of the 18th Century in Manhattan ~~New York~~ yet the Negro plots of 1707 and 1712 brought tremendous opposition against Negro education in general. When the Negro school was continued up until middle of the 18th Century and new Negroes arrived, a third Negro plot again nearly overwhelmed it and it took the brave fighting of the black men in the

38-2-53

38-2-54

38-2-55

38-2-52

38-2-57

38-2-58

38-2-59

38-2-60

Revolutionary War to over come the strong sentiment against them at this time. In 1777 the right of suffrage was extended to New York Negroes and they began to push forward. Ten years later they had a large free school, the slave trade was prohibited from the state, and the Free African Society founded. Notwithstanding this new life ~~that~~ the color discrimination against them grew ~~Negroes~~ became so great that they had to withdraw even from some of the churches ~~the Methodist church~~ and start a church of their own. Again In the War of 1812, Negroes ~~pa~~ fought under Perry and Chauncey, and one-half of McDonough's men at Lake Champlain were Negroes; two thousand Negro soldiers were called for, and the Negro school at

13

And on the heels of

~~and the Negro school~~ in William St., had two hundred pupils. ~~But with~~ this pressing forward came the burning of that Negro school, ~~and~~ & the restriction of Negro suffrage by property qualifications which applied to them alone. Later The education of Negroes increased and a larger Negro was school opened on Mulberry street, having five hundred pupils. In 1820

38-2-61

Lafayette visited the school and his chief surprise was not at the ~~way in~~ excellent conduct of the pupils, but at of the ~~spirit~~ spread of color prejudice in the United States, since the day when he had fought side by side with black men for the freedom of white men in this land.

14

Slavery finally disappeared from New York in 1827 the same year that the first Negro newspaper was established, edited by the first Negro college graduate, John Russwurm of Dartmouth. The Public School Society in 1834 took the Negro schools under their supervision, and the same year

38-2-62

both in N.Y. and Philadelphia saw the beginning of riots against Negroes and Negroes were refused even ride on the street cars in some cases, & the opportunity to act as drayman, and the legislature refused to remove restrictions on their voting. During all ~~of~~ this time men of influence from time to time and education had arisen in the city among the black group. James Macune

Smith, unable to gain admission to an medical school in America received his degree with honors from Edinburgh in Scotland. He practiced in New York City for twenty-five years. He was a man of culture and skill, and in any other civilization, and almost any other land, would have been recognized as such. Charles L. Reason became a teacher and leader of the colored people in the days before the War. Henry ~~Allen~~ Highland Garnett became one of their leading ministers. The group not only had their schools and their leaders but ~~ow~~ they owned property. When Governor Ward Hunt recommended the passage of the black laws which would have forbidden even the settlement of any blacks or mulattoes within the City of New York, and would have placed further restrictions on those ~~at that time citizens~~ already here, the charge of unthrift was utterly disproven by a statement showing that ~~in those places~~ even where ~~in which the~~ conditions were the worst, in New York, Brooklyn and Williamsburg, the Negro had increased twenty-five per cent in population and one hundred per cent in holdings of real estate, and that in these three cities they had, in 1847, $800,000 invested in business and $1,160,000 in real estate. // If now this group of people had been allowed to rise in the community according to their desert, and if economic and political opportunities had been freely opened to them, large numbers of them would have arisen out of the way of the new emigrants who poured into the cities since the War. This was not the case, however, so that we have even today a peculiar congestion: a pressing down upon the better class from the top, and a pressing in of the new negroes from the bottom. Such a result calls for special social work such as is represented by the Lincoln Settlement. The need for this social work throughout the land has been recognized, not simply by white people but by Negroes themselves, and they have been in the last ten years hastening to cooperate. There are in the United States today some six social settlements (outside of the Negro schools in the South which are largely settlements in character) about forty-~~five~~ hospitals which have been organized ~~by the~~ and manned by colored people, ~~60 or more~~ orphanages, ~~x 75~~ old folk's homes; 136 Young Men's Christian Associations and ~~a large number of~~ 30 or 40 Young Women's Christian Associations. All these represent very largely an attempt at social betterment within the Negro group. To be effective, however, this attempt must be seconded by the best thought and larger economic power of the white neighbor. Lincoln Settlement represents this union of forces. In no other way can the efficiency of a community of white people and black people and their striving for the best social betterment be raised ~~consummated~~. Here is a constituent part of the population of the city. It needs encouragement to develop itself. It meets a peculiar pressing difficulties It is willing and even determined to help in its own development.

38-2-63

38-2-64

38-2-65

38-2-66

Its need of development is wholly not its own fault, either in the past or now. What it asks ~~for~~ of you is sympathy in its higher aims, cooperation and money to help in the work. I know of no more effective way to work for the social uplift, ~~in~~ not simply of the Negro people but of the city of Brooklyn and the state of New York and indeed of the United States, than through efficient aid to an institution like the Lincoln Settlement.

38-2-67

once the largest body of officers and the greatest expenditure of public funds."

The casual reader might not note all the implications of this statement. 1868 was the year when black voters came into power in South Carolina and the first and greatest gift of the Negro to South Carolina in reconstruction days was the public school system. This was not only true in South Carolina but true in practically every other state which has since disfranchised these black voters. How now is the situation of public education in the South affected by reason of this disfranchisement? The main conditions which must be borne in mind are these: there is throughout these states a double system of schools - one for whites and one for persons of Negro descent; in two states there are also parts of a third system for Indians. This means that the Negro schools are primarily the schools of the laboring class. They are, however, supervised invaribly by white officials. In none of the states that have the disfranchised Negroes is there, so far as I have been able to find out, a single Negro superintendent or trustee in charge of Negro schools.* ~~There may be some few exceptions in Virginia and North Carolina.~~ Moreover, so far as the Negro public schools are concerned, they exist under the disfavor of the majority of the whites; White employers frowning upon them because, as they say, they make labor dissatisfied and aggressive and the white laborers disliking them because they increase competition. The result, now, of this situation can be summed up in four different propositions: first, there is discrimination against Negro schools as compared with white schools; second there is an attempt to decrease the efficiency of Negro schools; third, the forward movement among the white schools is made impossible or improbable among Negroes; and lastly, disfranchisement has led to peculiar cases of discrimination among the whites, based largely upon property.

58-96-98

98-9C-8E

* Note No 1

98-9C-8E

4

4 pages

38-96-38

Let me take up each one of the propositions in order.

First, there is discrimination against the Negro schools as compared with the whites. ~~First,~~ There is the almost inevitable discrimination arising from two school systems. If ~~you had a~~ the white and black population were evenly distributed ~~and~~ or perfectly segregated, the double system of schools need bring no particular race discrimination or waste. This, however, very seldom occurs and, ~~moreover, it does not occur but~~ usually if there are in districts ~~of~~ few white people ~~and~~ or few Negroes, ~~where~~ they are very apt under this double system to be left entirely without schools. There are districts in Missouri Kentucky, Maryland and in the hill counties of the Gulf states where the scattered Negro population is left practically without schools. There are also ~~some~~ cases in the mountains and in the Black Belt where the white people are similarly neglected, ~~but~~ although for reasons which I shall give later this ~~Rather~~ case is more seldom in the Black Belt.

38-96-38

When it comes to the expenditure of money the discrimination between whites and blacks is painfully apparent. In South Carolina for instance, the white schools cost $1,600,000 in 1909, while the Negro schools cost $300,000, and this notwithstanding the fact that

[pp 7-19 missing]

20

Ch-9C-9E

~~were paid on an average of $113 a year~~.

Some of these discriminations have been known for some time and have been defended to some extent by two arguments: first, that the Negroes pay so few taxes that the burden of their schools falls upon the whites and that white schools are bad and until the whites make their own schools better it is not to be expected that they are going to spend money on Negro schools. The other argument is that the Negro's standard of living being low, their schools should cost less, ~~being less pat entions~~, their teachers de paid less and equipment Their

of himself."

[pp 21-2 missing]

23

Ch-9C-9E

The Superintendent of the schools of Wilson, N. C. says:*

"I am confident, whether my figures are absolutely accurate or not, that any one who takes the pains to ascertain the present sources of the public funds of these States and then tries to make a fair division of them between the races will come to the conclusion that the Negro school is not very much of a white man's burden, in at least three States, unless the white man is ready to say that the division I suggest is not a fair one. And, in view of the facts set forth for these three States, will the white man be able to maintain successfully that he

* Paper read before 12th annual Conference for Education in the South, April 1909 pays nearly all the cost of the Negro public schools in these States?

Time is not at hand to make a d tailed study of this question for all the eleven states under consideration. What is true of the school funds of the three States considered above is probably true of all the others. A somewhat careful study of this question for several years leads me tothe conclusion that the Negro school of the South is no serious burden on the white taxpayer. The same conclusion will be reached if the subject is approached from another standpoint. Suppose the Negro children of these states were all white. Then it will be

Ep-25-31 missing

3 2 25

Ep-26-43

And also that while the white people of Fulton County own seventy-five and a half million dollars worth of property, the Negroes own but one and a third million. If now in any community of the North the schooling of the laboring population was made dependent upon ~~their~~ the poorest classes giving, ~~outside~~ outside of their regular taxation, enough money to build, & equip their own school houses, there is not an honest citizen in the country who would not cry "shame"! The argument as to the standard of living among colored people is, of course, fallacious. If we are ~~not~~ training Negroes for citizenship in the United States, we are training them for equal citizenship, and to keep them down on the plea that they are down would be a contradiction of such argument. If the standard of living among the Negroes is low, then there is every reason why their wages should be gradually but persistently increased and that standard raised. Otherwise they pull down the wages of all white laborers with whom they come into competition. If their standard of education is low, then they need not poor teachers or poorly equipped teachers, but the very best teachers and these well paid. There has been an attempt, however, to evade this question and cloud its logic by saying that the Negroes need good training, to be sure, but it ought to be a special training suited to their peculiar situation. This, on its face is perfectly true; all education ought to be special.- special so far as the group is concerned and special so far as the individual is concerned. When however it is assumed that everybody without investigation or knowledge knows just what special education is suited to one people, a one individual in this land, and when it is also assumed that such special education should be so essentially different from the education given to whites that Negroes should be precluded from taking advantage of the higher avenues of education, then these assumptions are not only wrong but dangerous. It is said, for instance, that Negroes need agricultural training, that ~~the~~ a great field is open for them in agriculture in the South. This is true, but instead of ~~giving~~ allowing them agricultural training the money which is appropriated by the United States Government for agricultural education to the Southern States is for various reasons and excuses and by means of various [redacted] subterfuges given very largely to the education of the whites. Moreover, there has recently been started a movement for the establishment of agricultural schools in the congressional districts of the South. Such schools have been established in Georgia at a cost of $508,000; every cent of which has gone to white schools. Other Southern States have done the same thing. It cannot be said ~~even~~ then that there is any disposition in the South to give the Negroes that agricultural training which they are said to especially need, and which they do need. Not only is this true of agricultural training but it is also true of industrial training. The Superintendent of North Carolina says:

SP-9E-0E

9h-9e-2E

3(

Th - 9e - 9E

"When we are apportioning only $366,734.28 for the education of 350000 231,801 negro children (230000 and some of us are complaining about that) we need not be entertaining many hopes of giving the negro much helpful industrial education yet, for everybody ought to know that this amount

The Superintendent of the North Carolina schools says that the sum of

is not sufficient to give this number of children thorough instruction in the mere rudiments of reading, writing, and arithmetic, so essential to civilized living and intelligent, efficient service in the humblest calling of life. As long as we are appropriating only this much money for this number of children, nobody need have any real concern about turning the negro's head by the study of Latin and Greek and other higher branches of learning. The statistical tables of this report show that not a single negro is reported as studying Latin in a single public school of the State." The real animus and meaning of those who are advocating special education for Negroes was plainly stated in the meeting of the ~~Superin-~~ ~~tendents~~ Georgia State Teachers' Association ~~last week in~~ in May 1910 at Atlanta:

49-25-96

appropriation for Negro schools by the state

Again ~~Thirdly~~, the situation on account of disfranchisement makes it impossible for Negroes to use the weapon of group compulsion. A white community in the South can vote a special school tax and if the majority consent they can make the minority pay this tax regularly and support a school. The Negroes can do nothing of the sort, but are usually compelled to pay taxes toward the white school and get little or nothing in return. ~~In one county of Georgia,~~ for instance

60

49-25-97

[illegible] 38-59 MISSING

~~withhold but will give to responsible parties,~~ in a certain county of Georgia a Negro private school is granted a small amount from the county school fund received from the state. In the town, however where the school is situated there is a special school tax laid on colored and white alike. ~~There~~ Nearly all of this tax goes to the white school. When the principal of the Negro private school called the attention of the school superintendent to this fact, the superintendent threatened to take away the county appropriation of his school if he did not keep still. Thus we have not only taxation without representation, but taxation without sharing its benefits. All these facts which I have given must be well-known to the agents for education and uplift like the Southern EducationalBoard. A prominent Southern member of that board asked them to put the question of Negro education on its programme at its last meeting at Little Rock but the Board refused to do so. From the first the Southern Educational Board accepted the ~~species~~ argument: "whites first, then Negroes". The result is a policy ~~it has adopted~~ that says: "The education of whites ~~but~~ and as little education for Negroes as possible."

49-25:99

Thus the Negroes are ~~disfranchi~~ discriminated against; their public schools show a distinct signs of a retrogressive movement; help from the North is discouraged, and they themselves have their hands tied, so that it is difficult, if not impossible, to initiate a forward movement so far as the schools are concerned. Their only remedy is double taxation and private schools.

49-25-100

[FOLLOWING PAGES MISSING]

So far, I have spoken of the affect of disfranchisement on the Negro schools, and the facts that I have brought forward are but a cry for justice toward these schools. I realize, however, that an appeal for justice for black men without showing how that justice is

VIOLATIONS OF PROPERTY RIGHTS

Few people who argue about the race problem ~~realize~~ know how rapidly that problem changes. Within the last twenty years this change has been so great that many fail to realize it or if they do realize it more or less vaguely they are puzzled at its new outcropings. It seems to them as though this human difficulty was continually developing new and unexpected centers of trouble. As a matter of fact, however, what we have today might easily have been fore-seen twenty years ago. We are having a change in the problem but the change is logical and represents a more or less regular development.

To illustrate this let us remember what the argument against the Negro was in slavery days. It was said that he was an indolent tropical being who would not work without being driven, and that it was utterly impossible that he should become a self-directing worker, and work with initiative and a decent standard of life and that if he was allowed to go free he would become a pauper or criminal and verysoon be extinct. This argument was thoroughly believed in by the mass of the best Southern people, and it undoubtedly did much to hold their hands back from all schemes of emancipation.

After the War the South and its friends hastened to point out that exactly what they fore-told was happening. Their accusation against the Negro race was still inborn laziness, and most superficial students of the Negro problem ~~have seen~~ can see what they ~~think is~~ thought was ocular evidence of this laziness: the loafing about depots of Southern railway ~~stations~~, the unreliability of Negro help, etc. So that from emancipation for a period of perhaps ten or twenty years the argument against the Negro in this country took this form: the Negro is lazy and is relapsing into barbarism, the young folks born during and since slavery are utterly worthless, and the better slaves of the old regime are going to disappear.

There was some truth in these assertions, but friends of the black man pointed out that a sudden revolution had taken place in the economic and social relations of these men; that they had been taught laziness both by the tropical climate of their forefathers' home and by slavery, and that the only real present dangers were the hindrances which race prejudice was putting in their way. Gradually in the last fifteen or twenty years an answer to this argument was evolved. It was frankly admitted that there was prejudice and intense prejudice in social relations but that this prejudice had absolutely nothing to do with the Negro as a workingman and that consequently the argument of prejudice was outside of the question; that it was simply a matter of laziness and was to be cured by thrift. The Negro people were told, therefore, to work hard and regularly and save their money.

In this counter ~~later~~ argument, again, there was a tremendous amount of truth. Certainly the first thing that a freedman must learn is regular habits and labor. He has been taught by slavery that labor is a badge of serfdom. He must teach himself that labor is a necessity of life. Moreover under the slave regime money was an infrequent commodity which was immediately to be spent; while under the responsibilities of a free labor system it must be accumulated in small lots and very carefully guarded and saved.

(5)

While, however, this argument was strong and an argument that ought to have been made, it was not the argument that should have utterly displaced the insistence upon the evil of race prejudice. It was not too much to have asked intelligent people to foresee that race prejudice in the United States was going to hinder Negroes in getting work, and keep down their wages, and make it difficult for them to develop habits of thrift and to save. While on the one hand it was necessary and imperatively necessary that work and thrift should be insisted upon so far as Negroes were concerned, just as careful and wide-spread ~~and~~ a campaign should have been carried on to see that the way before the faltering feet of the freedman was clear of hurtful and deadening discriminative prejudice. This necessity was not only not attended to, but was even forgotten. The public have in later years come to be impatient of hearing about prejudice. They call it dwelling on the unpleasant side. They ask social students and observers to be optimistic and to dwell simply upon the shortcomings of the Negroes.

(6)

What has been the result of this policy? In the first place, so far as the Negroes are concerned, there can be no doubt that their energies have more and more been given to work and thrift, and despite all the testimonies of car-window sociologists there is absolutely undisputed evidence that the Negro has accumulated property. // Full statistics unfortunately do not exist to prove this assertion; so far as crime is concerned we can get statistics of Negroes in practically egery state, county and city in the United States, but when it comes to property there are only available figures in three states, and only in one state ~~had~~ do these figures go back for a considerable period.

(7)

The state of Georgia beginning with 1874 has kept a careful account of the assessed value of the property owned by its Negro citizens. I have put on a chart here the way in which that property has increased. It began at six millions in 1874 and did not increase for about six years owing to the reconstruction troubles in this state. Then as gradually law and order were restored the accumulations began to go up and once started they went very rapidly until they reached the culminating point in 1893. At that time the Negroes of Georgia were paying taxes on $14,000,000 worth of property. Then there came a check. First the panic of 1892, then a series of Jim Crow laws, four-cent cotton, and the epidemic of lynching. The result was that for five years the accumulations decreased or wavered. Then they took a new forward movement with the new century and went up rapidly until today the Negroes of Georgia pay taxes on about $30,000,000 worth of property. Moreover, as the assessments of property in Georgia are low it is probable that this represents between fifty and sixty millions of actual value.

(8)

I have also tried to indicate on the chart the increase per capita of Negro property by a dotted line, and I have put down the Atlanta riot and the campaign for disfranchisement to indicate to you what is very clear in my mind, that this campaign was carried on chiefly because the Negroes were getting on too well.

(9)

Other states have made similar advancement, although there are fewer data. In Virginia for instance in 1891 Negroes paid taxes on $12,000,000 worth of property; in 1908 they paid taxes on $25,500,000. In North Carolina in 1900 Negroes paid taxes on nine and a third million dollars worth of property; in 1909 they paid taxes on $21,000,000 worth. Taking these three states together and considering simply the years 1900 to 1908 we find that in Georgia, Virginia and North Carolina colored people owned in 1900, $40,000,000 worth of taxable property and in 1908 it had increased to $74,000,000 or an increase of 87 1/3 per cent.

Not only this but the Census of 1900 made an attempt to get some figures of the ownership of property by Negroes as a whole. They found that the Negroes both as owners and tenants operated 750,000 farms containing 60,000 square miles and that the total value of the property

(10)

thus under Negro control was $560,000,000, with annual products to the amount of $256,000,000. Of these 750,000 farms, one-fourth were owned by colored people and the number of owners increased nearly sixty per cent between 1890 and 1900, and there is every reason to believe that between 1900 and 1910 the increase has been far more than sixty per cent and that today Negroes own somewhere near one-third of the farms which they operate.

Taking the 200,000 farms of the Negro owners we find that they had in 1900 nearly 15,000,000 acres of land which was worth $180,000,000 and raised $60,000,000 worth of products. All Negro farm property was extimated by the Census to be worth about $230,000,000 ten years ago. The American Economic Association took up the subject and concluded that the total property of the Negro race in 1900 was $300,000,000. If, however, the property has increased in the last ten years throughout the land in the same ratio as in Georgia, North Carolin and Virginia, then it would be fair to infer that the property of the Negroes in the United States should be assessed at $600,000,000.

Compared with the wealth of the United States these figures are small, but considered in the light of the fact that they represent the savings of a race that began practically without capital a generation ago, they are simply astounding. But what I want to point out today is that this accumulation has been made in the face of discouragements and violations of property rights such as no other class of Americans ever met. In the first place we must remember that it is the despised second generation since slavery that have made these accumulations and that these people have saved their money in the face of the following impediments:

1. The lack of facilities for saving, and deliberate cheating.
2. The hostility of local municipal policy.
3. Discrimination in wages.
4. Mob Violence.
5. Legal Violence.

I want to take up each one of these in turn.

First, as to the lack of facilities for saving. Few people realize how difficult it is in the South for the poor man to save who wants to. Usually in the country districts there are but two methods open to him: to horde his money or to hand it over to some white friend. There have been numberless cases where such white friends and patrons have taken care of the money of their Negro clients and acted as bankers with the result that the colored man has been able to keep his savings secure and to accumulate. However, in an unfortunately large number of other cases the colored man has been cheated. Sometimes the patron has died suddenly and the client has been able to get no accounting from the heirs. This was peculiarly the case in regard to the property which free Negroes and favorite slaves accumulated before the War. In other cases the client has died and his heirs have been deliberately cheated by the patron. This has often been defended: Here is an old and favorite colored man whose property is ~~safe in the~~ kept by a white man. So long as he lives the property is safe in the white man's hands. If he dies the white man decides that the children ought not have the property or do not deserve it, and takes it for his own purposes.. In still other cases there is a deliberate attempt to cheat the client by false accounts or other devices. It is of course impossible to present figures to show the extent of this prac-

(13)

49-25-101

(16)

is scarcely a city in the South where the tenderloin district has not been deliberately placed in the Negro quarter and kept there despite the protest of the better class of Negroes. All this hurts Negro property and makes the investment of Negroes in property difficult. Moreover the same thing that happens so often in the North is accentuated in this case, i.e., the small householder pays a disproportionately large share of the taxes as compared with the large householder or capitalist. The burden of taxation in Southern cities is shifted upon the small Negro property owner to an extent which is astounding. All this discourages accumulation and particularly discourages investment. But particularly the gross and glaring injustice to Negroes in the lower courts makes it difficult and often impossible to defend their property rights. The magistrates and judges are usually elected for most terms often on an anti-Negro platform and are bitter and openly unfair.

[pp 14-15 missing]

(17)

Third, Wage discrimination. It is the deliberate policy of the South to pay Negroes less wages for the same work than they would pay white people, just as is the case in the North where they pay women less wages for the same work than they pay men. The argument in the South is that the Negro has a lower standard of life and therefore does not need as much money. The discrimination varies from twenty-five to fifty per cent. This makes it more difficult for Negroes to save money because, as a matter of fact, while their standard of living is lower than that of the average white person it is rapidly rising and the demand upon their meagre income for better housing, better food and better clothing is such that the margin for saving is very small or entirely disappears.

Fourth, Mob violence. Of all the hindrances enumerated: lack of facilities for saving, hostility of municipal policy and wage discrimination, none are such determents to saving in the South as the fear of mob violence. It is hard to realize in a law-abiding community how the fear of physical violence broods in the air in the South. No Negro can feel himself safe from it. He cannot invest in property without taking it into account. In some cases it is impossible to get his property insured for this very reason, and almost always when for any reason there is an outbreak of great violence in the South, it is the Negro property-holder who actually pays the bill. The result is that continually men who might otherwise invest in property refrain from doing this and other colored men who invest do so with the idea of removing to the North just as soon as they get large enough investments. The feeling of insecurity against the jealousy and viciousness of certain Southern elements is daily in their minds. It is this feeling too that drives the Negro into the cities; there his property gets greater

(18)

31-9-89

(19)

31-9-88

police protection because it cannot be destroyed without in some degree injuring the property of white owners or injuring the general credit of the community. I know numbers of cases where prosperous Negro farmers have given up their farms and moved to the city because they were afraid to live in that degree of comfort on the farm which their rising standard of living and ownership of property entitled them to. A new building better than that of some of their white neighbors or a new carriage and new horses was simply a red rag to the mob.

Finally, this kind of mob violence has gone so far that we are seeing attempts today to translate it into legal violence. Just as the cheating of the Negro out of his vote was done by extra legal methods at first and now is done by methods called legal, so the cheating of Negroes out of their property rights is now about to be translated into some semblance of legal form. The whole question of segregation in property is comeing up at a later session and therefore does not fall within the province of this paper, however, I wish to point out that segregation is the violating of ~~pop~~ property rights and that it is as futile an attempt to solve the Negro problem as any of the previous subterfuges have been.

(20)

In the time of slavery we had the subterfuge of colonization to tempt the conscientious mind; in the time of Reconstruction we had the subterfuge of threatened Negro domination to blind those who ought to have seen; in the days since Reconstruction we have had the subterfuge of industrial inefficiency to make people forget race prejudice. Today the world, north and south, is being asked to believe that the crux of the Negro problem lies in keeping black men from buying property on your street. All through this history of subterfuge and evasion has run the great and dominating fact of a racial prejudice which denies the application of the ethics of Jesus Christ in the relations of men if these men happen to be of a different race. It is theobject of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to impress the fact upon the American people that the foundation difficulty of the race problem is this dispicable race prejudice and unless we attak this central difficulty we never shall settle this problem. Moreover, we insist that this peoblem must be settled and settled right because it is but a part of a greater problem which is as wide as the world.

30-26-3

30-26-2

[1911] (Lyceum club Dinner) [use or not as you think best]

Mr. Du Bois spoke in substance as follows;

Your Highness, Ladies and Gentlemen:
Once when a friend of mine sought to tell a New York clergyman about the race problem in the U.S., the clergyman said: "Don't tell me I'm afraid I may become interested!" I think most of us have that feeling when in a complicated world we are asked to listen to further complications. Therefore I hasten to assure you tonight that my task is not to bring you an additional problem to solve but rather to point out a point of view from which you may look at all your problems. No matter what great social problem a man is interested in today he will find that sooner or later it crosses the Color Line: if it is the Problem of sex and the freedom of women certainly the women of the white race have more than a sentimental interest in the welfare of the mass of their darker sisters; for it is race prejudice [illegible] today that makes the quantity rather than the quality of children of greater importance in the future world and ~~[illegible]~~ womanhood can never rise to its rightful place in the worlds respect so long as white men may degrade black women & commingle and more.

3x-2-1916

So too with the problem of labor; today the laborers of the world through the fluidity of capital are coming more and more into competition and so long as black slaves and yellow coolies are degraded, white workingmen will not be able to maintain a satisfactory wage. And this dissatisfaction brings us to the problem of democracy — that theory that the governed should have some voice in their government. It is a theory hard to work and we realize yet. we have come to believe ~~[illegible]~~ in it thoroughly for white men, but if it is not true for the many races of the darker world that democratic government even in the white world will be called upon to tyrannize over their fellow men in a way which will soon endanger their own democratic ideals

38-2-147

And finally in the paramount problem of peace & war what great provocative of war is there today than race & color prejudice — either directly or indirectly that the race interests of Nordic nations in the undeveloped races.

So that to me the problem of the 20th Century seems to me to be the problem of the Color line, because rightly viewed nearly all other problems assume their truest relations when viewed from the interests of the majority of mankind belonging to the darker races.

For this reason I venture to speak to you to night concerning one land where

58-2-148

This world-wide race problem presents an acute at most significant aspect. In the U.S. we are dealing with one of the worlds races usually assumed to be the lowest and least with minimum contact than a diametric duality with the white race. The outcome of this contact is therefore of immense significance for the race problems of the world.

The Negro race in America has made great strides in advancement in the single generation that has elapsed since emancipation. 94 is too be sure still a poor larger ignorant people with its usual problems of sickness & crime, but in less than 50 years it has reduced its illiteracy from over ninety to less than 35%; it has increased its property from almost nothing to an assessed value of 600 millions of dollars, it owns land equal to Holland + Belgium in area and its organized life in religion & social lines has shown remarkable development.

38-2-140

How has this advancement been met by the white Americans? At best the enthusiasm of post bellum times & a fleeting kind — the crusade for education & uplift in three days was one of the finest movements of the 19th century, & there is still much help & encouragement But on the whole it must be confessed that the unbelievable enmity of the white south has succeeded in coolly the enthusiasm of the north and has met the hand now advanced of the black man by a steady and determined resistance & race prejudice In the states where 3/4 of the Negroes live they have been disfranchised and the laws so enforced and & exclude the educated & prosperous working class as well as the others; the ~~race has be~~ attempt has been made so to segregate the race in daily life that the ordinary sources of information and enlightenment shall be cut off; the door of opportunity for uplift & advancement has been more & more often closed in colored men's faces — a system of brutal insult & humiliation ~~to~~ is daily practised against colored blood today & gain extent almost unbelievable.

38-2-150

Why is this? It is not because the American White people are naturally devilish — they are on the whole about the same kindly people that you are and you under similar circumstances in India and Africa have shown similar tendencies. Consequently ~~you~~ the Americans interpolate the public opinion of Europe as judging them to make what I may call the 3 Refusals:

38-2-151

38-2-152

1. The refusal to treat cultured black men as cultured.
2. The refusal to allow particular black men to become cultured
3. The refusal to assume the possibility of culture in black men.

These refusals involve great and lamentable moral evil:

Among the whites they give rise to insulting manners toward the lowly, they prevent the contact of the cultured and the undeveloped, they lead to an abuse of logic as for instance accusing of bad manners those against whom every effort is made to give them no chance to see good manners; ~~to extend those of dressing~~ ~~strict equality with man~~ and above all crying for purity of race after the whites have been responsible for 2 or 3 million mulattoes. Further than this the Three Refusals lead to injustice in the courts and a terrible paradox in religion for while they affirm a religious humility and equality the Christian church in America has for the most part refused fellowship with black men.

38-2-153

Among Negroes these Three Refusals lead to loss of self respect or unwonted self-assertion; they hinder the natural differentiation of classes according to culture & efficiency & they force thereby Negroes either into contentment hypocrisy or paralyzing bitterness.

How far true is America's interpretation of Europe's attitude toward the darker world justified? It must be confessed with sorrow that modern European civilization has fallen victim to the temptation of all former civilizations — the temptation of despising men; of assuming that no other peoples are worthy consideration & respect but those whose share their own culture. The tendency is to assume an essentially antagonism of races with whites at the top and blacks at the bottom. No sooner is this assumption baldly stated however than we remember that the same assumption was made less than a century ago concerning classes in the same nation & that today European culture is largely sustained by descendants of round classes whose the 19th century pronounced incapable of uplift.

"Whatever science today places no metes & bounds to the development of races. Given the favorable environment & there is no scientific proof that any individual of any race may not reach the highest. On this reason is it not the truest & best course to refuse to tread the paths of exclusion

38-2-154

& human dignity & to see that the gates of opportunity are absolutely closed in the faces of no race or people. To be sure this policy will have its difficulties — the advancement of men is no easy path and the direct & indirect economic cost will be great. But above all cost will float the Vision Splendid — the realization of a world with the Chief cause of war — race hygiene — removed and humanity a real present possibility & not a mere hopeful phrase

38-2-155

(1)

THE LAST WORD IN CASTE.

by W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

It is now nearly a ~~full~~ quarter of a century since the South presented to the Nation a new and plausible method of settling the Negro problem. The arguments ~~are~~ is familiar to ~~you~~ all. "Take the Negro out of politics;" "Train him for work and particularly for farm work." "The result will be the disappearance of the Negro problem." ~~It is unnecessary to say that~~ this prophecy ~~has not~~ was been fulfilled. ~~and it is my purpose to-night to examine with you the results of the policy and the proposals now put forward by its advocates for the future.~~

Disfranchisement has been carried through ruthlessly. In Louisiana for instance, less than one per cent of the colored men twenty-one years of age are registered, although over half of the Negro population in that State can read and write. This situation is typical for most of the gulf states. In the ~~lower~~ border states a larger number vote but still the great majority of adult male Negroes in the South are disfranchised. It was promised, ~~however,~~ that in return for such disfranchisement the Negro was to have educational and economic rights. ~~In a previous Conference of this Association I have tried to show how distressingly the South has failed to carry out this promise in education.~~

(2)

The last study of "The Negro Common School" made by Atlanta University sums up the Negro Educational situation by saying:

1. That the overwhelming majority of Negro children of school age are not in school.

2. That the chief reason for this is the lack of school facilities; and a further reason is the poverty and ignorance of parents.

3. That those Negro children who are in school are as a rule poorly taught by half-prepared and poorly paid teachers and through short terms of three to six months a year.

4. That the school houses and equipment for Negro schools are for the most part wretched and inadequate.

5. That the Negro schools as a rule receive little or no helpful superintendence from the school authorities.

6. That the result and apparently one of the objects of disfranchisement has been to cut down the Negro school fund, bar out competent teachers, lower the grade and efficiency of the course of study and employ as teachers in the Negro schools those willing tools who do not and will not protest or complain.

7. That in the attempt to introduce much needed and valuable manual and industrial training there has been introduced into the curriculum of the Negro common school a mass of ill-considered, unrelated work which has overburdened the teacher and pushed into the background the vital studies of reading, writing and arithmetic. In a large measure this has been done with the avowed object of training Negroes as menials and laborers and of cutting them off from the higher avenues of life.

8. That the forward movement in education in the South during the last ten years has been openly confined almost entirely to white people. The movement for local school taxes, better high schools, consolidation of schools and transportation of children has with small exception been encouraged and made possible among the whites and not among the Negroes. In many cases the Negroes have been taxed for the improvement of white school fscilities, while their own schools have not been allowed to share in these improvements.

9. That along with this curtailment of elementary public education for Negroes has gone a tendency to decry the work of those schools which are devoted to the higher training of the Negro youth, to lower their curricula, to cut off northern benevolence and to decrease the supply of intellectual leaders for the Negro race.

Even ~~But~~ with these patent facts staring the Nation in the face most people have come to the idea that at least the economic rights of the Negro are secure and many have been willing to say not only, "Give up the ballot," but also, "give up educational ideals so long as the race learns to work efficiently and accumulate property, particularly as farmers." Let us now ask what has been results here? So ~~long~~ far as work is concerned we again find the barriers up and not tending to fall. The attempt to establish a strict caste of occupations in the South has not been successful but it has been possible to keep the majority of Negroes in the most disagreeable and poorest paid occupations and in the lowest positions in most occupations. The Negro has pushed his way into some skilled occupations but it has been a long and tedious fight. It is therefor wrong to assume that economic opportunity has been opened to the Negro ~~and in~~ with any great degree of freedom. But this is true: The South has been advancing in wealth at a phenominal rate during the last two or three decades. It has been impossible, particularly in cities, to with-hold some of the economic advantages of this great advance from the colored workers. The result has been a great increase of property-holding among Negroes in cities and towns.

In Virginia the town and city property of colored people increased from an assessed value of four millions in 1899 to nine and one half millions in 1911.

Unfortunately there are no complete figures to illustrate this as a whole but a few facts and localities throw some light upon it. The property of the Negro church situated chiefly in Negro cities increased 115% between 1890 and 1906. The town and city property of the Negroes of Georgia increased nearly 100% between 1890 and 1907. There is reason to believe that throughout the United States the increase of Negro city property has been very large in the last ten years. The chief reason for this conclusion ~~number~~ is

unfortunately

the increase of the city segregation movement. In other words, just as soon as the Negro city laborer working on a wage scale lower than that of any other single group of people, saved out of his meagre earnings enough to move out of the alleys and slums to the front streets there immediately arose the question as to who should bear the economic cost of race prejudice. Most people in their careless indulgence in race prejudice forget this economic cost. It shows itself in the social cost of crime, prostitution and slums and it shows itself in the fall of values when a socially despised group moves into a decent neighborhood. That such a movement results in a real financial loss no one denies or attempts to deny. But the question is who shall bear the loss?

The segregation movement as illustrated in Baltimore, ~~Greenville~~, ~~South Carolina~~ and many other Southern cities and as advocated in St. Louis answers this problem plainly. It proposes to put the whole cost of this economic loss absolutely upon the Negroes. That this is unjust goes without saying. They, of all parties, are the ones who should be exempt from any loss. But even here, it has not been altogether easy to gain the sympathy of right-minded Americans. They have said, "It is largely a social matter," and "let the Negroes develope their own settlements," forgetting the absolute injustice and preposterous demand which such an attitude makes. A further argument is, however, "let the Negro stop crowding into the cities. Here they have in the country and in the South a wonderful chance for development. They can get hold of land, they know how to raise a great staple crop and many auxiliary crops. Here is an open economic field, let them take advantage of it."

It must not be thought that the Negroes themselves or their friends have been unaware of the ecomomic chance of the Negro in Southern agriculture, but they have been trying to say ~~after these years of educa-~~

~~tional deference~~ even in the Country that the economic man of to-day must be backed by social and political rights else the fruit of his labor is not safe.

I doubt if in modern economic history the truth of this proposition has been more clearly proven ~~and~~ than in the recent history of the Negro race in America. Here is a people which has been asked to give up ~~their~~ its political and social rights in order to achieve economic freedom. Despite the protest of a few far seeing men among them the race has virtually done this. They have let themselves be deprived of the vote almost without a struggle and they have openly and slavishly acknowledged that they are not fit associates for their fellow men, and they have hoped by reason of this craven surrender to earn a living, accumulate property and achieve ~~through education~~ finally the recognition of their fellow men. The result has been ~~as I have tried to show~~ that their educational opportunities have been curtailed rather than expanded.

Their right to work has been admitted but slowly and grudgingly ~~under~~ among all but the lowest and worst-paid occupations. And their right to accumulate property in cities is threatened to-day with serious ~~contamer~~ encumbrement. With this astonishing record as an answer to the program of twenty years ago what is the present situation of the Negro with regard to agricultural land in the South? Here indeed, we reach the last boundaries in the question. Let us bring to mind once more what has been said and promised in the past.

The movement fathered by men like the late Morris K. Jesup and Robert Ogden stated to the world and ~~told~~ paid with conviction, "You have here ten million inferior folk. You have got to stop treating them like ordinary white humanity and treat them as Negroes. You must educate them for work and particularly for farm labor and when you do that you will find the white South meeting you more than half way and willing to agree to accord the Negroes every economic right which they deserve. Not only did the overwhelming public opinion of the North believe and acknowledge this policy but ~~the~~ many colored people acquiesed it with enthusiasm. Consequently the movement toward farm life among Negroes in the last decade has been phenominal. While farms conducted by white farmers have increased nine and one half per cent between 1900 and 1910 farms conducted by colored farmers have increased nearly twenty per cent. There were seven and one half per cent more white farmers conducting their farms in 1910 than in 1900 but there were seventeen percent more colored owners conducting their farms. The land in Negro farms increased from forty-two to forty-seven million acres in that time and the land in the hands of Negro farm owners from sixteen to nineteen million acres. To-day twenty-nine per cent of the farms in the South are conducted by colored men not counting the vast number of farms conducted by white men with colored labor. This would seem to be most encouraging and especially so when we remember under what difficulties it has been accomplished. The thought in the back of the heads of many people who urged the Negro to the Southern farms was not the Negroes' good but the knowledge that the organization of Southern farm labor was such that under it the Negro could hardly hope for economic freedom.

In the country the disfranchisement of the Negro was completest, in the country the task idea of slavery lasted longest and in the country ~~the~~ new legislation did everything it could to reduce the black farm hand into peonage. To-day in many rural districts of the gulf states the refusal of a colored man to work for a white man on any terms which the white man wishes to make, can ~~could~~ without ~~absolute ease~~ great difficulty be made a penetentiary offence and the colored man ~~made a slave~~ sent as a slave of the State to work in chains for a large part of his natural life.

Despite this worst condition there were chances here and there for the Negro to buy land and receive some social protection. This he has

12 A

The revolt of the black laborer however made this programme impossible. He could not strike for higher wages but he could run away & town and he did in such numbers that labor scarcity was the cry of the plantations and hard contract and vagrancy laws were passed. The most effective bait however to keep the laborer was to sell him land on installments. In nine cases and of ten he was unable to keep his contract and remained a laborer. But in the tenth case he got his land. Sometimes he was helped by the better class land lords, by his relatives in the north, by ~~[illegible]~~ the breaking up of big plantations and in a few cases by philanthropy

12 B

In the main ways

It was sometimes impossible to keep the Negro from the land. Some landlords in the black belt were willing to sell to black men and some had to on account of pressure from Black labor revolted when it could and escaped to Town, while some intelligent Town Negroes bought farms done and the value of the farm property owned by Negroes between 1900 and 1910 increased from one hundred and eighty million dollars to four hundred and forty million dollars or one hundred and forty-five per cent. During this same time the farm property of whites throughout the country increased but ninety-three per cent and the farm property of Southern whites increased one hundred and eight per cent. This increase in value is shown in the land which went from one hundred and two to two hundred and seventy-seven millions or one hundred and seventy-two per cent; in the buildings which went from twenty-nine to sixty-nine millions or one hundred and forty-two per cent; in implements and machinery which went from eight to sixteen millions or ninety per cent and in live stock which increased ninety-two percent or from forty-one to seventy-eight millions.

Negro land ownership has increased from about three million acres in 1875 to six million acres in 1880, to eight million acres in 1890, 15 mill in 1900 - 20 m 1910

fifteen twelve million in 1900 and nearly twenty million in 1910.

This is most gratifying and if the prophets of the past were correct we would expect to hear a chorus of congratulation and good will from the best friends of the Negro in the South. We would expect an argument something like this: "You see we have kept our word in the main issue. We have disfranchised the Negro and while we have not given him large educational opportunity and have kept him in his place in the industrial world nevertheless he has become a house holder in the cities (although there we must limit him) and especially he has become fifty years after Emancipation a land holder in the United States by his own unaided efforts. This shows the wisdom of our policy."

When, however, we come forward prepared to hear this argument and to answer its weak places, for it has weak places, we find on the part of the dominant South not only absence of all enthusiasm for this increase of Negro agricultural well being but a distinct air of disappointment and something worse. Indeed this air of disappointment is so wide-spread that one cannot help wondering if the Negro has not been urged to take advantage of Southern agriculture just because some Southerners were convinced that he could not take such advantage and that in the country districts of the South he could be held in his place, politically, socially and economically.

It would be unfair to assume this without undoubted proof and such proof comes to us unfortunately from North Carolina. In order to understand that development in North Carolina let us just look at some significant figures.

Farms owned by Negroes in North Carolina have increased in the decade from seventeen thousand to twenty-one thousand and the land from nine hundred and sixty-five thousand acres to twelve hundred thousand acres; not only has there been this numberical increase, but while all farm property in North Carolina increased one hundred and thirty per cent Negro farm property increased two hundred and eleven per cent or from nine million dollars to twenty-seven million dollars; and the value of the land alone increased from five to seventeen million or two hundred and twenty per cent.

Has this caused any rejoicing in North Carolina? I regret to say it has not. On the contrary it has led to wide-spread proposal for the most ~~certain~~ vital attack upon the economic rights of the Negro ever put forward in the United States. Let no one misconceive the significance of this. The Negro was asked to give up his political rights for the sake of ? advance. He finds that with the giving up of his political rights his educational rights are curtailed, the right to work is increased but inadequately, his right to hold property in cities is being questioned and now, finally, there is a movement in the South to curtail his right to own agricultural land. This movement has not started with an ignorant agitator of the Blease and Vardaman and Tillman type. Its sponser is

Clarence Poe, editor of the "Progressive Farmer" and a man representing in many ways the best traditions of the South.

Mr. Poe began his campaign last summer in the "Progressive Farmer" a weekly paper with a wide circulation among the most intelligent farmers all over the South. As a result of this campaign week after week, a growing mass of white farmers are crying with one of Poe's correspondents!

"North Carolina and the South for the white race, should be the slogan from now henceforth."

Or as another says: "Mr. Clarence Poe's suggestions that the Negroes buy land adjoining and settle in communities to themselves is a good one and will do more than anything else to adjust the race relations between the whites and blacks of the South. It is the 'Jim Crow' law put into effect in the rural districts."

Mr. Poe suggested that the Negro should be separated from the whites in the country districts by a law prohibiting future sale of land to him in white communities. His suggestion took immediate root and a third correspondent writes: "Negro children are not allowed to attend school with whites, Negroes do not sit on the same cars, loaf in the same depots, and feed at the same hotels as the white folks. Why, then, should landlords be allowed to impose them on white farmers and ruin entire sections of the country?"

Mr. Poe then began to carefully fortify and elaborate his original proposition.

"Everybody knows that the Negroes stand together. They are notoriously clannish in everything. They help one another even to the extent of shielding Negro criminals from the law.

"But while the Negroes have been pulling together in this way, what has been the attitude of our white people in the vital matter of saving the rural South to the white race? Everybody knows that the shameful and disgraceful fact is that the white people have not been pulling together, but that the white city land-owner and merchant has too often practically taken sides against the struggling white tenant and small farmer and in favor of the Negro. I once said to a big plantation owner living in Memphis who had lands in Mississippi, "What Mississippi needs is fewer big plantations cultivated by Negro tenants and more thrifty, enterprising, indudtrious white farmers - more white people. Why don't you try to get white tenants?" "I don't want them," he replied, "They won't spend money and run accounts at our stores like the Negroes will, and besides, they soon want to buy land themselves. The Negroes make more money for us."

A friend writes him elaborating this argument: "I believe the great trouble is with a certain class of white land-owners. They have Negro tenants on their lands who are, in fact, really peons. They furnish their tenants everything in the spring at high rates and in the fall take everything at low rates. I have in mind a certain Negro who purchased a mule worth about $90 for $150, and after fifteen years of hard work the mule died without being paid for. In the meantime, the white man got all the Negro made. Such land-owners don't want intelligent white tenants. They want those whom they can use to their advantage. They are the ones who have sold land at exorbitant prices to Negroes, thinking, perhaps, they could not pay for it."

Here is evidently a situation calling for remedy. A modern reformer would suggest the uprooting of peonage and the company store system; co-operative buying of large tracts of land. But this remedy is far from these men's minds and we discover that if the peon escapes and becomes an independent small farmer and land-owner that he is, if anything even more objectionable.

"The Negroes first ran us out because some white people moved to town, became merchants who furnished supplies for the Negro to make their crops, and now have sold their country land to them in farms containing 20,30 and 40 acres, and occasionally 100 acres or more. They sometimes give them a long time for payment, the Negroes seldom getting out of debt until they go to the public works to get out. They settle on these farms, have large families generally, and simply crowd us out, causing us to seek a village or town where white people can co-operate, have schools and churches, and where it is understood that no Negroes own lots mixed with white people."

Poe therefore drops the subject of the wretched underpaid and ruthlessly exploited peonage and addresses himself to this dangerous newcomer.

"Briefly I should say that the law we need is one which will say that wherever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, a majority of the voters in such a district may say (if they wish) that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race - provided such action is approved or allowed (as being justified by considerations of the peace, protection and social life of the community) by a reviewing judge or board of country commissioner."

He goes on to develope his thought: "Atlanta has just passed a law saying that a majority of property-owners in a city block can say that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race from them. Why, then, cannot Georgia or any other State pass a law giving a similiar privilege to its country people? Why can it not be said that where there is a white community and the majority of white land owners wish to keep their community white, they can lay-off a district in which it will be unlawful to sell to a person of a different race? And since the same privilege would be given Negroes where they own land, the law could not be said to discriminate against any race; and the whites would lose little because they do not care to buy in communities wholly surrounded by Negroes, anyhow.

This has a certain semblance of even handed justice; Mr. Poe says: "It may be argued, I know, that such a law is unjust, that with the Government of the South as it is, it could be utilized by white people to keep their communities white but the Negroes would rarely be able to use it to keep their communities wholly Negro. All of which I admit is possible, and yet, as I have said, I believe it is just."

Why would the Negro "rarely be able" to make a wholly Negro community? Because Negroes cannot vote, cannot select county commissioners and consequently could not drive out the whites. Nevertheless Mr. Poe is not moved.

"Studying it with all possible desire for truth and justice, I repeat, therefore, I cannot see that it is right or just to say that because a white majority shall have the right to limit future land sales to their race, a Negro majority must everywhere have exactly the same privilege."

The difficulty is that Mr. Poe has his eye on the landlords of the black belt where a few land barons still drive their slaves with the lash. He wants to reassure them that no matter if the blacks out number them ten to one they are not to be disturbed in their reign.

But Mr. Poe's correspondents are not so canny. One of them says: "It is the gravest problem confronting us of the South to-day - this selling land promiscuously to the Negro race. In my neighborhood the white school population is 12. The Negro school population is 140. Can I be satisfied to raise my children under such conditions? I am trying to sell out. Have been offered $12,000 cash for my farm by a Negro. It is worth $20,000 and would bring it if the surroundings were different."

At this we rub our eyes: if the Negro population out numbers the white ten to one surely this is the place, if any, for the white man to move. But this man does not want to move. What does he want there? Does he want the Negroes to go? No, but he wants them kept down. He does not even want to allow them the advantages of his disadvantages. As one he says: "In protecting their home and social life, it is necessary for our rural white people to use some extraordinary measures to offset the Negroes' advantages in driving them out. In the first place, the Negro can live on less than the white man, and, therefore, if he is doing the same kind of work, he has this economic advantage over the white man."

Mr. Poe now appears in the offing again and serves this new argument. It is Negro cheap labor that has ruined the South. "Why is Southern agriculture so far behind the North?" he asked.

The answer is easy. "The man in the North was driven to do his own work because he did not have scores of Negroes to do it, and this caused him to look around and seek other means with which to do it. And see how he has profited because he has always had to do his own labor, and see the great rut we now find ourselves in because we had plenty of Negroes to do our work, and therefore did not need to seek to improve our farm labor conditions as our Northern neighbor did."

The answer to this would seem obvious; make Negro labor dearer by turning it into an independent farm owning class. But no, Mr. Poe will have none of this, but reports this case:

"I was reared and am now living in a community that only a few years ago was famed for its social features- live, well filled churches and schools. But alas! it is hopelessly ruined. Churches and schools can hardly hold together. There are three non-resident land owners who are responsible for it all. This being a very fertile section, they have bought most of the land and want only Negro tenants. The land is unsurpassed for fertility by any section in several miles radius and therefore has induced the best type of Negroes to cultivate it; but nevertheless they are Negroes and have completely destroyed the social features of the community."

It would seem from this that there is no place on earth for the best Negroes either as tenants or landowners. Their very presence destroys all real life. "We might as well admit," says Mr. Poe, "the argument that the present wholesale sandwiching of whites and Negroes in our rural districts is perhaps the main thing in the way of developing rural co-operation in the South. If we can once get groups of wholly white communities, it will be far easier to get the farmers in them to pull together, whereas at present, the white people in the South are too scattered to win success with ten thousand co-operative enterprises that would succeed if white farmers were grouped together. And especially does the present sandwiching of whites and Negroes militate against education - against good schools for both races."

But if educational justice is not done to the Negro in the white community, will it be anywhere? One Negro correspondent is in despair. He writes: "If we own a good farm or hourse or cow, dog or yoke of oxen, we are harassed until we are bound to sell, give away, or run away before we can have any peace of our lives."

Mr. Poe prints this but with apology and warning.

"We may say in this connection that it was our idea in printing the letters from Negroes simply to show what they are saying and thinking and to give all sides a fair hearing. And if Negroes are bragging that they send their children to school when white people keep theirs away for lack of fine clothes, or because they are shut up in factories, or if they brag that there are white people who can't read and write and they help them, or that white people won't work and the Negroes will, it will be a mighty good thing if we get mad enough about such boasting to see to it that they shall have no excuse even for saying such things in the future.

Mr. Poe therefore repeatedly returns to his original proposal. He has no fear of constitutions.

"It may be that the Atlanta segregation and the similiar segregation plans we have suggested for our country districts might be declared in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment. Some lawyers think so, some do not. But we repeat that if our people make up their minds that segregation is a good and necessary thing, they will find a way to put it into effect; - just as they did in the case of Negro disfranchisement despite an iron-bound Amendment specifically designed to prevent it.

"If such a direct law as we proposed last week would be unconstitutional, might not the same result be effected indirectly by saying that no land should be sold to any man in any specified district if a petition against the sale were signed by a majority of the resident land-owners in such a district? If a predominantly white community then, it could be understood (or formally declared) that this new law would be invoked only to keep the community white, and so the matter would be settled without further trouble."

"It is objected to by some, that the plan does not go far enough. For example, the Knoxville, Tennessee, Sentinel says that, "It seems to have a practical weakness as so far advanced - that it does not take tenants into account.

"Well, there is no doubt but that the indiscriminate renting of land to Negroes by absentee land-owners is a crying evil. The letters we have received from all over the South indicate that mistakably. And yet we do not now see any plan of regulating this evil that would not be susceptible of much abuse. As yet the proportion of white people wanting to rent land is small, and it would not be fair to absolutely limit the renting to white people even in these white communities.

"But it is our confident conviction that if the Negroes should refuse to work where the white people decided upon such a measure of protection, it would only be a form of industrial suicide for them, and after a few months of trouble in working out a new adjustment, the white people would be as well off - or better off - from a labor standpoint than ever before. In the first place, young Southern white men would be willing to go into hese all-white communities and work as laborers, and in the second place, it would not be long until good white labor would come in from other sections."

Here then, is the culmination of this extraordinary argument:

The South says here: we despise the Negro because he is down and yet we cannot allow him to rise, we cannot educate him lest he grow intelligent, we cannot allow him in industry lest he compete with us and save money; we cannot allow him to buy property because he will be independent and live beside us; we cannot let him live by himself because we want his labor and because we dare not give him political power enough to establish and protect his own segregated communities.

The South is not wholly to blame for this logic. The North shares that blame.

The high and only tenable ground of the past was educate the Negro, give him work and wages, give him civil rights, give him a vote and let him make his way as a freeman.

This ground the North has joined the South in undermining::

I have received hundreds and hundreds of letters, representing fifteen States, endorsing the plan of race segregation I advocated on this page, August 30th. A few of the many letters are printed herewith, others will come later; and I wish every other Progressive Farmer reader interested would write me. Write me anyhow, and if you do not want your letters published, say so. What must be done about the non-resident land-owner who will rent land only to Negroes?

The law I advocated August 30, it will be remembered was just this:

"Whenever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, the majority of the voters in such a district may say, if they wish, that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race; provided such th[illegible]ion is approved or allowed (as being justified by considerations of [illegible]e peace, protection and social life of the community) by a reviewing judge or board of county commissioners."

"Such a board as I have said, could be used by any white community to keep itself white, but the Negro would almost never be able to use it to make a community wholly Negro. If you are in favor of such a plan and want to know more about it, send me a postal card or letter at once."

Clarence Poe.

NORTH CAROLINA.

COLORED FARMERS	1900	1910
Value of farm property, colored farmers	$28,986,165	$81,424,800
" " " oc colored owners	8,828,581	27,448,410
" " land owned, colored owners	5,351,290	17,063,588

W.E.B. Du B.

THE LAST WORD IN CASTE.

It is now nearly a full quarter of a century since the South presented to the Nation a new and plausible method of settling the Negro problem. The arguments are familiar to you all. "Take the Negro out of politics," "train him for work and particularly for farm work." "The result will be the disappearance of the Negro problem." It is unnecessary to say that this prophecy has not been fulfilled and it is my purpose tonight to examine with you the results of the policy and the proposals now put forward by its advocates for the future.

Disfranchisement has been carried through ruthlessly. In Louisiana for instance, less than one per cent of the colored men twenty-one years of age are registered although over half of the Negro population in that State can read and write. This situation is typical for most of the gulf states. In the lower border states a larger number vote but still the great majority are disfranchised. It was promised, however, that in return for such disfranchisement the Negro was to have educational and economic rights. In a previous Conference of this Association I have tried to show how distressingly the South has failed to carry out this promise in education.

The last study of "The Negro Common School" made by Atlanta University sums up the situation by saying:

1. That the overwhelming majority of Negro children of school age are not in school.

2. That the chief reason for this is the lack of school facilities; and a further reason is the poverty and ignorance of parents.

3. That those Negro children who are in school are as a rule poorly taught by half-prepared and poorly paid teachers and through short terms of three to six months a year.

4. That the school houses and equipment for Negro schools are for the most part wretched and inadequate.

5. That the Negro schools as a rule receive little or no helpful superintendence from the school authorities.

6. That the result and apparently one of the objects of disfranchisement has been to cut down the Negro school fund, bar out competent teachers, lower the grade and efficiency of the course of study and employ as teachers in the Negro schools those willing tools who do not and will not protest or complain.

7. That in the attempt to introduce much needed and valuable manual and industrial training there has been introduced into the curriculum of the Negro common school a mass of ill-considered, unrelated work which has overburdened the teacher and pushed into the background the vital studies of reading, writing and arithmetic. In a large measure this has been done with the avowed object of training Negroes as menials and laborers and of cutting them off from the higher avenues of life.

8. That the forward movement in education in the South during the last ten years has been openly confined almost entirely to white people. The movement for local school taxes, better high schools, consolidation of schools and transportation of children has with small exception been encouraged and made possible among the whites and not among the Negroes. In many cases the Negroes have been taxed for the improvement of white school facilities, while their own schools have not been allowed to share in these improvements.

9. That along with this curtailment of elementary public education for Negroes has gone a tendency to decry the work of those schools which are devoted to the higher training of the Negro youth, to lower their curricula, to cut off northern benevolence and to decrease the supply of intellectual leaders for the Negro rade.

But with these patent facts staring the Nation in the face most people have comeeto the idea that at least the economic rights of the Negro are secure and many have been willing to say not only, "Give up the ballot," but also, "give up educational ideals so long as the race learns to work efficiently and accumulate property particularly as farmers." Let us now ask what has been results here? So far as work is concerned we again find the barriers up and tending to rise. The attempt to establish a strict caste of occupations in the South has not been successful but it has been possible to keep the majority of Negroes in the most disagreeable and poorest paid occupations and in the lowest positions in most occupations. The Negro has pushed his way into some skilled occupations but it has been a long and tedious fight. It is therefor wrong to assume that economic opportunity has been open to the Negro with any great degree of freedom. But this is true. The South has been advancing in wealth at a phenominal rate during the last two or three decades. It has been impossible, particularly in cities, to with-hold some of the economic advantages of this great advance from the colored workers. The result has been a great increase of property-holding among Negroes in cities and towns.

In Virginia the town and city property of colored people increased from an assessed value of four millions in 1899 to nine and one half millions in 1911.

Unfortunately there are no figures to illustrate this as a whole but a few facts and localities throw some light upon it. The property of the Negro church situated chiefly in Negro cities increased 115% between 1890 and 1906. The town and city property of the Negroes of Georgia increased nearly 100% between 1890 and 1907. There is reason to believe that throughout the United States the increase of Negro city property has been very large in the last ten years. The chief reason for this conclusion is

unfortunately
the increase of the city segregation movement. In other words, just as soon as the Negro city laborer working on a wage scale lower than that of any other single group of people, save out of his earnings enough to move out of the alleys and slums to the front streets there immediately arose the question as to who should bear the economic cost of race prejudice. Most people in their careless indulgence in race prejudice forget this economic cost. It shows itself in the social cost of crime, prostitution and slums and it shows itself in the fall of values when a socially despised group moves into a decent neighborhood. That such a movement results in a real financial loss no one denies or attempts to deny. But the question is who shall bear the loss?

The segregation movement as illustrated in Baltimore, Greenville, South Carolina and many other Southern cities and as advocated in St. Louis answers this problem plainly. It proposes to put the whole cost of this economic loss absolutely upon the Negroes. That this is unjust goes without saying. They, of all parties, are the ones who should be exempt from any loss. But even here, it has not been altogether easy to gain the sympathy of right-minded Americans. They have said, "It is largely a social matter," and "let the Negroes develope their own settlements," forgetting the absolute injustice and preposterous demand which such an attitude makes. A further argument is, however, "let the Negro stop crowding into the cities. Here they have in the country and in the South a wonderful chance for development. They can get hold of land, they know how to raise a great staple crop and many auxiliary crops. Here is an open economic field, let them take advantage of it."

It must not be thought that the Negroes themselves or their friends have been unaware of the ecomomic chance of the Negro in Southern agriculture, but they have been trying to say ~~after these years of educa-~~

~~tional defence~~ that the economic man of to-day must be backed by social and political rights else the fruit of his labor is not safe.

I doubt if in modern economic history the truth of this proposition has been more clearly proven than ~~and~~ in the recent history of the Negro race in America. Here is a people which has been asked to give up ~~their~~ its political and social rights in order to achieve economic freedom. Despite the protest of a few far seeing men among them the race has virtually done this. They have let themselves be deprived of the vote almost without a struggle and they have openly and slavishly acknowledged that they are not fit associates for their fellow men and they have hoped by reason of this craven surrender to earn a living, accumulate property and achieve ~~through education~~ finally the recognition of their fellow men. The result has been as I have tried to show that their educational opportunities have been curtailed rather than expanded.

Their right to work has been admitted but slowly and grudgingly ~~under~~ among all but the lowest and worst-paid occupations. And their right to accumulate property in cities is threatened to-day with serious ~~contemor~~ curtailment. With this astonishing record as an answer to the program of twenty years ago what is the present situation of the Negro with regard to agricultural land in the South? Here indeed, we reach the last boundaries in the question. Let us bring to mind once more what has been said and promised in the past.

The movement fathered by men like the late Morris K. Jessup and Robert Ogden stated to the world, ~~and told~~ and with conviction, "You have here ten million inferior folk. You have got to stop treating them like ordinary white humanity and treat them as Negroes. You must educate them for work and particularly for farm labor and when you do that you will find the white South meeting you more than half way and willing to agree to accord the Negroes every economic right which they deserve. Not only did the overwhelming public opinion of the North believe and acknowledge this policy but ~~the~~ many colored people acquiesed it with enthusiasm.

The movement toward farm life among Negroes in the last decade has been phenominal. While farms conducted by white farmers have increased nine and one half per cent between 1900 and 1910 farms conducted by colored farmers have increased nearly twenty per cent. There were seven and one half per cent more white farmers conducting their farms in 1910 than in 1900 but there were seventeen percent more colored owners conducting their farms. The land in Negro farms increased from forty-two to forty-seven million acres in that time and the land in the hands of Negro farm owners from sixteen to nineteen million acres. To-day twenty-nine per cent of the farms in the South are conducted by colored men not counting the vast number of farms conducted by white men with colored labor. This would seem to be most encouraging and especially so when we remember under what difficulties it has been accomplished. The thought in the back of the heads of many people who urge the Negro to the Southern farms was not the Negroes' good but the knowledge that the organization of Southern farm labor was such that under it the Negro could hardly hope for economic freedom.

In the country the disfranchisement of the Negro was completest, in the country the task idea of slavery lasted longest and in the country the new legislation did everything it could to reduce the black farm land into peonage. To-day in the gulf states the refusal of a colored man to work for a white man on any terms which the white man wishes to make ~~could~~ can with great difficulty ~~absolute ease~~ be made a penetentiary offence and the colored man made a slave of the State to work in chains for a large part of his natural life.

Despite this worst condition there were chances here and there for the Negro to buy land and receive some social protection. This he has done and the value of the farm property owned by Negroes between 1900 and 1910 increased from one hundred and eighty million dollars to four hundred and forty million dollars or one hundred and forty-five per cent. During this same time the farm property of whites throughout the country increased but ninety-three per cent and the farm property of Southern whites increased one hundred and eight per cent. This increase in value is shown in the land which went from one hundred and two to two hundred and seventy-seven millions or one hundred and seventy-two per cent; in the buildings which went from twenty-nine to sixty-nine millions or one hundred and forty-two per cent; in implements and machinery which went from eight to sixteen millions or ninety per cent and in live stock which increased ninety-two percent or from forty-one to seventy-eight millions.

Negro land ownership has increased from about three million acres in 1875 to six million acres in 1880, to eight million acres in 1890, twelve million in 1900 and nearly twenty million in 1910.

This is most gratifying and if the prophets of the past were correct we would expect to hear a chorus of congratulation and good will from the best friends of the Negro in the South. We would expect an argument something like this: "You see we have kept our word in the main issue. We have disfranchised the Negro and while we have not given him large educational opportunity and have kept him in his place in the industrial world nevertheless he has become a house holder in the cities, although there we must limit him, and especially he has become fifty years after Emancipation a land holder in the United States by his own unaided efforts. This shows the wisdom of our policy."

When, however, we come forward prepared to hear this argument and to answer its weak places, for it has weak places, we find on the part of the dominant South not only absence of all enthusiasm for this increase of Negro agricultural well being but a distinct air of disappointment and something worse. Indeed this air of disappointment is so wide-spread that one cannot help wondering if the Negro has not been urged to take advantage of Southern agriculture just because some Southerners were convinced that he could not take such advantage and that in the country districts of the South he could be held in his place, politically, socially and economically.

It would be unfair to assume this without undoubted proof and such proof comes to us unfortunately from North Carolina. In order to understand that development in North Carolina let us just look at some significant figures.

Farms owned by Negroes in North Carolina have increased in the decade from seventeen thousand to twenty-one thousand and the land from nine hundred and sixty-five thousand acres to twelve hundred thousand acres but not only has there been this numberical increase, but while all farm property in North Carolina increased one hundred and thirty per cent Negro farm property increased two hundred and eleven per cent or from nine million dollars to twenty-seven million dollars; and the value of the land alone increased from five to seventeen million or two hundred and twenty per cent.

Has this caused any rejoicing in North Carolina? I regret to say it has not. On the contrary it has led to wide-spread proposal for the most vital certain attack upon the economic rights of the Negro ever put forward in the United States. Let no one misconceive the significance of this. The Negro was asked to give up his political rights for the sake of ? advance. He finds that with the giving up of his political rights his educational rights are curtailed, the right to work is increased but inadequately, his right to hold property in cities is being questioned and now, finally, there is a movement in the South to curtail his right to own agricultural land. This movement has not started with an ignorant agitator of the Blease and Vardaman and Tillman type. Its sponser is

Clarence Poe, editor of the "Progressive Farmer" and a man representing in many ways the best traditions of the South.

Mr. Poe began his campaign last summer in the "Progressive Farmer" a weekly paper with a wide circulation among the most intelligent farmers all over the South. As a result of this campaign week after week, a growing mass of white farmers are crying with one of Poe's correspondents!

"North Carolina and the South for the white race," should be the slogan from now henceforth."

Or as another says: "Mr. Clarence Poe's suggestions that the Negroes buy land adjoining and settle in communities to themselves is a good one and will do more than anything else to adjust the race relations between the whites and blacks of the South. It is the 'Jim Crow' law put into effect in the rural districts."

Mr. Poe suggested that the Negro should be separated from the whites in the country districts by a law prohibiting future sale of land to him in white communities. His suggestion took immediate root and a third correspondent writes: "Negro children are not allowed to attend school with whites, Negroes do not sit on the same cars, loaf in the same depots, and feed at the same hotels as the white folks. Why, then, should landlords be allowed to impose them on white farmers and ruin entire sections of the country?"

Mr. Poe then began to carefully fortify and elaborate his original proposition.

"Everybody knows that the Negroes stand together. They are notoriously clannish in everything. They help one another even to the extent of shielding Negro criminals from the law.

"But while the Negroes have been pulling together in this way, what has been the attitude of our white people in the vital matter of saving the rural South to the white race? Everybody knows that the shameful and disgraceful fact is that the white people have not been pulling together, but that the white city land-owner and merchant has too often practically taken sides against the struggling white tenant and small farmer and in favor of the Negro. I once said to a big plantation owner living in Memphis who had lands in Mississippi, "What Mississippi needs is fewer big plantations cultivated by Negro tenants and more thrifty, enterprising, indudtrious white farmers - more white people. Why don't you try to get white tenants?" "I don't want them," he replied, "They won't spend money and run accounts at our stores like the Negroes will, and besides, they soon want to buy land themselves. The Negroes make more money for us."

A friend writes him elaborating this argument: "I believe the great trouble is with a certain class of white land-owners. They have Negro tenants on their lands who are, in fact, really peons. They furnish their tenants everything in the spring at high rates and in the fall take everything at low rates. I have in mind a certain Negro who purchased a mule worth about $90 for $150, and after fifteen years of hard work the mule died without being paid for. In the meantime, the white man got all the Negro made. Such land-owners don't want intelligent white tenants. They want those whom they can use to their advantage. They are the ones who have sold land at exorbitant prices to Negroes, thinking, perhaps, they could not pay for it."

Here is evidently a situation calling for remedy. A modern reformer would suggest the uprooting of peonage and the company store system; co-operative buying of large tracts of land. But this remedy is far from these men's minds and we discover that if the peon escapes and becomes an independent small farmer and land-owner that he is, if anything even more objectionable.

"The Negroes first ran us out because some white people moved to town, became merchants who furnished supplies for the Negro to make their crops, and now have sold their country land to them in farms containing 20,30 and 40 acres, and occasionally 100 acres or more. They sometimes give them a long time for payment, the Negroes seldom getting out of debt until they go to the public works to get out. They settle on these farms, have large families generally, and simply crowd us out, causing us to seek a village or town where white people can co-operate, have schools and churches, and where it is understood that no Negroes own lots mixed with white people."

Poe therefore drops the subject of the wretched underpaid and ruthlessly exploited peonage and addresses himself to this dangerous newcomer.

"Briefly I should say that the law we need is one which will say that wherever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, a majority of the voters in such a district may say (if they wish) that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race - provided such action is approved or allowed (as being justified by considerations of the peace, protection and social life of the community) by a reviewing judge or board of country commissioner."

He goes on to develope his thought: "Atlanta has just passed a law saying that a majority of property-owners on a city block can say that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race from them. Why, then, cannot Georgia or any other State pass a law giving a similiar privilege to its country people? Why can it not be said that where there is a white community and the majority of white land owners wish to keep their community white, they can lay-off a district in which it will be unlawful to sell to a person of a different race? And since the same privilege would be given Negroes where they own land, the law could not be said to discriminate against any race; and the whites would lose little because they do not care to buy in communities wholly surrounded by Negroes, anyhow.

This has a certain semblance of even handed justice, Mr. Poe says: "It may be argued, I know, that such a law is unjust, that with the Government of the South as it is, it could be utilized by white people to keep their communities white but the Negroes would rarely be able to use it to keep their communities wholly Negro. All of which I admit is possible, and yet, as I have said, I believe it is just."

Why would the Negro "rarely be able" to make a wholly Negro community? Because Negroes cannot vote, cannot select county commissioners and consequently could not drive out the whites. Nevertheless Mr. Poe is not moved.

Studying it with all possible desire for truth and justice, I repeat, therefore, I cannot see that it is right or just to say that because a white majority shall have the right to limit future land sales to their race, a Negro majority must everywhere have exactly the same privilege."

The difficulty is that Mr. Poe has his eye on the landlords of the black belt where a few land barons still drive their slaves with the lash. He wants to reassure them that no matter if the blacks out number them ten to one they are not to be disturbed in their reign.

But Mr. Poe's correspondents are not so canny. One of them says: "It is the gravest problem confronting us of the South to-day - this selling land promiscuously to the Negro race. In my neighborhood the white school population is 12. The Negro school population is 140. Can I be satisfied to raise my children under such conditions? I am trying to sell out. Have been offered $12,000 cash for my farm by a Negro. It is worth $20,00 and would bring it if the surroundings were different."

At this we rub our eyes: if the Negro population out numbers the white ten to one surely this is the place, if any, for the white man to move. But this man does not want to move. What does he want there? Does he want the Negroes to go? No, but he wants them kept down. He does not even want to allow them the advantages of his disadvantages. As he says: "In protecting their home and social life, it is necessary for our rural white people to use some extraordinary measures to offset the Negroes' advantages in driving them out. In the first place, the Negro can live on less than the white man, and, therefore, if he is doing the same kind of work, he has this economic advantage over the white man."

Mr. Poe now appears in the offing again and serves this new argument. It is Negro cheap labor that has ruined the South. "Why is Southern agriculture so far behind the North?" he asked.

The answer is easy. "The man in the North was driven to do his own work because he did not have scores of Negroes to do it, and this caused him to look around and seek other means with which to do it. And see how he has profited because he has always had to do his own labor, and see the great rut we now find ourselves in because we had plenty of Negroes to do our work, and therefore did not need to seek to improve our farm labor conditions as our Northern neighbor did."

The answer to this would seem obvious; make Negro labor dearer by turning it into an independent farm owning class. But no, Mr. Poe will have none of this, but reports this case:

"I was reared and am now living in a community that only a few years ago was famed for its social features- live, well filled churches and schools. But alas! it is hopelessly ruined. Churches and schools can hardly hold together. There are three non-resident land owners who are responsible for it all. This being a very fertile section, they have bought most of the land and want only Negro tenants. The land is unsurpassed for fertility by any section in several miles radius and therefore has induced the best type of Negroes to cultivate it; but nevertheless they are Negroes and have completely destroyed the social features of the community."

It would seem from this that there is no place on earth for the best Negroes either as tenants or landowners. Their very presence destroys all real life. "We might as well admit," says Mr. Poe, "the argument that the present wholesale sandwiching of whites and Negroes in our rural districts is perhaps the main thing in the way of developing rural co-operation in the South. If we can once get groups of wholly white communities, it will be far easier to get the farmers in them to pull together, whereas at present, the white people in the South are too scattered to win success with ten thousand co-operative enterprises that would succeed if white farmers were grouped together. And especially does the present sandwiching of whites and Negroes militate against education - against good schools for both races."

But if educational justice is not done to the Negro in the white community, will it be anywhere? One Negro correspondent is in despair. He writes: "If we own a good farm or hourse or cow, dog or yoke of oxen, we are harassed until we are bound to sell, give away, or run away before we can have any peace of our lives."

Mr. Poe prints this but with apoligy and warning.

"We may say in this connection that it was our idea in printing the letters from Negroes simply to show what they are saying and thinking and to give all sides a fair hearing. And if Negroes are bragging that they send their children to school when white people keep theirs away for lack of fine clothes, or because they are shut up in factories, or if they brag that there are white people who can't read and write and they help them, or that white people won't work and the Negroes will, it will be a mighty good thing if we get mad enough about such boasting to see to it that they shall have no excuse even for saying such things in the future.

Mr. Poe therefore repeatedly returns to his original proposal. He has no fear of constitutions.

"It may be that the Atlanta segregation and the similiar segregation plans we have suggested for our country districts might be declared in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment. Some lawyers think so, some do not. But we repeat that if our people make up their minds that segregation is a good and necessary thing, they will find a way to put it into effect; - just as they did in the case of Negro disfranchisement despite an iron-bound Amendment specifically designed to prevent it.

"If such a direct law as we proposed last week would be unconstitutional, might not the same result be effected indirectly by saying that no land should be sold to any man in any specified district if a petition against the sale were signed by a majority of the resident land-owners in such a district? If a predominantly white community then, it could be understood (or formally declared) that this new law would be invoked only to keep the community white, and so the matter would be settled without further trouble."

"It is objected to by some, that the plan does not go far enough. For example, the Knoxville, Tennessee, Sentinel says that, "It seems to have a practical weakness as so far advanced - that it does not take tenants into account.

"Well, there is no doubt but that the indiscriminate renting of land to Negroes by absentee land-owners is a crying evil. The letters we have received from all over the South indicate that mistakably. And yet we do not now see any plan of regulating this evil that would not be susceptible of much abuse. As yet the proportion of white people wanting to rent land is small, and it would not be fair to absolutely limit the renting to white people even in these white communities.

"But it is our confident conviction that if the Negroes should refuse to work where the white people decided upon such a measure of protection, it would only be a form of industrial suicide for them, and after a few months of trouble in working out a new adjustment, the white people would be as well off - or better off - from a labor standpoint than ever before. In the first place, young Southern white men would be willing to go into these all-white communities and work as laborers, and in the second place, it would not be long until good white labor would come in from other sections."

Here then, is the culmination of this extraordinary argument:

The South says here: we despise the Negro because he is down and yet we cannot allow him to rise, we cannot educate him lest he grow intelligent, we cannot allow him in industry lest he compete with us and save money, we cannot allow him to buy property because he will be independent and live beside us, we cannot let him live by himself because we want his labor and because we dare not give him political power enough to establish and protect his own segregated communities.

The South is not wholly to blame for this logic. The North shares that blame.

The high and only tenable ground of the past was educate the Negro, give him work and wages, give him civil rights, give him a vote and let him make his way as a freeman.

This ground the North has joined the South in undermining::

To be returned

To Malcolm Davis

Esq. P.S.

they have half ruined his schools, they have curtailed his work and lowered his wages, they have made him a legal pariah and social out-caste and now they are cooly proposing to steal the bits of property which by the sweat of his face he has saved.

For stealing it is: for everybody knows that segregation is confiscating. Have we not the shameful treatment of the Indian to prove this?

How fine a program of solving the race problem this is which after twenty-five years of trumpeting and advertising lands us right in the same black slough of despond out of which we are just starting to raise the robbed and raped Indian. Fine statesmanship for the 20th century - fine cowardice for the Land of the Free.

If ever the cause of human liberty needed help that need is here and now this race with its shackled hands and bruised and insulted body is the people whose wrongs speak loudest for Justice.

THE LAST WORD IN CASTE

. . . by W. E. Burghardt Du Bois . . .

It is now nearly a quarter of a century since the South presented to the Nation a new and plausible method of settling the Negro problem. The argument is familiar to all. "Take the Negro out of politics." "Train him for work and particularly for farm work." "The result will be the disappearance of the Negro problem." Has this prophecy been fulfilled?

Disfranchisement has been carried through ruthlessly. In Louisiana for instance, less than one percent of the colored men twenty-one years of age are registered, although over half of the Negro population in that State can read and write. This situation is typical for most of the gulf states. In the border states a larger number vote but still the great majority of adult male Negroes are disfranchised in the south.

It was promised that in return for such disfranchisement the Negro was to have educational and economic rights.

The last study of "The Negro Common School" made by Atlanta University sums up the Negro Educational situation by saying:

1. That the overwhelming majority of Negro children of school age are not in school.
2. That the chief reason for this is the lack of school facilities; and a further reason is the poverty and ignorance of parents.
3. That those Negro children who are in school are as a rule poorly taught by half-prepared and poorly paid teachers and through short terms of three to six months a year.

4. That the school houses and equipment for Negro schools are for the most part wretched and inadequate.

5. That the Negro schools as a rule receive little or no helpful superintendence from the school authorities.

6. That the result and apparently one of the objects of disfranchisement has been to cut down the Negro school fund, bar out competent teachers, lower the grade and efficiency of the course of study and employ as teachers in the Negro schools those willing tools who do not and will not protest or complain.

7. That in the attempt to introduce much needed and valuable manual and industrial training there has been introduced into the curriculum of the Negro common school a mass of ill-considered, unrelated work which has overburdened the teacher and pushed into the background the vital studies of reading, writing and arithmetic. In a large measure this has been done with the avowed object of training Negroes as menials and laborers and of cutting them off from the higher avenues of life.

8. That the forward movement in education in the South during the last ten years has been openly confined almost entirely to white people. The movement for local school taxes, better high schools, consolidation of schools and transportation of children has with small exception been encouraged and made possible among the whites and not among the Negroes. In many cases the Negroes have been taxed for the improvement of white school facilities, while their own schools have not been allowed to share in these improvements.

9. That along with this curtailment of elementary public education for Negroes has gone a tendency to decry the work of those schools which are devoted to the higher training of Negro youth, to lower their curricula, to cut off northern benevolence and to decrease the supply of intellectual leaders for the Negro race.

Even with these patent facts staring the Nation in the face most people have come to the idea that at least the economic rights of the Negro are secure and many have been willing to say not only, "Give up the ballot," but also, "give up educational ideals so long as the race learns to work efficiently and accumulate property, particularly as farmers." Let us now ask what has been results here?

So far as work is concerned we again find the barriers up and not tending to fall. The attempt to establish a strict caste of occupations in the South has not been successful but it has been possible to keep the majority of Negroes in the most disagreeable and poorest paid occupations and in the lowest positions of most occupations. The Negro has pushed his way into some skilled occupations but it has been a long and tedious fight. It is therefore wrong to assume that economic opportunity has been opened to the Negro with any great degree of freedom. But this is true: The Sputh has been advancing in wealth at a phenominal rate during the last two or three decades. It has been impossible, particularly in cities, to with-hold some of the economic advantages of this great advance from the colored workers. The result has been a great increase of property-holding among Negroes in cities and towns.

Unfortunately there are no complete figures to illustrate this as a whole but a few facts and localities throw some light upon it. The property of the Negro church situated chiefly in Negro cities increased 115% between 1890 and 1906. The town and city property of the Negroes of Georgia increased nearly 100% between 1890 and 1907. In Virginia the town and city property of colored people increased from an assessed value of four millions in 1899 to nine and one half millions in 1911. There is reason to believe that throughout the United States the increase of Negro city property has been very large in the last ten years.

The chief reason for this conclusion is unfortunately the increase of the city segregation movement. In other words, just as soon as the Negro city laborer working on a wage scale lower than that of any other single group of people, saved out of his meagre earnings enough to move out of the alleys and slums to the front streets there immediately arose the question as to who should bear the economic cost of race prejudice. Most people in their careless indulgence in race prejudice forget this economic cost. It shows itself in the social cost of crime, prostitution and slums and it shows itself in the fall of values when a socially despised group moves into a decent neighborhood. That such a movement results in a real financial loss no one denies or attempts to deny. But the question is who shall bear the loss?

The segregation movement as illustrated in Baltimore, and many other Southern cities and as advocated in St. Louis answers this problem plainly: It proposes to put the whole cost of this economic loss absolutely upon the Negroes. That this is unjust goes without saying. They, of all parties, are the ones who should be exempt from any loss. But even here, it has not been altogether easy to gain the sympathy of right-minded Americans. They have said, "It is largely a social matter," and "let the Negroes develope their own settlements," forgetting the absolute injustice and preposterous demand which such an attitude makes. A further argument is, however, "let the Negro stop crowding into the cities. Here they have in the country and in the South a wonderful chance for development. They can get hold of land, they know how to raise a great staple crop and many auxiliary crops. Here is an open economic field, let them take advantage of it."

It must not be thought that the Negroes themselves or their friends have been unaware of the economic chance of the Negro in Southern agriculture, but they have been trying to say that even in the country the economic man of to-day must be backed by social and political rights else the fruit of his labor is not safe.

I doubt if in modern economic history the truth of this proposition has been more clearly proven than in the recent history of the Negro race in America. Here is a people which has been asked to give up its political and social rights in order to achieve economic freedom. Despite the protest of a few far seeing men among them the race has virtually done this. They have let themselves be deprived of the vote almost without a struggle and they have openly and slavishly acknowledged that they are not fit associates for their fellow men, and they have hoped by reason of this craven surrender to earn a living, accumulate property and achieve finally the recognition of their fellow men. The result has been that their educational opportunities have been curtailed rather than expanded. Their right to work has been admitted but slowly and grudgingly among all but the lowest and worst-paid occupations. And their right to accumulate property in cities is threatened to-day with serious curtailment. With this astonishing record as an answer to the program of twenty years ago what is the present situation of the Negro with regard to agricultural land in the South? Here indeed, we reach the last boundaries in the question. Let us bring to mind once more what has been said and promised in the past.

The movement gathered by men like the late Morris K. Jesup and Robert Ogden stated to the world and said with conviction, "You have here ten million inferior folk. You have got to stop treating them like ordinary white humanity and treat them as Negroes. You must educate them for work and particularly for farm labor and when you do that you will find the white South meeting you more than half way and willing to agree to accord the Negroes every economic right which they deserve. Not only did the overwhelming public opinion of the North believe and acknowledge this policy but many colored people acquiesed it with enthusiasm. Consequently the movement toward farm life among Negroes in the last decade has been phenominal. While farms conducted by white farmers have increased nine and one half per cent between 1900 and 1910 farms conducted by colored farmers have increased nearly twenty per cent. There were seven and one half per cent more white farmers conducting their farms in 1910 than in 1900 but there were seventeen percent more colored owners conducting their farms. The land in Negro farms increased from forty-two to forty-seven million acres in that time and the land in the hands of Negro farm owners from sixteen to nineteen million acres. To-day twenty-nine per cent of the farms in the South are conducted by colored men not counting the vast number of farms conducted by white men with colored labor. This would seem to be most encouraging and especially so when we remember under what difficulties it has been accomplished.

In the country the disfranchisement of the Negro was completest, in the country the task idea of slavery lasted longest and in the country new legislation did everything it could to reduce the black farm hand into peonage. To-day in many rural districts of the gulf states the refusal of a colored man to work for a white man on any terms which the white man wishes to make, can without great difficulty be made a penetentiary offence and the colored man sent as a slave of the state to work in chains for a large part of his natural life.

The revolt of the black laborer however make this programme impossible. He could not strike for higher wages but he could run away to town and he did in such numbers that labor scarcity was the cry of the plantations and harsh contract and vagrancy laws were passed. The most effective bait however to keep the laborer was to sell him land on installments. In nine cases out of ten he was unable to keep his contract and remained a laborer. But in the tenth case he got his land. Sometimes he was helped by the better class land lords, by his relatives in the north, by the breaking up of big plantations and in a few cases by philanthropy.

In these ways the value of the farm property owned by Negroes between 1900 and 1910 increased from one hundred and eighty million dollars to four hundred and forty million dollars or one hundred and forty-five per cent. During this same time the farm property of whites throughout the country increased but ninety-three per cent and the farm property of Southern whites increased one hundred and eight per cent. This increase in value is shown in the land which went from one hundred and two to two per cent; in the buildings which went from twenty-nine to sixty-nine millions or one hundred and forty-two per cent; in implements and machinery which went from eight to sixteen millions or ninety per cent and in live stock which increased ninety-two percent or from forty-one to seventy-eight millions.

Negro land ownership has increased from about three million acres in 1875 to six million acres in 1880, to eight million acres in 1890, fifteen million in 1900 and nearly twenty million in 1910.

This is most gratifying and if the prophets of the past were correct we would expect to hear a chorus of congratulation and good will from the best friends of the Negro in the South. We would expect an argument something like this: "You see we have kept our word in the main issue. We have disfranchised the Negro and while we have not given him large educational opportunity and have kept him in his place in the industrial world nevertheless he has become a house holder in the cities (although there we must limit him) and especially he has become fifty years after Emancipation a land holder in the United States by his own unaided efforts. This shows the wisdom of our policy."

When, however, we come forward prepared to hear this argument and to answer its weak places, for it has weak places, we find on the part of the dominant South not only absence of

all enthusiasm for this increase of Negro agricultural well being but a distinct air of disappointment and something worse. Indeed this air of disappointment is so wide-spread that one cannot help wondering if the Negro has not been urged to take advantage of Southern agriculture just because some Southerners were convinced that he could not take such advantage and that in the country districts of the South he could be held in his place, politically, socially and economically.

It would be unfair to assume this without undoubted proof and such proof comes to us unfortunately from North Carolina. In order to understand that development in North Carolina let us just look at some significant figures.

Farms owned by Negroes in North Carolina have increased in the decade from seventeen thousand to twenty-one thousand and the land from nine-hundred and sixty-five thousand acres to twelve hundred thousand acres; not only has there been this numberical increase, but while all farm property in North Carolina increased one hundred and thirty per cent Negro farm property increased two hundred and eleven per cent or from nine million dollars to twenty-seven million dollars; and the value of the land alone increased from five to seventeen million or two hundred and twenty per cent.

NORTH CAROLINA

COLORED FARMERS	1900	1910
Value of farm property, colored farmers	$28,986,165	$81,424,800
" " " of colored owners	8,828,581	27,448,410
" " " land owned, colored owners	5,351,290	17,063,588

Has this caused any rejoicing in North Carolina? I regret to say it has not. On the contrary it has led to wide-spread proposal for the most vital attack upon the economic rights of the Negro ever put forward in the United States. Let no one misconceive the significance of this. The Negro was asked to give up his political rights for the sake of ? advance. He finds that with the giving up of his educational rights are curtailed, the right to work is increased but inadequately, his right to hold property in cities is being questioned and now, finally, there is a movement in the South to curtail his right to own agricultural land. This movement has not started with an ignorant agitator of the Blease and Vardaman and Tillman type. Its sponsor is Clarence Poe, editor of the "Progressive Farmer" and a man representing in many ways the best traditions of the South.

Mr. Poe began his campaign last Summer in the "Progressive Farmer" a weekly paper with a wide circulation among the most intelligent farmers all over the South. As a result of this campaign week after week, a growing mass of white farmers are crying with one of Poe's correspondents:

"North Carolina and the South for the white race, should be the slogan from now henceforth".

Or as another says: "Mr. Clarence Poe's suggestions that the Negroes buy land adjoining and settle in communities to themselves is a good one and will do more than anything else to adjust the race relations between the whites and blacks of the South. It is the 'Jim Crow' law put into effect in the rural districts."

Mr. Poe suggested that the Negro should be separated from the whites in the country districts by a law prohibiting future sale of land to him in white communities. His suggestion took immediate root and a third correspondent writes: "Negro children are not allowed to attend school with whites, Negroes do not sit on the same cars, loaf in the same depots, and feed at the same hotels as the white folks. Why, then, should landlords be allowed to impose them on white farmers and ruin entire sections of the country?"

Mr. Poe then began to carefully fortify and elaborate his original proposition.

"Everybody knows that the Negroes stand together. They are notoriously clannish in everything. They help one another even to the extent of shielding Negro criminals from the law.

"But while the Negroes have been pulling together in this way, what has been the attitude of our white people in the vital matter of saving the rural South to the white race? Everybody knows that the shameful and disgraceful fact is that the white people have not been pulling together, but that the white city land-owner and merchant has too often practically taken sides against the struggling white tenant and small farmer and in favor of the Negro. I once said to a big plantation owner living in Memphis who had lands in Mississippi, "What Mississippi needs is fewer big plantations cultivated by Negro tenants and more thrifty, enterprising, industrious white farmers - more white people. Why don't you try to get white tenants?" "I don't want them," he replied, "They won't spend money and run accounts at our stores like the Negroes will, and besides, they soon want to buy land themselves. The Negroes make more money for us."

A friend writes him elaborating this argument: "I believe the great trouble is with a certain class of white landowners. They have Negro tenants on their lands who are, in fact, really peons. They furnish their tenants everything in the spring at high rates and in the fall take everything at low rates. I have in mind a certain Negro who purchased a mule worth about $90 for $150, and after fifteen years of hard work the mule died without being paid for. In the meantime, the white man got all the Negro made. Such land-owners don't want intelligent white tenants. They want those whom they can use to their advantage. They are the ones who have sold land at exorbitant prices to Negroes, thinking, perhaps, they could not pay for it."

Here is evidently a situation calling for remedy; A modern reformer would suggest the uprooting of peonage and the company store system; co-operative buying of large tracts of land. But this remedy is far from these men's minds and we discover that if the peon escapes and becomes an independent small farmer and land-owner that he is, if anything even more objectionable.

"The Negroes first ran us out because some white people moved to town, became merchants who furnished supplies for the Negro to make their crops, and now have sold their country land to them in farms containing 20,30 and 40 acres, and occasionally 100 acres or more. They sometimes give them a long time for payment, the Negroes seldom getting out of debt until they go to the public works to get out. They settle on these farms, have large families generally, and simply crowd us out, causing us to seek a village or town where white people can co-operate, have schools and churches, and where it is understood that no Negroes own lots mixed with white people."

Poe therefore drops the subject of the wretched underpaid and ruthlessly exploited peonage and addresses himself to this dangerous newcomer.

"Briefly I should say that the law we need is one which will say that wherever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, a majority of the voters in such a district may say (if they wish) that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race - provided such action is approved or allowed (as being justified by considerations of the peace, protection and social life of the community) by a reviewing judge or board of country commissioner."

He goes on to develope his thought: "Atlanta has just passed a law saying that a majority of property-owners in a city block can say that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race from them. Why, then, cannot Georgia or any other State pass a law giving a similiar privilege to its country people? Why can it not be said that where there is a white community and the majority of white land owners wish to keep their community white, they can lay-off a district in which it will be unlawful to sell to a person of a different race? And since the same privilege would be given Negroes where they own land, the law could not be said to discriminate against any race; and the whites would lose little because they do not care to buy in communities wholly surrounded by Negroes, anyhow.

This has a certain semblance of even handed justice; Mr. Poe says: "It may be argued, I know, that such a law is unjust, that with the Government of the South as it is, it could be utilized by white people to keep their communities white but the Negroes would rarely be able to use it to keep their communities wholly Negro. All of which I admit is possible, and yet, as I have said, I believe it is just."

Why would the Negro "rarely be able" to make a wholly Negro community? Because Negroes cannot vote, cannot select county commissioners and consequently could not drive out the whites. Nevertheless Mr. Poe is not moved.

"Studying it with all possible desire for truth and justice, I repeat, therefore, I cannot see that it is right or just to say that because a white majority shall have the right to limit future land sales to their race, a Negro majority must everywhere have exactly the same privilege."

The difficulty is that Mr. Poe has his eye on the landlords of the Black belt where a few land barons still drive their slaves with the lash. He wants to reassure them that no matter if the blacks out number them ten to one they are not to be disturbed in their reign.

But Mr. Poe's correspondents are not so canny. One of them says: "It is the gravest problem confronting us of the South to-day - this selling land promiscuously to the Negro race. In my neighborhood the white school population is 12. The Negro school population is 140. Can I be satisfied to raise my children under such conditions? I am trying to sell out. Have been offered $12,000 cash for my farm by a Negro. It is worth $20,000 and would bring it if the surroundings were different."

At this we rub our eyes: if the Negro population out numbers the white ten to one surely this is the place, if any, for the white man to move. But this man does not want to move. What does he want there? Does he want the Negroes to go? No, but he wants them kept down. He does not even want to allow them the advantages of his disadvantages. As one says: "In protecting their home and social life, it is necessary for our rural white people to use some extraordinary measures to offset the Negroes' advantages in driving them out. In the first place, the Negro can live on less than the white man, and, therefore, if he is doing the same kind of work, he has this economic advantage over the white man."

Mr. Poe now appears in the offing again and serves this new argument. It is Negro cheap labor that has ruined the South. "Why is Southern agriculture so far behind the North?" he asked.

The answer is easy. "The man in the North was deiven to do his own work because he did not have scores of Negroes to do it, and this caused him to look around and seek other means with which to do it. And see how he has profited because he has always had to do his own labor, and see the great rut we now find ourselves in because we had plenty of Negroes to do our work, and therefore did not need to seek to improve our farm labor conditions as our Northern neighbor did."

The answer to this would seem obvious; make Negro labor dearer by turning it into an independent farm owning class. But no, Mr. Poe will have none of this, but reports this case:

"I was reared and am now living in a community that only a few years ago was famed for its social features-live, well filled churches and schools. But alas! it is hopelessly ruined. Churches and schools can hardly hold together. There are three non-resident land owners who are responsible for it all. This being a very fertile section, they have bought most of the land and want only Negro tenants. The land is unsurpassed for fertility by any section in several miles radius and therefore has induced the best type of Negroes to cultivate it; but nevertheless they are Negroes and have completely destroyed the social features of the community."

It would seem from this that there is no place on earth for the best Negroes either as tenants or landowners. Their very presence destroys all real life. "We might as well admit," says Mr. Poe, "the argument that the present wholesale sandwiching of whites and Negroes in our rural districts is perhaps the main thing in the way of developing rural co-operation in the South. If we can once get groups of wholly white communities, it will be far easier to get the farmers in them to pull together, whereas at present, the white people in the South are too scattered to win success with ten thousand co-operative enterprises that would succeed if white farmers were grouped together. And especially does the present sandwiching of whites and Negroes militate against education - against good schools for both races."

But if educational justice is not done to the Negro in the white community, will it be anywhere? One Negro correspondent is in despair. He writes: "If we own a good farm or hourse or cow, dog or yoke of exen, we are harassed until we are bound to sell, give away, or run away before we can have any peace of our lives."

Mr. Poe prints this but with apology and warning.

"We may say in this connection that it was our idea in printing the letters from Negroes simply to show what they are saying and thinking and to give all sides a fair hearing. And if Negroes are bragging that they send their children to school when white people keep theirs away for lack of fine clothes, or because they are shut up in factories, or if they brag that there are white people who can't read and write and they help them, or that white people won't work and the Negroes will, it will be a mighty good thing if we get mad enough about such boasting to see to it that they shall have no excuse even for saying such things in the future.

Mr. Poe therefore repeatedly returns to his original proposal. He has no fear of constitutions.

"It may be that the Atlanta segregation and the similiar segregation plans we have suggested for our country districts might be declared in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment. Some lawyers think so, some do not. But we repeat that if our people make up their minds that segregation is a good and necessary thing, they will find a way to put it into effect: - just as they did in the case of Negro disfranchisement despite an ironbound Amendment specifically designed to prevent it.

"If such a direct law as we proposed last week would be unconstitutional, might not the same result be effected indirectly by saying that no land should be sold to any man in any specified district if a petition against the sale were signed by a majority of the resident land-owners in such a district? If a predominantly white community them, it could be understood (or formally declared) that this new law would be invoked only to keep the community white, and so the matter would be settled without further trouble."

"It is objected to by some, that the plan does not go far enough. For example, the Knoxville, Tennessee, Sentinel says that, "It seems to have a practical weakness as so far advanced - that it does not take tenants into account.

"Well, there is no doubt but that the indiscriminate renting of land to Negroes by absentee land-owners is crying evil. The letters we have received from all over the South indicate that mistakably. And yet we do not now see any plan of regulating this evil that would not be susceptible of much abuse. As yet the proportion of white people wanting to rent land is small, and it would not be fair to absolutely limit the renting to white people even in these white communities.

"But it is our confident conviction that if the Negroes should refuse to work where the white people decided upon such a measure of protection, it would only be a form of industrial suicide for them, and after a few months of trouble in working out a new adjustment, the white people would be as well off - or better off - from a labor standpoint than ever before. In the first place, young Southern white men would be willing to go into these all-white communities and work as laborers, and in the second place, it would not be long until good white labor would come in from other sections."

Here then, is the culmination of this extraordinary argument:

The South says here: we despise the Negro because he is down and yet we cannot allow him to rise; we cannot educate him lest he grow intelligent, we cannot allow him in industry lest he compete with us and save money; we cannot allow him to buy property because he will be independent and live beside us; we cannot let him live by himself because we want his labor and because we dare not give him political power enough to establish and protect his own segregated communities.

The South is not wholly to blame for this logic. The North shares that blame. The high and only tenable ground of the past was educate the Negro, give him work and wages, give him civil rights, give him a vote and let him make his way as a freeman.

This ground the North has joined the South in undermining:

I have received hundreds and hundreds of letters, representing fifteen States, endorsing the plan of race segregation I advocated on this page, August 30th.

The law I advocated August 30, it will be remembered was just this:

"Whenever the greater part of the land acreage in any given district that may be laid off is owned by one race, the majority of the voters in such a district may say, if they wish, that in future no land shall be sold to a person of a different race; provided such action is approved or allowed (as being justified by considerations of the peace, protection and social life of the community) by a reviewing judge or board of county commissioners."

"Such a board as I have said, could be used by any white community to keep itself white, but the Negro would almost never be able to use it to make a community wholly Negro. If you are in favor of such a plan and want to know more about it, send me a postal card or letter at once."

Clarence Poe.

THE WORLD PROBLEM OF THE COLOR LINE

The average American is apt to regard the Negro problem as parochial and temporary: parochial as being largely localized in the Southern United States and temporary as being a passing phase of the slavery problem. On this account his is rather impatient with it. He does not want to discuss or take action because he thinks it but to "leave it to the South" or because he likes to insist that the problem of slavery is a closed chapter.

38-13-281

If such men would look carefully around them however they would see that the Problem of the Color Line in America instead of being the closing chapter of past history is the opening page of a new era. All over the world the diversified races of the world are coming into close and closer contact as never before.

We are nearer China today than we were to San Francisco yesterday.

In this widespread contact of men the problem of humanity is taking new forms and democracy is getting new meanings. The provincial off hand way of settling these matters was to talk of "superior" and "inferior" races, of "lesser breeds without the law". It has been suggested more than once that ~~enth~~ Christianity was not to apply in these human relations and that the world must revert to the ethics of the club and claw in a great coming war of Ra ces.

In this way many men interpreted the race problem of Negroes and whites in the United States. and the West Indies, the contact of Spaniard, Indian, Negro and Saxon in South America, the looming race disturbances all over Africa, the wide-spread unrest in India and the so-called "Yellow Peril" of China and Japan, not to mention the islands of the sea.

If this is true, God help civilization for the struggle will be fierce and disheartening the world over. But it is not true. There is no earthly reason which the ethics of Jesus Christ should not apply to race problems and why we should not use reason in these race ppoblems.

If this is so we should begin right here at home. We should recognize the growing and artificially encouraged race prejudice and we should fight it by all civilized methods. We should insist on civilized treatment for civilized men the world over and human sympathy for all human beings.

38-13-282

37-7-10

DIUTURNI SILENTI

Those of us, who like myself, have struggled painfully through the orations of Cicero, coming only in after years to realize their stately beauty, have doubtless recognized the two words which form the subject of my talk. They are the beginning of the speech in defense of Marcellus. I remember vividly the halting and stiff translation of the words which we used to commit to memory: "Diuturni silenti, patres conscripti, quo eram his temporibus usus, non timore aliquo, sed partim delore, partim verecundia, finem hodiernus dies attulit, idemque initium qual vellem qualque sentirem meo pristiro more dicend." - To my long continued silence, conscript fathers, which I have made use of in these times, not on account of any fear, but partly from grief, partly from shame, this day brings an end and also a beginning of my speaking according to my former custom, what I think and what I know."

These words have come to my mind because of the duty which I conceive is mine on this occasion and which I have so long postponed. I was graduated from Fisk University thirty six years ago and during those years my relations to this, my alma mater, have been most peculiar. I went out of here with a love for the institution and an enthusiasm for its principles and its teachers which could hardly have been greater. I went to further preparation and then at last, about twenty five years ago, I found myself the storm center of a tremendous controversy. I was that center by no thought or wish of mine but because of the tremendous logic of the situation. The young men and women who are graduating today can hardly realize what young colored folk faced a little quarter of a century ago. It was at that time impossible for a Negro to stand up and declare that the colored people of the United States ought to have the right to vote, that they were the equals of other human beings and should be treated as such in public places, on the railroads, in human opportunity, that they had contributed to the civilization of the world and America and deserved in turn to share civilization. These things are not conceded to today by any means, but today we have come to a time when no Negro, with very few exceptions, would dare to say that these are not the things for which we must stand. Twenty five years ago the man that said this was the subject of calumny and vituperation, was said to be a trouble maker and a rebel and then, by a curious twist of logic, accused of being ashamed of his race and station. It was, of course, the bond and duty of every man among us who felt his manhood to fight the propaganda which tried to make the colored people of America ignore and acquiesce in their inferiority, to fight it in every possible way, and we did.

It isn't a pleasant thing to fight even when the fight is simply spiritual. It leaves wounds and scars and in this case the fight curiously estranged me from Fisk University because in these years Fisk University changed and from being the center where Negro manhood was most strongly asserted and most diligently believed in, it became gradually a place where it was fashionable to say as little as possible on what were called controversal subjects. There was a determined effort to get back of Fisk University and list in its aid those great forces of wealth and influence which had built Tuskegee and which had endowned the great institutions of the North and which could make, if they would, Fisk University a permanent, well endowed institution. Personally this placed me in a most uncomfortable dilemma. I knew well that Fisk University needed money and support and that no influence or effort of mine could help her to a single cent. I knew that the stand which I had taken beginning with the publication of "The Souls of Black Folk" in 1903, the inauguration of the Niagra Movement in 1906 and the establishment of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and The Crisis in 1909 and 1910 made me peculiarly personna non grata to those folk from whom Fisk University was to get endowment and it seemed to me, therefore, that it was my duty although an unpleasant duty, to keep still concerning Fisk University and its ideals and to keep away from the institution. And this I have done practically for twenty five years. And I have done it, I may say, with the silent, but enthusiastic cooperation of the authorities of Fisk. It has brought from time to time criticism upon me. People have said that I thought more of my bachelor's degree from white Harvard than from colored Fisk, that I wanted to forget my connection with Fisk and other similar things.

37-7-11

Finally, however, the situation seemed to me to be changing. By tremendous and what must have been heart breaking effort an endowment of one million dollars has been raised for Fisk University, or practically raised. It has been secured from people who are not in sympathy with that which I and my friends have been standing for, who are not at all in sympathy with self assertion on the part of the Negro and with the determination of the darker races to rule in the modern world as absolutely co-equal workers with all other races. I raise my hat to those persons who have been able from such sources to get money for an institution of higher learning for Negroes in the United States. It is the only instance of the kind. Not a single other Negro institution has received such endowment or is there any prospect of their receiving it.

37-7-12

At the same time with this endowment in the hands of the institution there come tremendous and soul searching questions and they come to us as alumni of Fisk and the first and greatest question is, is the present Fisk University the institution that it used to be, the institution of our dreams and ideals and the institution that can and will do for the Negro race the things which a Negro university ought to do. And if it is not what are we going to do about it? We who are graduates of the institution, we who by all rules of universities like those present in the United States and in the world are the ligitimate owners and directors of Fisk, the people for whom and by whom it should be conducted and the last and ultimate court of authority as to its policies and methods. I know there are those who would be disposed to dispute this assertion of vast power on the part of the alumni of Fisk University. But I am simply saying of Fisk what is true of Harvard. As a graduate of Harvard I am a part of its greatest ruling power. Harvard University is governed by a Board of overseers. No overseer of Harvard can be elected without my judgment being called for and expressed. No policy of the President of Harvard or any member of its faculty can be carried out without my right of protest, and if that is true of the greatest and oldest university of white America, how much more should it be true of this institution which was founded for my race and of which I am a graduate of over thirty five years standing.

37-7-13

The responsibility which falls upon the alumni of this institution today is tremendous and cannot be shirked. We have been shirking it, as a body of graduates we have shown no interest in this institution. We have simply withdrawn from it in silence. I know of no great Negro institution, and I have been brought in contact more or less intimately with every Negro college in the United States, I know of none of these institutions where the alumni have counted for less, or have counted themselves for less than in the case of Fisk University. They have stood back silently. They seldom visit the institution, they have almost no voice in its affairs and they ask for no voice, and yet this attitude manifestly must come to an end and the time for it to end is now. This is the day of turning. This is the day for us to ask ourselves what is Fisk University and what is it that we want Fisk University to be and what is it that we are going to try to make it up to the very last ounce of our power and determination.

The answer, of course, is clear. A great institution today needs money. The amount of money which it seems necessary to use in the great educational foundations is astonishing. Harvard University has just raised eleven million dollars cash from its friends and alumni and it is now immediately starting to raise thirteen million dollars more. The endowment of institutions of learning in the United States sounds like the record of great industrial foundations. Even if we admit, as I think all thoughtful people must, that the craze for great physical foundations and elaborate expenditure has gone beyond reason among us, nevertheless any one who has been closely connected with an institution of learning cannot for a moment doubt the necessity of the large funds for salaries, for laboratories, for libraries, for grounds and buildings. And therefore I hasten with others to express my profound appreciation for the tremendous work that has been accomplished by president and trustees of this institution in securing a medium for Fisk. At the same time I want to say and reiterate that of all the things that go to make up a great university money is the least. I know how easy it is to say a glib thing like this and how impossible it is to run an institution without money and at the same time I repeat that of the six great things that go to make an institution of learning a real college, a real university for either black people or white, money is the least, the thing that can most easily be dispensed with and the thing with which, and in the absence of the others, makes the institution a dead husk.

37-7-14

The first thing that always and in all centers of knowledge has been regarded as absolutely essential to a university is freedom. It has been recognised always that the pursuit of knowledge must be a matter of the free untrammeled spirit, that no system of fences and rules, of prohibitions and threats can make human beings lovers of the truth. Unless they are induced to follow of their own free will there can be no real following. A university is a place where there is such freedom andwhere every inducement is used to guide that freedom, thought and truth. And such inducements lie in two great groups which are the second and third essentials of the university. The first is self expression, the encouragement of students to use their freedom of thought and action in a way that will lead to a realization of what their own selves mean, of what their own powers can do. This great quotation "Know thyself" of ancient Greece has always been the great and essential goal of education. The knowledge and the freedom to attain it, these are the three great beacon lights of a real university.

37-7-15

And thirdly comes the mounting power of ideals. Not simply do we seek in universities to give to our children the chance to do and the chance to know the doer, but certain tremendous aims, certain world old ideals, toward which they ought to strive. And finally as the end of the striving toward self knowledge and ideals through individual freedom we come to the revelation of that great body of knowledge which is the end of study, what the surrounding world really is and was and has a chance of being. As we think of these four characteristics and essentials of the university there can be no doubt that each one of them and all of them together are infinitely more than the money which supports them; that if we were compelled to give up any one of the five we would have first to give up a part or all of the university income. You cannot surrender freedom and remain an institution of learning. You cannot have an institution of learning where there is no real chance at self expression. You cannot have a college without real and high ideals and the college which does not seek knowledge for knowledge's sake is not for it has not been. With these things gone and with any number of millions of dollars a so-called institution of learning remains a farce and a lie.

If now we turn to apply this to ourselves and to Fisk University we must first note and note frankly peculiar difficulties, difficulties so great that we are continually tempted to spoil and deny the objects of university training as applied to us. We are afraid to give freedom to our own sons and daughters because of the unusual temptations by which they are surrounded. They are living in a world which on the one hand insults them systematically and continually and seeks to repress them and discourage them and on the other hand in an inner world of their own group where freedom continually tempts to become license. We are living face to face with that old problem of the second generation of the children of people who themselves suffered and toiled and were deprived and who in rebound seek to give their children every indulgence and as a result encourage impudence and waste and wild excess. And yet, notwithstanding all this, unless we give our children freedom, unless we tear down the barriers and open the way there is absolutely no salvation for them or for us. It is impossible to think that by piling rule on rule and commandment on commandment and don't on don't that you are going to in time compel a young man and a young woman who have reached the age of reason to do the thing that they do not wish to do. The utmost that you can accomplish is to make them hypocrits and the least is to make them red handed rebels. Again we halt in a sort of nameless fear before self expression on the part of our children. What would the world say and particularly the southern white world if they knew what every normal Negro boy and girl were thinking of them and their actions, of the world and its possibilities, of right and wrong. Would not the encouragement of self expression on the part of the students like those at Fisk mean an outburst and whirl wind of hate and fury and unbridled curses against the world in which they live, against their parents for bringing them into it, against the white rulers for their crimes and inaptitude? And here again we are always actually or potentially saying hush to children and students, we are putting on the soft peddle, we are teaching them subterfuse and compromise, we are leading them around to back doors for fear that they shall express themselves. And yet whenever and wherever we do this we are wrong, absolutely and eternally wrong. Unless we are willing to train our children to be cowards, to run like dogs when they are kicked, to whin and lick the hand that slaps them,we have got to teach them self realization and self expression and we have got to do this not simply as a matter of revolt and revenge as of sheer justice to our white fellow citizens. If there is one thing that spoils a community it is a boy whom everybody knows can be kicked with impunity, a race that anybody can oppress and enslave. Then too if the Negro race is ever going to enrich the world further with its great and mighty gifts it is only going to do it as it has the chance and the impulse toward self expression. Ever since emancipation America has been trying to turn down the ideals which it set before colored children. White childred are told in thunder tones that their wagons must be hitched to stars but for colored children nice honest lamp posts seem to do and preferably those filled with gas and not with electricity.

37-7-16

37-7-17

The business of most commencement orators who come down to institutions like this is to warn the students not to be too ambitious, curb their desires, to lower their ideals to something which we like to call practical. Of those great sweeps of the universe where men become poets and painters, leaders and writers, explorers and singers we try ourselves to say to our children that they must of course remember not to expect to be too great and our white friends back us by assuring those same childran that it isn't possible, at least for them, to be too small. And then when it comes to realms of knowledge and what the colored students could learn the boundaries of the universe become small. For a while there was a determined effort that the knowledge of Negro youth should be bounded by carpentry and shoemaking and into these fair halls of Fisk University have crept the idea that to teach the mechanism of an automobile was a ligitimate step toward the bachelor's degree. And yet today we know that the educated man speaks two or three modern languages and that no man is educated who doesn't do that. That he knows by actual work in the laboratory the composition of matter and the arrangement of the universe, that he has studied the phenomena of life from the amoeba to the human heart, that he can count,, that he can reason and that he knows the history of human kind not simply by second hand propaganda but by first hand following and thought. This is the realm of knowledge which should be spread as a feast before students and to which they should be free to come and to use it with the knowledge of the great ideals necessary for its best use and the great powers of the world which make for its greatest use.

How far now does Fisk University fulfill the ideal of a great institution of learning as thus set down. It no only falls far short of this ideal but it falls so far short that the criticism of the university is heard in every part of this land. I have never met a group of Fisk graduates or former students in the last ten or fifteen years that I have not had voiced and poured into my ears a volume of complaint against this institution so bitter and so deeply felt that it was impossible to ignore it. And the first and most insistent complaint is the lack of freedom in this institution. The utter absence of anything like democratic government either among teachers or students, the way in which the law is laid down straight, absolute and unyielding and students and parents and others told frankly that if they do not like the way this institution is run they can go. The idea seems to be deep seated that Fisk University is a private corporation run for private purposes and that its students have no right to demand certain things. In this respect Fisk University curiously differentiates itself from great institutions of learning. At Harvard recently a great Englishman was invited to speak. The governing Board of the institution decided that he ought not to address the students and he was not allowed to. The students immediately protested, they protested in their student publications, they protested through the newspapers, they carried their protest to the faculty, they carried it beyond the faculty to the governing board and they are still fighting for the right to invite any one whom they please so long as the person is decent and sincere to talk to them. They have in that fight the sympathy of educated people everywhere, but I wonder what would happen if the students of Fisk University made a similar protest. Or rather I don't wonder. The ring leaders would be expelled. And yet in years to come a list of the expelled students of Fisk University bids fair to become a roll of honor, of those who would not be crushed and who would not give up, who would be free.

37-7-18

The students of Fisk have absolutely no permissable method of self expression. They are dumb and silent. The Fisk Herald, of which I once had the honor to be editor and which lived until it was the oldest student publication in the United States, has been abolished. There is today no legitimate way in which any protest on the part of the students of Fisk University can be made within or without the walls. The mere fact that they seem to want to protest is used against them and the ideal student here is the student that shuts his mouth and obeys. The ideals placed before students of Fisk University are in many cases most unfortunate. Apparently they are being taught that the one great object of this institution and of the people that go through it is to placate the bourbon south. Not only is this the spirit of much of the teaching here but it is the absolute and openly expressed spirit of that publication known as the Fisk News. Here we have an expensive publication, a publication whose annual deficit over any possible income must be at least ten times the deficit which was alleged against the Fisk Herald and which month after month crawls and kowtows and debases itself before the white south, pats them on the back, criticises its own and in lieu of news tells of the marching up and down through the south of a man whose business it is to say to white people nothing that they don't like to hear concerning himself, his people and his institution. There is not one Fisk alumnus out of one hundred who believes in one tenth of the things that he has to stand for because of the Fisk News and yet that is the kind of propaganda that is being put before our children as the ideal of living. In the fields of knowledge opened up to our students here the great and striking lack is the lack of great teachers. To attempt to translate knowledge into life without the medium of the great teacher is to attempt the impossible. Fisk has had great teachers in the past, Adams Spence, that little slovernly man with the queer voice who sat with the great master spirits of Greecian civilization and made them sit with us. Chase who made chemistry a revealing fairyland through which we rushed eagerly into life. Morgan who was embodied sacrifice. There have been there are some successors to these great teachers of the past but on the whole it seems as though Fisk University of these days was not trying to get great teachers, that it was afraid of strong independent souls, that it wanted a faculty like a student body to obey and not to direct. We have seen extraordinary things in this institution. Fisk University catering for the approval of Vanderbilt. Why in God's name? What has Vanderbilt University done for culture or civilization in the past that Fisk University should prostrate itself before it. We have seen attempts to make this institution not simply a matter of rules but of mechanical rules, of rules supposed to enforce themselves without the intervention of judgment and sympathy. In a day when every great institution is getting further and further from the mechanics of marks to measure efficiency we see Fisk University insisting upon the absolute devine matter of a mark of 73 or 86½. And above all we find a peculiar tendency to consider these students as charity students in spite of the fact that the students of Fisk University are paying as large a percent of their expenses as the students throughout the United States and the world over. Whose fault is this? I tell you frankly it is the fault of the alumni of Fisk University. It is they that have allowed this thing to go on and are allowing it to go on and it is they who have got to stop it. Fisk University must become a place of freedom, a place where our sons and daughters can be developed as aggressive men and women and not atomical. It must become a realm of knowledge of great teachers without disgusting and degrading propaganda.

37-7-19

37-7-194

And the way to accomplish this is for the alumni to insist upon their rightful place in directing affairs of this university. The Board of Trustees of Fisk University must have at least two members who are selected under appropriate rules by the great body of alumni. It isn't enough for us to have an alumni member hand picked by the Board. Members elected by the alumni body must be appointed to the Board. It should begin with two members, it should end in the course of time with the alumni selecting all the members. It is intollerable that I, for instance, should have the right to vote for the governing Board of Harvard University and be disfranchised at Fisk University without voice. A body of alumni that submits to that sort of thing deserves no consideration. Beginning then with this small step the alumni should take their rightful place as advisors, referees, as eventual rulers of this institution. In the exceedingly difficult and delicate matter of race relations and race development in the south it is impossible that any one man or any group should rule and rule wisely without continued advice and reference to the people whose sons and daughters they are training. The body for such advice, for such consul are the graduates of this institution, those graduates who as time goes on are more and more becoming the fathers both spiritual and physical of the students who go in these halls.

37-7-20

I would not have you for a moment doubt of my absolute belief in the future of this institution and at the same time I cannot say too strongly that that future is wrapt up in the alumni, that without them it never can be a great university, that with them there are no limits to the greatness and efficiency to which they may attain.

DIUTURNI SILENTI

Those of us, who, like myself, have struggled painfully through the orations of Cicero coming only in after years to realize their stately beauty have doubtless recognized the two words which form the subject of my talk. They are the beginning of the speech in defense of Marcellus. I remember vividly the halting and stiff translation of the words which we used to commit to memory. "Diuturni silenti, patres conscripti, quo eram his temporibus usus, non timore aliquo, sed partim dolore, partim verecundia, finem hodiernus dies attulit, idemque initium qual vellem quaeque sentirem meo pristino more decend:" To my long continued silence conscript fathers which I have made use of in these times, not on account of any fear but partly from grief, partly from shame, this day brings an end and also a beginning of my speaking according to my former custom what I think and what I know. "

49-32-42

These words have come to my kind because of the duty which I conceive is mine on this occasion and which I have so long postponed. I was graduated from Fisk University 36 years ago and during those years my relations to this, my alma mater, have been most peculiar. I went out of here with a love for the institution and an enthusiams for its principals and its teachers which could hardly have been greater. I went to further preparation and then at last, about 25 years ago, I found myself the storm center of a tremendous controversy. I was that center by no thought or wish of mine but because of the tremendous logic of the situation. The young men and women who are graduating today can hardly realize what young colored folk faced a little quarter of a century ago. It was at that time impossible for a Negro to stand up and declare that the colored people of the United States ought to have the right to vote, that they were the equals of other human beings and should be treated as such in public places, on the railroads, in human opportunity. That they had contributed to the civilization of the world and America and deserved in turn to share civilization. These things are not conceded to today by any means but today we have come to a time when no Negro with very few exceptions would dare to say that these are not the things for which we must stand. 25 years ago the man that said this was the subject of calumny and vituperation, was said to be a trouble maker and a rebel and then, by a curious twist of logic, accused of being ashamed of his race and station. It was, of course, the bound and duty of every man among us who felt his manhood to fight the propaganda which tried to make the colored people of American ignore and acquiesce in their inferiority to fight it in every possible way and we did. It isn't a pleasant thing to fight even when the fight is simply spiritual. It leaves wounds and scars and in this case the fight curiously estranged me from Fisk University because in these years Fisk University changed and from being the center where Negro manhood was most strongly asserted and most diligently believed in, it became gradually a place where it was fashionable to say as little as possible on what were called controversal subjects. There was a determined effort to get back of Fisk University and list in its aid those great forces of wealth and influence which had built up Tuskegee and which had endowed the great institutions of the North and which could make, if they would, Fisk University a permanent, well endowed institution. Personally this placed me in a most uncomfortable dilemma. I knew well that Fisk University needed money and support and that no influence or effort of mine could help her to a single cent. I knew that the stand which I had taken beginning with the publication of the Souls of Black Folk in 1903, the inauguration of the Niagra Movement in 1905 and the establishment of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and The Crisis in 1909 and 1910 made me peculiarly persona non grata

be

4/9-32-43

to those folks from whom Fisk University was to get endowment and it seemed to me, therefore, that it was my duty, although an unpleasant duty, to keep still concerning Fisk and its ideals and to keep away from the insitution. And this I have done practically for twenty five years. And I have done it I may say with the silent, but enthusiastic cooperation of the authorities of Fisk. It has brought from time to time criticism upon me. People have said that I thought more of my bachelor's degree from white Harvard than from colored Fisk, that I wanted to forget my connection with Fisk and other similiar things. Fanally, however, the situation seemed to me to be changing. By tremendous and what must have been heart breaking effort an endowment of one million dollars has been raised for Fisk University or practically raised. It has been secured from people who are not in sympathy with that which I and my friends have been standing for, who are not at all in sympathy with selfassertion on the part of the Negro and with the determination of the darker races to rule in the modern world as absolutely co-equal workers with all other races. I raise my hat to those persons who have been able from such sources to get money for an institution of higher learning for Negroes in the United States. It is the only ~~institution~~ instance of the kind. Not a single other Negro institution has received such endowment or is there any prospect of their receiving it. At the same time with this endowment in the hands of the institution there come tremendous and soul searching questions and they come to us as alumni of Fisk and the first and greatest question is, is the present Fisk University the institution that it used to be, the institution of our dreams and ideals and the institution that can and will do for the Negro race the things which a Negro university ought to do. And if it isnot what are we going to do about it? We who are graduates of the institution, we who by all rules of universities like those present in the United States and in the world are the lirtimate owners and directors of Fisk, the people for whom and by whom it should be conducted and the last and ultimate court of authority as to its policies and methods. I know there are those who would be disposed to dispute this assertion of vast power on the part of the alumni of Fisk. But I am simply saying by Fisk what is true of Harvard University as a graduate of Harvard I am a part of its greatest ruling power. Harvard University is governed by a Board of overseers. No overseer of Harvard can be elected without my judgement being called for and expressed. No policy of the President of Harvard or any member of its faculty can be carried out without my right of protest and if that is true of the greatest and oldest university of white America, how much more should it be ture of this institution which was founded for my race and of which I am a graduate of over 35 years standing. The responsibility which falls upon the alumni of this institution today is tremendous and cannot be shirked. We have been shirking it, as a body of graduates we have shown no interest in this institution. We have simply withdrawn from it in silence. I know of no great Negro institution and I have been brought in contact more or less intimately with every Negro college in the United States, I know of none of these institutions where the alumni have counted for less or have counted themselves for less than in the case of Fisk University. They have stood back silently. They seldom visit the institution, they have almost no voice in its affairs and they ask for no voice, and yet this attitude manifestly must come to an end and the time for it to end is now. This is the day of turning. This is the day for us to ask ourselves what is Fisk and what is it that we want Fisk to be and what is it that we are going to try to make it up to the very last ounce of our power and determination. The answer of course is clear. A great institution today needs money. The amount of money which it seems necessary to use in the great educational foundations is astonishing. Harvard University has just raised eleven million dollars cash from its friends and alumni and it is now immediately starting to raise 13 million dollars more. The endowment of institutions of learning in the United States sounds like the record of great indsutrial foundations. Even if we admit, as I think all thoughtful people must, that the craze for great physical foundations and elaborate expenditure has gone beyond reason among us, nevertheless any one who has been closely connected with an institution of learning can for a moment doubt the necessity of the large funds for salaries, for laboratories, for libraries, for grounds and buildings. And therefore I hasten with others to express my profound appreciation for the tremendous work that has been accomplished by president and trustees of this institution in securing a medium for Fisk. At the same time I want to say and reiterate that of all the things that go to make up a great university money is the least. I know how easy it is to say a glib thing like this and how impossible it is to run an institution without money and at the same time I repeat that of the six great things that go to make an institution of learning a real college, a real university for either black people or white, money is the least, the thing that can most easily be dispensed with and the thing with which, and in the absence of the others, makes the institution a dead husk. The first thing that always and in all centers of knowledge has been regarded as absolutely essential to a university is freedom. Freedom of mind, freedom of spirit and as far as is possible physical freedom. It has been recognized always that the persuit of knowledge must be a matter of the free untrammeled spirit, that no system of fences and rules of prohibitions and threats can make human beings lovers of the truth. Unless they are enduced to follow of their own free will there can be no real following. A university is a place where there is such freedom and where every enducement is used to guide that freedom, thought and truth. And such enducements lie in two great groups which are the second and third essentials of the university. The first is self expression, the encouragement of students to use their freedom of t ought and action in a way that will lead to a realization of what their own selves mean, of what they own powers can do. This great quotation "know thyself" of ancient Greece has always been the great and essential goal of education. The knowledge and the freedom to attain it, these are the three great beacon lights of a real university. And thirdly comes the mounting power of ideals. Not simply do we seek in universities to give to our children the chance to do and the chance to know the doer, but certain tremendous aims, certain ideals, world old ideals, toward which they ought to strive. And finally as the end of the striving toward self knowledge and ideals through individual freedom we come to the revelation of that great body of knowledge which is the end of study, what the surrounding world really is and was and has a chance of being. As we think then of these four characteristics and essentials of the university there can be no doubt that each one of them and all of them together are infinitely greater than the money which supports them. That if we were compelled to give up any one of the five we would have first to give up a part or all of the university income. You cannot surrender freedom and remain an institution of learning. You cannot have an institution of learning where there is no real chance at self expression. You cannot have a college without real and high ideals and the college which does not seek knowledge for knowledge sake is not for it has not been. With these things gone and with any number of millions of dollars a socalled institution of learning remains a farce and a lie.

46-32-44

49-33-45

4/9-23-4/6

If now we turn to apply this to ourselves and to think we must first note and note frankly peculiar difficulties, difficulties so great that we are continually tempted to spoil and deny the objects of university training as applied to us. We are afraid to give freedom to our own sons and daughters because of the unusual temptations by which they are surrendered. They are living in a world which on the one hand insults them systematically and continually and seeks to repress them and discourage them and on the other hand in an inner world of their own group where freedom continually tempts to become license. We are living face to face with that old problem of the second generation of the children of people who themselves suffered and toiled and were deprived and who in rebound seek to give their children every indulgence and as a result encourage impudence and waste and wild excess. And yet notwithstanding all this unless we give our children freedom, unless we tare down the barriers and open the way there is absolutely no salvation for them or for us. It is impossible to think that by piling rule on rule and commandment on commandment and don't on don't that you are going to in time compel a young man and a young woman who have reached the age od reason to do the thing that they do not wish to do. The utmost that you can accomplish is to make them hypocrits and the least is to make them red handed rebels. Again we halt in a sort of nameless fear before self-expression on the part of our children. What would the world say and particularly the southern white world if they knew what every normal Negro boy and girl were thinking of them and their actions of the world and its possibilities, of right and wrong. Would not the encouragement of self-expression on the part of the students like those at Fisk mean an outburst and whirl wind of hate and fury and unbridled curses against the world in which they live, against their parents for bringing them into it, against the white rulers for their crimes and inaptitude. And here again we are always actually or potentially saying hush to our children and students, we are putting on the soft peddle, we are teaching them subterfuse and compromise, we are leading them around to back doors for fear that they shall express themselves. And yet we whenever and wherever we do this we are wrong, absolutely and eternally wrong. Unless we are willing to train our children to be cowards, to run like dogs when they are kicked,

10-22-47

to whin

419-32-48

to whin and lick the hand that slaps them. We have got to teach them self realization and self expression and we have got to do this not simply as a matter of revolt and revenge as of sheer justice to our white fellow citizens. If thereis one thing that splois a community it is a boy whom everyody knows can be kicked with impunity, a race that anybody can oppress and enslave. Then too if the Negro race is ever going to enrich the world further with its great and mighty gifts it is only going to do it as it has the chance and the impulse toward self expression. /I/have Ever since emancipation America has been trying to turn down the ideals which it set before colored children. White children are told in thunder tones that their wagons must be hitched to stars but for colored children nice honest lamp posts seem to do and preferably those filled with gas and hot with electricity.

The business of most commencement orators who come down to institutions like this is to warn the students not to be too ambitious, curb their desires to lower their ideals/ to something which we like to call practical. Of those great sweeps of the universe where men become poets and painters, leaders and writers, explorers and singers we try ourselves to say to our children that they must of course remember not to expect to be too great and our white friends back us by assuring those same children that it isn't possible at least for them to be too small. And then when it comes to realms of knowledge and what the colored students could learn the boundaries of the universe become small. For a while there was a determined effort that the knowledge of Negro youth should be bounded by carpentry and shoemaking and into these fair halls of Fisk University have crept the idea that to teach the mechanism of an automobile was a legitimate step toward the bachelor's degree. And yet today we know that the educated man speaks two or three modern languages and that no man is educated who doesn't do that. That he knows by /////have actual work in the laboratory the composition of matter and the arrangement of the universe.

that he has studied the phenomena of life from the amoeba to the human heart, that he can count that he can reason and that he knows the history of human kind not simply by second hand propabanda but by first hand following and thought. This is the realm of knowledge which should be spread as a feast before students and to which they should be free to come and to use it with the knowledge of the great ideals necessary for its best use and the great powers of the woul which make for ites greatest use. How far now does Fisk University fulfill the ideal of a great institution of learning as thus set down. It not only falls far short of this ideal but it falls so far short that the criticism of the University is heard in every part of this land. I have never met a group of Fisk graduates or former students in the last ten or fifteen years that ~~has/have~~ I have not had ~~heard~~ voiced and poured into my ears a volume of complaint against this institution so bitter and so deeply felt that it was impossible to ignore it. And the first and most insistent complaint is the lack of freedom in this institution. The utter absence of anything like democratic government either among teachers or students, the way in which the law is laid down straight, absolute and unyielding and students and parents and others told frankly that if they do not like the way this institution is run they can go. The idea seems to be deep seated that Fisk University is a private corporation run for private purposes and that its studentshave no right to demand certain things. In this respect Fisk curiously differentiates itself from great institutions of learning. At Harvard recently a great Englishmman was invited to speak. The governing board of the institution decided that he ought not to address the students and he was not allowed to. The students immediately protested, they protested in their student publications, they protested through the newspapers, they carried their protest to the faculty, they carried it beyond the faculty to the governing board and they are still fighting for the right to invite any one whom they please so long as the person is decent and sincere to talk to them.

49-32-60

They have in that fight the sympathy of educated people everywhere, but I wonder what would happen if the students of Fisk University made a similar protest. Or rather I don't wonder. The ring leaders would be expelled. ~~////~~ ~~so far as~~ Yet in years to come a list of the expelled students of Fisk University bids fair to become a roll of honor, of those who would not be crushed and who would not give up, who would be free. The students of Fisk have absolutely no permissable method of self expression. They are dumb and silent. The Fisk Herald of which I once had the honor to be editor and which lived until it was the oldest studnet publication in the United States has been abolished. There is today no legitimate way in which any protest on the part of the students of Fisk University can be made within or without the walls. The mere fact that they seem to want to protest is used against them and the ideal student here is the student that shuts his mouth and obeys. The ideals placed before students of Fisk University are in many cases most unfortunate. Apparently they are being taught that the one great object of this institution and of the people that go through it is to placate the bourbon south. Not only is this the spirit of much of the teaching here but it is the absolute and openly expressed spirit of that publication known as the Fisk News. There is not another institution in the United States that has dared to make its student body and alumni stand for a piece of propaganda as repugnant to their ideals and beliefs as Fisk University in the case of the Fisk News. Here we have an expensive publication, a publication whose annual deficit over any possible income must be at least ten times the deficit which was alleged against the Fisk Herald and which month after month crawls and kowtows and debases itself before the white south, pats them on the back, criticises its own and in lieu of news tells of the marching up and down through the south of a man whose business it is to say to white people nothing that they don't like to hear concerning himself, his people and his institution. There is not one

1/6-33-51

Fisk alumnus out of one hundred who believes in one thenth of the things that he has to stand for because of the Fisk News and yet that is the kind of propaganda that is being put before our children as the ideal of living. In the fields of knowledge opened up to our students here the great and striking lack is the lack of great teachers. To attempt to translate knowledge into life without the medium of the great teacher is to attempt the impossible. Fisk has had great teachers in the past, Adams Spence, that little slovernly man with the queer voice who sat with the great master spirits of Greecian civilization and made them sit with us. Chase who made chemistry a revealing fairyland through which we rushed eagerly into life. Morgan who was embodied sacrifice. There have been, there are some successors to these great teachers of the past but on the whole it seems as though Fisk of these days was not trying to get great teachers, that it was afraid of strong independent souls, that it wanted a faculty like a student body to obey and not to direct. We have seen extraordinary things in this institution. Fisk University catering for the approval of Vanderbilt. Why in God's name. What has Vanderbilt University done for culture of civilization in the past that Fisk Univ. should prostrate itself before it. We have seen attempts to make this institution not simply a matter of rules but of mechanical rules, of rules supposed to enforce themselves without the intervention of judgment and sympathy. In a day when every great institution is getting further and further from the mechanics of marks to measure efficienty we see Fisk University insisting upon the absolute devine matter of a mark of 73 or 83½. And above all we find a peculiar tendency to consider these studnets as charity students in spite of the fact that the students of Fisk Univ are paying as large a percent of their expenses as the students throughout the United States and the world over. Whose fault is this? I tell you frankly it is the fault of the alumni of Fisk University. It is they that have allowed this thing to go on and are allowing it to go on and it is they who have got to stop it. Fisk University must become a place of freedom, a place where our sons and daughters can be developed as aggressive men and women and not atomical. It must become a realm of knowledge of great teachers, without disgusting and degrading propaganda. And the way to accomplish this is for the alumni to insist upon their rightful pl ce in directing affairs of this university. The Board of Trustees of Fisk University must have at least two members who are selected under appropriate rules by the great body of alumni. It isn't enough for us to have an alumni member hand picked by the Board. Members elected b y the alumni body must be appointed to the Board. It should begin with two members, it should end in the course of time with the alumni selecting all the members. It is intollerable that I for instance, should have the right to vote for the governing Board of Harvard Univ and be disfranchised at Fisk University without voice. A body of alumni that submits to that sort of things deserves no consideration. Beginning then with this small step the alumni should take their rightful place as advisors, referees, as eventual rulers of this institution. In the exceedingly difficult and delicate matter of race relations and race development in the south it is impossible that any one man or any group should rule and rule wisely without continued advice and reference to the people whose sons and daughters they are training. The body for such advice, for such consul, are the graduates of this institution, those graduates who as time goes on are more and more becoming the fathers both spiritual and physical of the students who go in these halls. I would not have you for a moment doubt of my absolute belief in the future of this institution and at the same time I cannot say too strongly that that future is wrpat up in the alumni, that without them it never can be a great university. That with them there are no limits to the greatness and efficienty to which the may attain.

4/9-32-52

419-32-53

BUSINESS AS PUBLIC SERVICE

1927

An address at Indianapolis made in conferring the 13th Spingarn medal on Anthony Overton.

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois.

The Spingarn Medal has been given to five artists, four servants of the public good and three scientists. In 1927 it is being given to a business man.

There may be those who will think that this is a turning away from the high ideal of public service which we have had in the past. We have rewarded those who seek Beauty; those who try to know Truth; and those who seek to make the Truth beautiful. When now we give this medal to one who is a business man are we not giving it to a person who has already had his reward? The reward of business is profit. Beyond that, is anything else due?

On the other hand, there may be persons who will say: "At last this 'highbrow' organization is getting down to 'brass tacks'. It is realizing that a college education is not the end-all and be-all of existence. That practical business men are furnishing the funds with which organizations like this must live, and that they deserve recognition."

Without pausing to argue truth or falsity of these positions, we may immediately say that neither of these attitudes are quite true, but they both indicate singularly enough a widely prevalent point of view. If six young persons start out upon their career, what is the object which they seek? Here is a singer. He seeks, of course, to sing songs well; or a minister: he seeks to advance religious ideals; a teacher imparts truth and searches for it. A physician trys to heal and preserve health. A lawyer contends for law and justice. All this is clear for five of our boys; but when it comes, for instance, to the grocer, we all say frankly the grocer seeks profit. We do not visualize, indeed many of us do not clearly know of any service or ideal aim which the grocer follows, except that of personal profit. Of none of the other five employments mentioned do we for a moment make so narrow an object. The singer may receive high fees, but he protests that Music is his life work. There may be physicians who will not spoil their night's rest for a call that involves no cash return; but they do not advertise this fact and continually we see physicians giving time and talent because they are "interested". If a minister is called to a church that offers a higher salary he hastens to deny that the salary in itself was the main reason of his decision. No lawyer openly advertises for the highest paying client or openly neglects the cause of a poor unfortunate litigant.

Only the grocer of this group says frankly that he is trying to make money and that the more money he makes out of the grocery business the more successful he is. If he leaves the grocery store for the dry goods business he has is regarded as having given full explanation when he says that he can "make more" in drygoods.

30-1-69

Now it is precisely in this difference of attitude and opinion as to the aims of business and the aims of art and science that indicates the trouble-spot of the modern economic world lies. For it is not true that the business man, that industrial organization renders no public service. It is only true that public opinion ignores the high value of the real service of business men and judges them by a purely artificial and dangerous standard--that is, the private income which their public service enables them to secure. This false standard is all the more dangerous because of the extraordinary opportunities of modern business. Invention, technical efficiency and discovery makes industry and business an enthralling field. A very large portion of the keenest minds, best ability, and strongest characters go into business and industry, and yet from these men and from their careers we strip or we seek to strip most of those ideals and restraints which lie around all other human services. There is no doubt of the service which the business man, the industrial leader, give to the world. They have transformed modern civilization and the only thing that makes the culture of today in any way greater than the culture of other days; the only respect in which we surpass Rome, Egypt, Babylon, is the extraordinary service of modern business in transforming raw materials, transporting goods to consumers, applying power, adopting the forces of nature and supplying regularly the multitudinous physical wants of modern men. We are right to compare this service with the service of the artist, the scientists and the worker for social uplift.

In the case of these other workers, however, the world deems their work well-rewarded if it is well done and if they have enough to sustain life in such a way that the work shall be well done. On the other hand, with the Business man, we have persuaded ourselves that the personal income which he is able to make from business transactions is his reward and we make no real attempt to proportion that reward according to the service which he renders his town, his country or mankind. Indeed if he can legally secure the income, we protect him in its enjoyment, even if he got it by gambling, robbery and murder or other actual disservice to civilization.

36-1-70

This more or less unconscious belief of the majority of thining men has put tremendous power into the hands of business men. For income is power—power over goods, over the services of men, over the size of the wages, the homes of their work and the direction and results of their work. Great income is great power. The ruling monarchs if any are are the men who control great income. Once birth and politics gave this control. Today business is the controlling power. The results are obvious. Business men rule everywhere. We find them ruling in religion: it is the business man who says today what shall be taught and believed in churches. He rules in Arts and says what may and may not be designed and painted and put in monuments. It is the leaders of industry who determine what shall be regarded as truth in the history and economics and social studies which are taught in our schools and colleges. We tried to establish democratic government in England, France, the United States and elsewhere, and we have over-limited fields of endeavor but we all know that the scope of democratic control is very small and that in the wider sphere of work and wages, income, rent, taxes, housing, streets, city and country life, health, amusements and recreation--organized industry and not democracy which rules.

So tremendous is this power of organized industry today that it transforms our ideals of right and wrong, of crime and morality. There is practically nothing that cannot be done and be called good if it returns large enough profit to the industrially doers. The result of this is a singular sense of contradiction, futility, often despair and certain unhappiness in all modern culture. Our world is wider, richer, more powerful, more spectacular than the worlds of the past, but it is illogical and unhappy, despite 5,000 years of modern conscious developments.

The reason for much of this muddle is plainly because the energy of the leading men of the world is diverted from seeking directly to serve mankind toward an endeavor to increase their incomes and consequent tremendous social power to a degree which far surpasses their knowledge or ability to use it. It is the old story of monarchs mad and mastered with power.

Many men of many nations have tried to lay bare this sore spot of modern culture in an endeavor to heal it; but of all the nations today only Russia has made a determined and frontal attack upon the profit idea. This attack has been obscured and hindered by a thousand obstacles. The Bolshevik experiment may not succeed, but even if it does not succeed it is at least a facing of a plain persistent and threatening evil which all honest minds see. Russia says to the world that the object of business and industry, just like the object of art and science, is the service of the mass of mankind; and that there is no more room for private profit in the work of an engineer or a merchant than there is in the work of a teacher or a singer. In all cases and for all human effort the chief reward and the only real reward is the service rendered. In order that this service may be of the highest value to all men, the servant surely must be able to live in health, security and reasonable comfort and for this he needs a steady and assured income. He does not need great wealth; he certainly does not need an income which will tempt him to foolishly luxurious waste at the cost of poverty, ignorance and crime for others; and above all he does not need an income which will give him irresponsable power beyond his vision or grasp. He does need food and clothes and shelter and some experience of the real beauty of living. These things need never be dear or unattainable for the average man with ordinary exertion.

36-1-72

Any attempt to realize such an ideal whether in Russia, France or America is naturally going to be fought. It is going to be fought by those people who wish to monopolize goods and the services of men for themselves regardless of the cost to others or of the public good. It is going to be fought by those otherwise unselfish persons who firmly believe that our present system of high income reward for ability is the only one suited to present human nature and that its surrender means wider distress and unhappiness than we see.

For this reason we are not only unwilling to contemplate radical economic change in our own land, but we are unwilling for Russia even to try to experiment in hers. We reel forward to increasing monopoly and concentrated wealth which continues to pile up for us new and staggering problems.

Conceive for a moment this our own land. We are rich in oil and iron, coal and water power, land and raw material. Yet the rights to and ownership of these gifts of God have so distributed as private property among the Captains of American industry that the cost of gasoline, steel, heat, electricity, cotton, wool, lumber and food are cost from twice to ten times as much to the average consumer as they would cost under a more logical and far-sighted system.

On the other hand, the income of those who have monopolized land, oil, coal and iron and of those who are monopolizing waterpower for the production of electricity reaches dimensions almost inconceivable. The power of these modern industrial Emperors surpasses anything that the ancient world dreamed of.

30-1-73

How to extricate ourselves from this situation and yet preserve to men the best and indispensable services of business and industry is the great problem of forward-looking modern men. It is not reasonable to insist that immoderate private income is the inevitable accompaniment of an incentive to successful industry. It is not logical to admit that human beings who work for the work's sake when the object is Beauty and Truth can not be induced to work for the work's sake when the object is food and clothes.

Turning now to the American Negro we find that in his business and industrial organization the colored man, while subject to all the disadvantage of a group with small incomes in a land which worships wealth and gives it all power, nevertheless, this very absence of large incomes in his business group emphasizes social service as the object of his business and industrial life. First of all, he his looked upon by his public conceived in your own mind as a benefactor. He goes into business to help his race. He appeals to his people for support on the ground that his grocery store is a public enterprise for their good. Not having a chance to enter the inner portals of income monopoly his view of business profits is less distorted and wrong; his job is still largely a place of personal service rather than of impersonal profit-making. He has no chain-stores whose success if a matter of stern figures; he is not a part of that mass production which is compelled by its very size to make people buy its goods either by propagand on an unanswerable scale or by actual physical compulsion. The Negro business man has but small place in the credit market, but, consequantly, his fifty little banks, while insignificant in Wall Street, are really places where the artisans borrow to pay for their tools or householders to buy their homes. In other words, the colored business man is nearer the service ideal, and even when his business grows to considerable size that ideal still stays in the forefront, because of public opinion and previous emphasis .

It is for this reason that we have honored Anthony Overton. We do not know and do not care what his personal income is. He appears well-clothed and well-fed, and this we are glad to see for there is not essential virtue in rags or starvation. We acclaim Anthony Overton as a public servant, who has served 12 million people well. He is a manufacturer. That is, he has used his technical knowledge in transforming certain raw materials into marketable goods, for organizing among colored men and women a knowledge, a factory where for thirty years this kind of work, which is rather rare among colored people, has been successfully carried on. His service here has been not simply the toilet articles manufactured but the employment of colored in jobs above menial service and under healthy and moral conditions. Colored boys and girls, men and women are panting for decent respectable work and this chance is worth to them almost more than bread and butter. It is this aspect of Mr. Overton's work, rather than the personal profit which he has made from it, which has caught not only the attention of the colored world but has seemed to be the main thing in his own ideals.

36-1-74

Mr. Overton, as founder of the first colored National Bank in the United States, has become a dealer in credit for colored folk and guardian of their savings. He could probably have made more profit if he had organized his bank as a state bank or as a private bank. He took considerable risk in organizing his bank under the severe laws of the National Government. He will have to wait sometime for a clientele of Negro merchants whose discount business will support a commercial bank. Nevertheless, his bank in this guise if successful is safer for colored folk in the long run and will perform a greater public service. But he went further than this. Insurance is a species of gambling. It is betting on the length of human life, and carefully distributing the losses. Science comes in to limit the element of chance as far as possible but insurance organizations do not always follow science. Large numbers of industrial insurance societies, as conducted today in the United States, are little better than legal gambling organization, pitting the vigilance of the agent against the fraud and malingering of the insured.

36-1-75

The laws of many states are very lax on the subject. But there are certain states, and notably the state of New York, where the laws surrounding insurance organizations, while not perfect, are yet so carefully drawn that the business of insurance is compelled to become under a fairly scientific and honest method of distributing losses caused by death and sickness. Because of these strict laws very few insurance organizations have been able or willing to qualify under the Insurance Department of New York and not a single Negro insurance organization had thus qualified until the Victory Life Insurance Company, under Anthony Overton, was admitted last year. Other colored organizations are preparing to follow shortly but this initial step is worthy of attention and reward. I have no doubt that there are other colored insurance organizations that are making more money than the Victory Life and able to distribute larger profit, but the service which the Victory Life has done to colored America by submitting to this raising of the standard of its operations is a great and true one. And it is for this service that the Spingarn Medal for the year 1926 goes to the President of the Victory Life Insurance Company.

36-1-76

For this service; and for more than this: for the keeping and raising of an ideal of industrial organi zation and business among American Negroes; for making them realize that what they look upon as a certain business handicap today; their exclusion for reasons of racial prejudice from "Big" business; from mass production and from Wall Street, may be after all to their great and singular advantage. It may preserve in them the ideal of business as a public service; of the grocer, the merchant, the manufacturer, the Captain of Industry, as a public servant whose success is measured, not by his private profit but by the prosperity and happiness of his race. If this can be made true today among twelve million Americans today, without revolution, without war and bloodshed, without hate and discrimination, it may be made true tomorrow among a hundred million of their white fellow citizens and among two million beings living on earth today.

(Spingarn Medal Address) [1927]

[1926]

The Spingarn Medal has been given to five artists, four servants of the public good and three scientists. Tonight it is being given to a businessman and there may be those who are thinking if this is not a turning away from the high ideal of public service which we have had in the past. We have rewarded those who seek beauty; those who try to know truth; and those who seek to make the truth beautiful. When now we give this medal to one who is a business-man are we not giving it to a businessman who has had his reward. The reward of business is profit. Beyond that, is anything else due?

On the other hand, there may be persons who will say at least this highbrow organization is getting down to brass tacks. It is realizing that a college education is not the end-all and be-all of existence. That practical businessmen are furnishing the funds with which organizations like this must live, and that they deserve recognition. Neither of these attitudes are quite true, but they do indicate singularly enough a widely prealent point of view. If six young persons start out upon their career, what is the object which they seek? Here is a singer. He seeks, of course, to sing songs well, Or a minister; hE seeks spiritual uplift. A teacher searches for truth. A physician trys to heal. A lawyer contends for justice. But when it comes, for instance, to the grocer, we say frankly the grocer seeks profit. We do not visualize , indeed many of us do not know of any service or ideal aim which the grocer follows except that of personal profit. Of none of the other five employment mentioned did we for a moment make so narrow an object. The singer may receive hugh fees, but he protests that music is his life work. There may be physicians who will not spoil their night's rest for a call that involves no cash return, but they do not advertise this fact. If a minister is called to a church that offers a higher salary he denies that the salary in itself has anything to do with his decision. No lawyer openly advertises for the highest paying client, although in truth he does not ignore large fees. Only the grocer says frankly that he is trying to make money and that the more money he makes out of the grocery business the more successful he is. If he leaves the grocery for the drygoods business he has given full explanation when he says that he can make more in drygoods.

34-220

Now it's precisely in this difference of attitude and opinion that the trouble-spot of the modern economic world lies. This is a world ruled today by the profit-makers. A very large portion of the keenest minds, best ability, and strongest characters go into business and industry, and yet from these men and from their careers we strip or we seek to strip most of those ideals and restraints which lie around all other human services. There is no doubt of the service which the businessmen, the industrial leader, give to the world. They have transformed modern civilization and the only thing that makes the culture of today in any way greater than the culture of other days; of Rome, of Egypt, of Babylon, is the extraordinary service of modern business in transforming raw materials and transporting it to consumers, in applying power, adopting the forces of nature and supplying the multitudinous wants of modern men. This service compares with, although it does not excell, the service of the artist, the scientist, and the worker for social uplift. But in the case of these other workers the world deems their work well rewarded if it is well done and if they have enough to sustain life in a simple and reasonable way. On the other hand, with the business men, we have persuaded ourselves that the personal profit which they are able to make from business transactions is their reward and that they have a right to this reward whether their actual service to mankind is great or small, and whether the reward is portioned to the importance and value of their service. This more or less unconscious belief of the majority of thinking men has put tremendous power into the hands of the profiteers, so that today we find them ruling in religion. It is the business men who say what shall be taught and believed in churches. They rule in arts. It is the leaders of industry who determine what shall be regarded as truth in the history and economics of social studies which are taught in our schools and colleges. We pretend to have established democratic government in England, France, United States and elsewhere, and yet we all know that the scope of democratic control is very small and that in the wider sphere of work and wages, income, rent, taxes, housing, streets, city and country life and the -- -- in these matters it is business and not democracy which rules. So tremendous is this power of organized industry today that it transforms our ideals of right and wrong, of crime and morality. There is practically nothing that cannot be done and be called good if it returns large enough profit to the organized doer. England promises the natives of South Africa that their land shall be taken from them. But when it becomes profitable for the Union of South African to take native lands the land is taken. Europe promises to regard the independence of Egypt, but when it is profitable to make Egypt a subject country Egypt's independence goes. Murder on every scale from p---- organizations in South Africa to world wars are carried on to promote or protect the profits of great industrial organizations.

34-2-21

34-2-22

The result of all this is a singular amount of unhappiness in a world which logically has been trying for at least five thousand years if not much longer to be happy. Our realization of beauty; of increased health; and our wide code of the truth and our organizations for serving the physical wants of men. All these things leave the mass of unhappiness and distress. And the reason of this is plainly because the energy of the leading men of the world are so far diverted from seeking to save mankind to an endeavor to increase their personal and consequent tremendous social power which arises from them. Many men in many nations have tried to attack this sore spot in an endeavor to heal it, but of all the nations today only Russia has made a determined and fatal attack upon the profit idea. This attack may not succeed, but even if it does not succeed it is is at least a f---- facing of the trouble. Russia says to the world that the object of business and industry, just like the object of art and science, is the service of the mass of mankind and that there is no more room for private profit in the work of an engineer or a merchant than there is in the work of a teacher or a singer. In all cases and for all human effort the chief reward and the only real reward is the service rendered. In order that this service may be of the highest value to all men the servant must be able to live in health, security and reasonable comfort and for this he needs a steady and assured income. He does not need great wealth; he does not need an income which will tempt him to waste; he does not need an income which will give him irresponsive power. He does need food and clothes and shelter and some experience of the beauty of living. Any attempt to realize such an ideal is naturally going to be faught. It is going to be faught by those people who wish to monopolize the services of man for themselves or for their friends, or for those whom the designate, rather than to have those services distributed according to the public will. Monopoly therefore, is the central idea of modern profiteering. We see its results all about us. Here is a country rich with oil and iron, coal and waterpower, yet these things have been and are being more dealt with and manipulated than the price of gasoline and steel, or heat and electricity, and is cast at high and sometimes almost prohibited prices to the mass of men, while on the other hand, the fortunes of those who have monopolized oil, coal and iron and of those who are monopolizing waterpower for the production of electricity reaches dimensions almost inconceivable. Back of these modern industrial Emperors surpasses anything that the ancient world dreamed of. How to extradicate ourselves from this situation is the great problem of forward-looking modern men. It is not reasonable to say that swollen private profit is the inevitable accompaniment of successful industry. It is not logical to admit that human beings who work for work sake when the object is beauty and truth can not be induced to work for work sake when the object is food and clothes.

34-2-23

Turning now to the American Negro we find that the colored business man has escaped, or rather not yet inherited the worse results of modern business. First of all, he is looked upon by the public ---- conceived in your own mind as a benefactor. He goes into business to help his race. He appeals to his people for support on the ground that his grocery store is a public enterprize for their good. Not having a chance to enter the inner portals of monopoly his view of business profits is less distorted and wrong; his job is still largely a place of personal service rather than the impersonal profit-making of the chain store. He is not a part of that mass production which is compelled to make people buy, either by propaganda on an unanswerable scale or actual physical compulsion. The Negro businessman has but small place in the credit market and consequently his fifty little banks, while insignificant in Wall Street, are really places where the artisians borrows to pay for his tools or the householder borrows to buy his home. In other words, the colored businessman is nearer the service ideal, and even when his business grows to considerable size that ideal still stays in the forefront.

Now it is for this reason that we are honoring Anthony Overton tonight. He is a manufacturer. That is, he has used his knowledge of technique in transforming ----- raw materials into marketable goods, to teach among colored men and women a knowledge of this kind of work which is rather rare among colored people. He has thus become an employer of colored labor and has given persons who otherwise would have been compelled to work in distasteful menial service or in unhealthy and unmoral jobs, a chance to decent and cleanly and self-respecting work. And it is this aspect of his ----- work, rather than the percentage which he has made from it, which has caught not only the attention of the colored world but has been the main thing in his own ideals. Mr. Anthony, as founder of the first colored National Bank in the United States has become a dealer in credit for colored folk. He could probably have made more profit if he had organized his bank as a state bank or as a private bank. He took considerable risk in organizing his bank under the severe laws of the National Government. He will have to wait sometime for a clientele of Negro merchants whose discount probably will support a commercial bank. Nevertheless, his bank in this guise is safer for colored folk and performs a greater public service. But he went further than this. Insurance is a species of gambling. It is betting on the length of human life, and carefully distributing the losses. Science comes in to take the element of chance away as far as possible but insurance organizations do not always follow science. Large numbers of industrial insurance societies as conducted today in the United States are little better than gambling organizations. The laws of many states are very lax on the subject. But there are certain states and notably the state of New York where the laws surrounding insurance organizations, while not perfect, are yet so carefully drawn that the business of insurance becomes under them much less a gambling operation and much more a scientific method of distributing losses. Because of these strick laws very few insurance organizations have been able to qualify under the Insurance Department of New York and not a single Negro insurance organization has thusq qualified until the Victory Life Insurance Company, under Anthony Overton, was admitted last year. I have no doubt that there are other colored insurance organizations that are making more money than the Victory Life and able to distribute larger profit, but the service which the Victory Life has dome to colored America by submitting to this raising of the standard of its operations is a great one. And it is for this service that the Spingarn Medal for 1926 goes to the President of the Victory Life Insurance Company.

34-2-25

34-2-26

For this service, and for more than this, for the raising of an ideal of industrial organization and business among Negroes, for making them realize that what they look upon as a handicape today; their exclusion from bank business; from mass production and from Wall Street, may be after all to their great and singular advantage. It may preserve in them the ideal of business as a public service; of the grocer, the merchant, the manufacturer, the Captain of Industry, as a public servant whose success is measured, not by his private power record, but by the prosperity and happiness of his race. If this can be made throughmong twelve million Americans today, without resolution, without war and bloodshed, without history and recrimination, it may be made true among a hundred million of their fellow citizens and among a thousand million human beings living on earth today.

36-2-161

~~losing over that campaign? After all, what do you really care about it? We have talked about it. We have said various things about who might be the candidates and who might not.~~ But who, coming from another planet and looking upon this world and seeing this greatest experiment in democracy, would for a moment think that the people of the United States were performing the greatest task of their political career? Now, if you say, "We are not interested in political questions, in the kind of thing which is going to be settled in these next few days," surely that would not be so. But you discount the whole thing. You know that after all it is a piece of political claptrap.

Do you know that throughout the Middle West and the South there has come a crisis in the ownership of the land, and in the way agriculture is being conducted; that we are on the way toward changing the whole thing which we thought of as the ideal of America, where each family had its piece of land? We are coming to the place where we are establishing a landless peasantry, and unless something is done to change the trend of things, we are going to have a new economic crisis in the very country where free land was once the greatest thing that distinguished it from other lands.

Not only that - but we have questions like that of liquor. But it is not the real question we are debating. We are laughing at the thing. We are not thinking of the problem of regulating one of those great appetites which the world has known almost from the beginning.

Or if we talk of the regulation of wealth: There was a time when, if it had been said this country was ruled by organized wealth

you would have had on the one hand the proselytes of those who would so believe and on the other hand a denial from all sources that any such thing could happen. Today we hear it and know it and do nothing about it, and we do not suppose that the political campaign is going to do anything.

We are on the verge of the greatest industrial crisis the world has ever seen. What are we doing? Nothing.

We have seen the labor movement, a labor movement to which you are heirs; which has shortened the hours of labor; which has brought capital and labor together in a great fist-fight. What is the condition? There never has been a time in the history of the United States when the labor movement was in a more precarious condition, when the organized forces of the labor movement counted for less; and yet do we expect this political campaign is going to have anything to do with it? We do not.

36-2-162

We have the great question as to how far this country is going to interfere with other countries which are trying to (?)

Here are all these questions in front of us, and yet we know perfectly well that the presidential campaign before us is not the campaign which is to settle these questions. In the first place, not one of you know what the attitude of the leading candidates who are now going to be put before you is toward any one of these questions. You do not know and do not care. You have not asked them. They have kept silence and you have let them keep silence because in your heart of hearts you know perfectly well there is something wrong with all democracy in the United States; and if you do not know that that is true, you are exceptions, because the people of the United States who think that is true have proven it. They have proven it by this very easy test:

If you take the election of 1920 - and I take this because it is the only one in twenty years when we knew the exact number of people who voted. If you count the number of people twenty-one years of age and over and compare that with the number of people who voted, there are two states in the United States where over ninety per cent of the people who could vote did not vote. In Australia ninety per cent of the voters voted and they are talking about asking the other ten per cent what is the matter. In the United States there are two states where over ninety per cent did not go to the polls. There are four other states where eighty to ninety per cent did not go to the polls. There are twelve states - and they include California - where a majority of the voters did not go to the polls. Why?

36-2-163

If we look at the number of people who voted in the United States in 1920 and in 1924 - and the same thing will happen in 1928 - not more than one in three of those who had the right to vote did vote. Why? They say, "What is the use of voting? Why should you throw away your time to go to the polls?" And yet, on the other hand, here is the greatest experiment in democratic control that the world has ever essayed.

And yet the United States is governed. You have your police, your organization of government. Any stranger coming from Mars would say,"This is a country mostly of law and order. If it is governed and not democratically, how is it governed?" It is singular the amount of muddle that exists on that one single question. You say that the United States is a democracy. You know it is not. When the United States makes a failure in democracy, immediately you put it down to democracy. You should on the contrary put it down to the credit of those who are ruling the United States. You should, of all things, think clearly in this matter of governmrnt.

30-2-164

It may be that in the world we have come to the time when we are going to give up the democratic experiment, when we are going to say and say frankly that we are not going to let the masses of the people have a voice in their own government; that we are going to put the control of the country into the hands of those people who extend credit to other people; and those people are men of ability, men of large experience in governing because they are governing most of the world. The only point is that if we are going to do that, let us, after clearly thinking it out, put it at the door of the bankers who are governing the world and not call it a government of democracy.

But here in the United States we know that the reason some of these people did not go to the polls was because they were kept from going to the polls. And yet, if we want to discuss that question, immediately people say you had better not discuss that. I wrote to five of the greatest editors of the United States three months ago and laid before them some of the facts I am laying before you. I said, "On the eve of the campaign is it not time to discuss certain fundamental questions of disfranchisement and democracy?" One editor wrote back, "It is a tremendous question, a question which some time must be taken up; but we cannot take it up now." There were too many questions which were not tremendous which prevented him. There is the question of disfranchisement in the South and there is the Gentlemen's Agreement that that question is not to be taken up, or if it is taken up it is waived away in that masterly manner used by Senator Swanson of Virginia.

36-2-165

Now, when any great mass of people are faced by millions of ignorant and shiftless voters they have got to protect themselves. The question as to how they are going to protect themselves is a matter for debate. Charles Sumner suggested a way, but the United States would not accept that way. The South suffered. Whether it suffered more from war or from ignorant voters I have not the time to say; but sufferings from war are a great deal greater than any which come from ignorance.

It is fifty years since we enfranchised the Negro; a generation since the South disfranchised him. The question is, how far has the South disfranchised the ignorant and the shiftless. I am not going to take all the Southern States but refer to one or two. There is the State of Louisiana. Louisiana has among its citizens, those who can read and write and are twenty-one years of age, 400,000 white people and 130,000 colored people - those who can read and write and are ~~xxxx~~ twenty-one years of age. Moreover, if we take the colored population of Louisiana, we find that they are not shiftless. Of those ten years of age and over, eighty per cent are in gainful occupations. This does not include the women. It does not include the children who are in school. That means, of course, that practically all the Negroes of Louisiana are at work. There are in that population 164,000 farmers, 53,000 people in manufacturing and mechanical industries, 22,000 in transportation, nearly 7,000 merchants, 2,000 in the public service, 33,000 in the professions. They own 1,000 farms and in addition to that 30,000 homes. I do not know, and no one knows, the exact extent of their ownership of property but it must be nearly twenty-five millions. Out of those people there are 130,000 who can read and write, and how many voted? 980. That is the way in the State of Louisiana they have disfranchised the shiftless and the ignorant.

31-9-2

I will take one part of Alabama in which you ought to be interested -Macon County, where Tuskegee is. They said, if you will treat us fairly, we will give up politics. In Macon County, Alabama, they took that proposition at its face value. There are in Macon County today 4,927 Negroes who can read and write, who are twenty-one years of age and over, and out of that 4,927, twenty-two can vote.

There are in Mississippi 290,000 Negroes who can read and write and who are twenty-one years of age and over, and of these, 850 are allowed the vote. Most of the white people of the United States say when you speak of these things, "That is too bad. We sympathize with you." We hasten to accept that sympathy, but we also hasten to say that this speech tonight is not about the way in which colored people suffer from disfranchisement but the way in which white people suffer. For instance, suppose we take the South, the whole of it excepting Missouri. In the former slave states there has been, between 1870 and 1920, an increase of population amounting to two hundred per cent. There has been an increase in the voting amounting to 131 per cent. Now, when you remember the Nineteenth Amendment you will realize that the number of voters ought to have increased 400 per cent. They increased 131 per cent. Why did the number of voters lag behind. The cause is Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina. I might include some other states but take simply those five. In those states you have, between 1870 and 1920, a population increase from 4,500,000 to 10,500,000 and in those states the number of voters have decreased from 660,000 to 640,000, in spite of the Nineteenth Amendment. In other words, if you take away from the votes cast in those states those cast by Negroes you have this situation:

31-9-3

There were 5,150,000 persons twenty-one years of age and over. Out of those, 640,000 voted. There was disfranchisement, and it could not be all Negroes because they were not all Negroes. In other words, you have disfranchised in those states 2,200,000 black men and also 2,300,000 white men. It has been said that if you put a man into the gutter and there is any manhood in him, it is going to take at least one man to keep him down there, and that is what has happened in the South, only a hundred thousand more.

If I say white people are disfranchised in the South, you will be skeptical about it. Therefore, I am not going to take my own testimony or the testimony of any colored man. Read what Mr. Anderson said at the University of Virginia:

(Insert)

We see, then, that the disfranchisement of Negroes has something to do with the white population of the South being disfranchised, too. But there are people who are not altogether cast down to the depths of sorrow if something happens to the white South. They say, "After all, they got about what they deserved." But there again the thing that has happened has not confined itself to the white South. It is coming up to visit the West and the North and the East, and it is visiting these parts of the country with a vengeance.

The Thirteenth Amendment is sometimes forgotten. Of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments I have been speaking. Of the Eighteenth Amendment it is scarcely necessary for me to speak. But have you forgotten there is a Nineteenth Amendment, and do you remember that the women of the South are practically just as much disfranchised as before the Amendment was passed and don't dare open their mouths lest the colored women become enfranchised. It is a question of the nullification of the Nineteenth Amendment, too; and it does not stop there. Because you can imagine in a democracy democratic principles being overthrown and the power being put into the hands of a few men; but that has not happened in the United States. What you have in the United States is that the power still, supposedly, rests with the masses of the people, but the right to exercise it has been taken by a few men. There was a time when the Negroes of the South counted as only three-fifths. Today they count as full men, but the power of these disfranchised Negroes is being exercised by the white politicians; also the power of those

31-9-4

2,300,000 white people. The power of all those 5,000,000 people is being voted into the hands of a few men. What is the result? It is simply astonishing; and it is no credit to the intelligence, or so-called intelligence of all the people of America that they apparently think nothing about it.

In Mississippi, it takes 10,000 voters to elect a Congressman; in California, it takes 86,000 voters to elect a Congressman. Is that because the people of Mississippi have eight times the brains and ability and sense of the people of California? I will leave that for Los Angeles to answer. In Virginia it takes 23,000 people to elect a Congressman, but in Maine it takes 50,000. In Oklahoma it takes 60,000. In Washington it takes 70,000. In Illinois it takes 77,000. In West Virginia it takes 83,000. In Indiana it takes 97,000.

31-9-5

That is the reason people lose faith in democracy. They say what is the use of going to the polls and trying to settle anything when one man throws ten votes in your face and you are waddling along with one.

Suppose a million voters started out to the polls, for instance, in the Pacific States. If one million voters cast their votes, they elect twelve Congressmen. If a million voters in the Middle West cast their votes they elect thirteen Congressmen. If a million voters in New England cast their votes they elect sixteen Congressmen. But if a million voters put on their long coats and high hats and walk to the polls in the South they elect forty-five Congressmen. Here you have the way in which democracy has been turned all out of shape by disfranchisement in the South.

But it goes farther. You in California and the people in the Middle West have the childish feeling that if you do not like the old party you can vote for a third party. Well, you can if you want to throw your vote away. There is no chance for a third party to succeed. You saw it all when the Republican Party was born. That was before the Negro was enfranchised and when he counted as only three-fifths of a man.

There are 331 electoral votes. Of those there are 124 which are sewed up and cast solid. You have no appeal to those votes. You have no political campaign to change those votes. They cannot be changed because the disfranchised people who are back of those votes have no voice even with regard to those votes. They are cast by the politicians of the South. Now, without those 124 votes what can you do? Suppose we assume that in the United States twelve electoral votes are cast. Then, what the solid South means is that of those twelve electoral votes there are three whose casting is predestined. No appeal can be made to them. You may think that after all that makes very little difference. You appeal to the other nine votes and by a political revolution you get the people in the North and West to vote for you. What is the result? It takes the four votes plus the three votes to make seven, and you are beaten seven to five. And if the third party people have not counted up that very insimple piece of arithmetic they are just in for losing sleep and money, because so long as disfranchisement exists in the South you can do nothing.

31-9-6

You may say, "Why not appeal to the South?" No man can be nominated by the Democratic Party without those three votes. No forward-looking program can come. What is the use of appealing to the solid South with regard to disfranchisement? That is the very thing that holds the Negro in his place. You must keep the Negro in his place.

What is the use of talking about peace in the world when as a matter of fact the world has got to guard itself in order to keep all the darker nations where they belong? What is the use of trying for the overthrow of imperialism while you are doing in Haiti and Nicarauga the same thing you are doing in Mississippi and Georgia? When it comes to national peace and interracial understanding, you cannot have it, for if you do you will oveethrow the solid South.

31-9-7

This leaves you and me as representing the colored people and those white people who are willing to work with us, as the only group in the United States that proposes to stand up for real democracy, for a return to the thing that people had thoughts of in the days gone by. Nay, more than that. Throughout the world we have got to face the fact that it is the colored peoples in the world that are fighting for democracy today, and it is the white people that are standing for reaction and oligarchy and against those colored peoples, who are saying every single word that they used to say to the fathers and grandfathers of the colored people in the United States, England and France - that they want things they cannot handle.

Nevertheless, the greatest fact in the world is that the colored world is fighting for democracy.

---

undated

THE SOCIALIST PARTY AND THE NEGRO.

W. E. B. Du Bois

The first impulse of a Socialist is to express surprise that the Socialist Party in America has so little support from American Negroes. They attribute this to the stupidity and backwardness of an undeveloped people who are not acquainted with the modern labor movement. This, however, is snap judgment. It would be well for those who wish for the widest success of the labor movement in the United States and for the advance of the movement toward the socialization of wealth and income to consider very carefully the historical relations of the labor movement in the United States and the American Negro.

The labor movement was imported into the United States by immigrant laborers, and these laborers from the earliest times found the Negro slave and freedmen as a competitor and tool in the hands of the capitalist. Instead, however, of taking the part of the Negro and helping him toward physical and economic freedom, the American labor movement from the beginning has tried to achieve freedom at the expense of the Negro. The Civil War was the attempt of white laborers in the United States to get Western land and higher wages by confining Negroes to slavery and the South. This meant that the Negro before and after emancipation in self-defense was propelled toward the employing class and the employing class was quick to take advantage of this. The white employers, North and South, literally gave the Negroes work when white men refused to work with him; when he "scabbed" for bread and butter the employers defended him against mob violence of white laborers; they gave him educational institutions, when white labor would have left him in ignorance; and even when the full-fledged Socialist movement came, the Socialists were afraid to make a direct appeal to the Negro vote because such an appeal would have militated against their chances of attracting white labor, North and South.

So long, therefore, as the logic of the Socialist appeal was simply justice to black workers, it played a comparatively small part. Everybody is in favor of justice so long as it costs them no effort. But today matters are changing. Today the denial of economic justice to Negroes by white laborers is beginning to make justice to white labor impossible. Not only is the Negro vote growing, but any successful appeal to the labor vote, North or South, must be based upon the breaking down of the artificial power which the white employing South has gained by disfranchising of white and black laborers. The effect of this disfranchisement in the United States upon the labor vote is exactly the same as the similar system in the German Reichstag before the war, and in England before the Reform Bills. So long as states like South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi can be absolutely manipulated by the political power of reactionary capitalists and big landholders, just so long the chance of any Third Party, labor or Socialist, is practically nill. This has been manifested in the last three elections; and the appeal for justice which the black laborer is making today is not simply an appeal for charity; it is an appeal to white workingmen to stop cutting off their own noses to spite their faces.

38-13-156

The sooner the Socialist Party braves the artificially encouraged race prejudice of white laborers in the South and comes out in speech and platform for Democracy despite color, and for economic justice despite race prejudice, the sooner will the Socialist Party begin to grow on solid foundations. This can only be done against the suggestion of a great many prominent Socialists. One has only to search the utterances of the platforms of the Socialist Party concerning the Negro laborer to find how little has been said concerning the disfranchisement of half the laboring class in the South which carries with it the practical disfranchisement of the other half. The Socialist platform of 1928 had a clear statement against disfranchisement but it was not developed and made as logical and prominent as it deserved.

The Negro today is growing in intelligence. His political power is growing. He is going to use it in no sentimental way. If American socialism cannot stand for the American Negro, the American Negro will not stand for American socialism. On the other hand, if frankly and wholeheartedly the Socialist Party stands for the rights of men in America despite race and color, and if the Negroes in larger and larger number recognize that their salvation not only in the United States, but the West Indies and Africa is through public ownership of capital and the socialization of income, they will gradually see in the Socialist Party of America their next political step.

38-13-157

(1929)

HAITI

Discussion at the Foreign Policy Association, December 21, 1929.

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois, Editor of THE CRISIS.

When Columbus discovered the island of San Domingo, there were over a million Indians there. It is said by some authorities that only 153 of them were left in 1545. This began the orgy of robbery, slavery and oppression which has followed the history of this beautiful but unhappy island. Buccaneers, slave raiders, and organized industry based on slavery, followed. It is probable that at least two million black slaves were tossed into this island during the 17th and 18th Centuries. Yet, only a million were left in 1791.

The island is nearly the size of Ireland, or a little smaller than the state of Maine. It became a harbor of freebooters, and then England, Spain and France fought for it. Finally, by the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697, the western part of the island became French. This is the part known as Haiti. At its present extent, it has about ten thousand square miles, being a little larger than New Hampshire and a little smaller than the Netherlands.

Here, an astonishing drama of human history has been played. At the end of the 18th Century, there were three classes of people in Haiti: Forty thousand whites, with much unacknowledged Negro blood, five hundred thousand blacks, and twenty-eight thousand mixed bloods. About 17,000 of these people of mixed blood were nominally free and because of the inter-marriage of whites and blacks, had, in some cases, inherited property and received a liberal education in France. They owned in 1791, one-third of the land and one-fourth of the slaves. Among the five hundred thousand slaves was one element which must not be forgotten: They were the slaves, who had revolted and maintained themselves in the mountains. They were known, here, as in Jamaica as Maroons. These Maroons maintained their freedom and their African customs and they spoke a language which was African and French and known as Creole.

47-4-2

When the French Revolution came in 1789, both the white masters and the colored freedmen, sought to be represented. The white masters sought home rule; the colored freedmen sought enfranchisement and the right to share home rule with the whites. The result was a Civil War between the whites and the mulatto freedmen, precipitated by the public crucifixion of two of the mulatto leaders under circumstances of revolting cruelty.

In the midst of this, on the night of October 22, 1791, five hundred thousand black slaves took the oath of blood in the forests and rose. They drove the white folk into the sea and murdered them by every method of cruelty. Uniting with the mulattoes and helped by the fever, they overcame Spanish, French and British armies, and finally, January 1, 1804, proclaimed the second republic upon the American continent.

It was a desperate venture. The civilized world almost to a man was united against them. The United States of American refused to recognize them for sixty years. France waited thirty years and then recognized them only on condition that they pay her an indemity of $30,000,000, which was probably three times Haiti's total annual exports at the time.

There ensued a struggle of survival for 115 years. Ten of these years were under African chieftains; fifty years under monarchs; ten years under Presidents for life; and forty-five years under Presidents for a term of years.

Underlying the whole economic development was this often forgotten fact: from the beginning, the Haitians had free access to the soil. There were no landless peasants. There were no peons. From the time of Toussaint down to today, the Haitian laborer was independent because of his practical ownership of the soil.

During the first ten years, Haiti was ruled by chieftains whose power rested on African religion and clan communism. Their duty was to defend Haiti from white aggressors and this Toussaint and Dessalines and Christophe did.

The next effort of Haiti was to turn this chieftainship into a monarchy, which would gain the recognition of the states of the world. They did not dare give up concentration of power, and the old Maroon spirit did not allow them to accept permanently a hereditary monarchy. For fifty years, they strove under kings and emperors to achieve independence and union. And this, by 1869, they accomplished.

In the next ten years, in 1859 to 1869, presidents for life were elected, but the steady pressure of the country was to change the monarchy so as to have presidents elected for a term of years. This was accomplished by 1870. Up to that time, 70 years, only two rulers of Haiti had been killed in office: one chieftain and one life president.

The next forty-five years were the critical years for Haitian development and the years by which she can best be judged. We may divide this time into thirty-eight years of good government, and seven years of bitter factional strife. From 1870 to 1908, Haiti had a succession of eleven presidents in thirty-eight years. None of them were killed in office. Two of them were driven out; three resigned, and one died a natural death.

They accomplished many things for Haiti: the first one, from 1870 to 1874, established order and brought about financial reforms. He was followed for two years by a reactionary, who was driven out. And then came a succession of excellent rulers: from 1876 to 1879, there was a good government in which the claims of foreign nations were adjusted. From 1879 to 1888 under Salomon, there was banking reform; the indemnity to Franch was finally paid, and Haiti entered the Postal Union. From 1889 to 1895, Hyppolite built market halls and Custom Houses and other public buildings, and established water works. From 1895 to 1902, a retroprocity treaty with France and a natralization treaty with the United States were made; and the centenary of Haitian independence was celebrated. This brings us down to 1908.

47-47

But during the latter part of the administration of these six forward-looking, and on the whole, progressive presidents, disaster loomed in the horizon and that disaster arose from the industrial and financial imperialism of modern civilized nations. The history of the agression of foreign nations upon Haiti would make a lecture in itself. It began with France; itwas carried on by Spain, and was almost continuous with England; it reached curious culmination with Germany in 1902; and of all the claimants and aggressors, the United States was foremost.

One can only contrast the thirty-eight years, on the whole, of progressive government between 1870-1908, with the terrible years from 1908 to 1915, to see the results of this outward pressure and aggression. Former aggression had tried the physical possession of Haiti, but the aggression of 1908 to 1915 took a sudden and more familiar form. It was a matter of debts and claims; of banking and finance; of concessions and commerce. Six times in these years, the United States made open and pressing demand to take charge of Haitian Custom Houses. This had been preceded by pin-pricks and insults. In one case, an American gunboat, unloaded a gun in a Haitian port and limbered it up, and the excuse was that the Captain wanted to see how long it would take. Haitian generosity and humanitarism was held against it. Eight hundred Haitians saved the American army at Savannah during the American Revolution. The fact was never mentioned. In 1815, the Haitians gave asylum to Bolivar, during his abortive efforts to emancipate South America. He dared not acknowledge it. The abolition of slavery in Haiti by the blacks was for a half century looked upon as a menace and threat to the slave-holding United States, and yet the victory of Toussaint L'Ouverture over Napoleon gave to the United States for a song all of Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Wyoming, Montana and the Dakotas, most of Colorado and Minnesota, and all of Washington and Oregon. In the seven years, from 1908 to 1915, when the pressure of foreign governments and bribery of commercial interests stirred every sort of discord in Haiti, it was impossible for the Haitian nation to proceed in its development of internal order. In these years, there were seven men who tried to seize the presidency, and of these, three were killed in the attempt; nor in other words, more presidents were killed in these seven years than in the whole preceeding 108 years of Haitian independence. Indeed, before 1908, Haiti had a perfect right to say, that as compared with the United States and France, her presidential office had been as safe as theirs.

47-4-6

Even in those years of turmoil, Haiti was careful to accomplish the almost impossible feat of maintaining inviolate her relations with foreigners and foreign governments. She was paying her debts; no foreigner was molested or insulted in her country; it was possible to walk unarmed and unattended from one end of the island to the other and be treated with the utmost courtesy. She maintained the beginnings of a system of education, and she could point to accomplishment in literature, art and science, recognized and well-thought of by European critics for a century and more.

Notwithstanding this, there were things happening in the world that meant, not simply damnation to Haiti, but almost the overthrow of all civilization. In these early years of the 20th Century, the Devil's broth of the World War was brewing. White imperialism was preparing for the final liquidation of the colored world. Asia, Africa and the islands of the sea, were going to be ruled by the great white nations for those nations' private profit. China was to be divided; agitation in India was to be put down by strong hand, and final division of Africa was planned.

Here, of course, there were difficulties, and difficulties that led straight to war. There was the trouble of France in Morocco; there were Italy and England waiting for the death of Menelik of Abyssinia; there was the question of the future of the Portuguese colonies, and the scandals in the Congo, and other matters. Nevertheless, agreements then seemed possible in all these cases. In the matter of Liberia, the thing was practically settled, and although Germany and France and England were in dispute, England in 1908 had all her plans laid to seize the country.

The United States had definitely entered on her career of imperialism; her foreign possessions increased in these early years of the century from 595,000 square miles to 716,000 square miles. We were building and preparing to defend the Panama Canal, and especially were we suspicious of England. We were waiting for Revolution to hand us over a part of Mexico, if not of Central America, and in this whole turmoil the fall of Haiti eventually was a foregone conclusion.

Then things began to go awry. The leading nations with their four million soldiers and their great navies could not agree. To the surprise of the world, Japan overthrew Russian imperialism. The Chinese Revolution developed, agitation increased in India; the United States interfered in Liberia; the Mexicans refused to commit suicide, and the only way, as War bur st upon the world, for the United States to further her plans and protect herself against England, which she expected then to fight, was to seize Haiti.

The result was a series of demands; a series of claims, wholesale bribery by Germans, English and Americans, the seizure of Haitian funds by a United States battleship, and the overthrow of free institutions in Haiti at the point of the bayonet.

Having seized Haiti, what have we done there? With ourselves as chief creditor, we have distributed to ourselves and other creditors Haitian revenues for the payment of her debts, admitting any claim that had the slightest color of validity. Thus, she has been saddled with a funded debt which will keep her in economic slavery to the United States for many generations.

47-4-8

2. We have built roads. They are chiefly military roads, designed for the rapid transfer of Marines and troops and built with scarcely any idea of the development of the Haitian peasantry.

3. In education, we have only attempted to educate an agricultural peasantry. This, with our policy of opening a way for the gradual seizure of the land from the peasants, will make the establishment of peonage in Haiti an easier thing. Meantime, we have done nothing to overcome the widespread illiteracy in a country where the problem of teaching is complicated by the fact that the mass of the people do not speak a modern language.

4. We have introduced measures of sanitation, partly for the benefit of the people of Haiti, but more for the protection of the conquerors, who are living there.

In all these measures, we have ignored and insulted and refused to use the educated leaders of the Haitian people. On the contrary, we have tried to drive a widge between the peasantry and these leaders, and the result is, that we have been unable to accomplish a single real forward step, either toward self-government or essential social uplift. Instead of remembering that the independence of the Haitian peasantry and its fight for democracy is the greatest asset of this country, we have, at the same time, tried to displace its natural leaders by foreigners, who disfranchise them, and whose attitude they quickly realize. A large proportion of these foreigners come from Louisiana. If Louisiana has any civilization to spare, she should use it at home. The state is one of the most illiterate in the United States; it has lynched nine hundred persons in the last twenty years; it has been repeatedly swept by mobs and lawlessness. With the best intentions in the world, no white man, born and trained in Louisiana, is fit to attempt the social uplift of Negroes.

Under such circumstances, there is only one decent thing for the United States to do, and that is to withdraw from Haiti as quickly and as decently as the withdrawal can be planned. If the United States does not do this, it will be because of the fact that the nation is willing to do to Negroes what it would never consent to do to white people. And this attitude toward Negroes and decent people surviving the World War is going to be an incentive to further wars; not simply of friction between white and colored people, but on account of jealousy between the white people who are seeking to exploit colored labor. Moreover, this exploitation of colored labor yields such profit that the funds accumulated can be used and are used to defeat the ends of democracy in white countries, like the United States and and England and France. We are facing here a question much larger than the freedom of two million black folk in Haiti.

01-4-44

[HAITI]

There are three questions I should like to ask Mr. Cumberland:

1. Does he know of any case where an American employee of the Haitian Finance Department was reprimanded by the American Department of State for gambling in Haitian bonds?

2. Since the consolidation of the office of the Receiver General and the Finance Department is there any check upon Haitian expenditures, except that kept by the National City Bank?

3. Does he know, and if so, can he explain any discrepancy between the gross income, as reported by the Haitian Finance Department, and that reported to the United States by the Receiver General?

4. Has he heard that because of what Colonel Napoleon Marshall revealed in the meetings of the Foreign Policy Association at New York that his pension as a former employee of the State Department in Haiti has been withdrawn?

11-4-47

PRESIDENTS OF HAITI. 1870-1908.

Nissage Saget. 1870-1874.

Order and financial reforms. Retires at end of term.

Dominque. 1874-1876.

Reaction and flight.

Boisrond Canal. 1876-1879.

Excellent government. Claims. Public improvements. Resigns.

Salomon. 1879-1889.

Settles difficulties with the Catholic Church. Pays indemnity. National Bank of Haiti. World Postal Union. Leaves Haiti.

Légitime. 1888-1889.

In SouthWest.

Hyppolite. 1889-1895.

Public improvements. Dies in office.

Simon-Sam. 1895-1902.

Resigns. Trouble with Germany. Treaties with France and the United States. Nord Alexis. Centenary of Independence.

NORD ALEXIS 1902-8

CENTENARY

HAITI

Discussion at the Foreign Policy Association, December 21, 1929.

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois, Editor of THE CRISIS.

When Columbus discovered the island of San Domingo, there were over a million Indians there. It is said by some authorities that only 153 of them were left in 1545. This began the orgy of robbery, slavery and oppression which has followed the history of this beautiful but unhappy island. Buccaneers, slave raiders, and organized industry based on slavery, followed. It is probable that at least two million black slaves were tossed into this island during the 17th and 18th Centuries. Yet, only a million were left in 1791. The island, is nearly the size of Ireland, or a little smaller than the state of Maine. It became a harbor of freebooters, and then England, Spain and France fought for it. Finally, by the Treaty of Ryswick in 1697, the western part of the island became French. This is the part known as Haiti. At its present ~~estimate~~ extent, it has about ten thousand square miles, being a little larger than New Hampshire and a little smaller than the Netherlands. Here, an astonishing drama of human history has been played. At the end of the 18th Century, there were three classes of people in Haiti: Forty thousand whites, with much unacknowledged Negro blood, five hundred thousand blacks, and twenty-eight thousand mixed bloods. These people of mixed blood were nominally free and because of the inter-marriage of whites and blacks, had, in some cases, inherited property and received a liberal education in France. They owned in 1791, one-third of the land and one-fourth of the slaves. ~~Of this upper class of mulattoes, there were about seventeen thousand~~ Among the five hundred thousand slaves, ~~and were~~ was one element which must not be forgotten. They were the slaves, who had revolted and ~~killed~~ and maintained themselves in the mountains. They were known, here, ~~there~~ as in Jamaica as the Maroons. These

Maroons maintained their freedom and their African customs and they spoke a language which was African and French and known as Creole. When the French Revolution came in 1789, both the white masters and the colored freedmen, sought to be represented. The white masters sought home rule; the colored freedmen sought enfranchisement and the right to share home rule with the whites. The result was a Civil War between the whites and the mulatto freedmen, precipitated by the public crucifixion of two of the mulatto leaders under circumstances of revolting cruelty. In the midst of this, on the night of October 22, 1791, five hundred thousand black slaves took the oath of blood in the forests and rose. They drove the white folk into the sea and murdered them by every method of cruelty. Uniting with the mulattoes and helped by the ~~chiefs~~ Leader, they overcame Spanish, French and British armies, and finally, January 1, 1804, proclaimed the second republic upon the American continent. It was a desperate venture. The civilized world almost to a man was united against them. The United States of America refused to recognize them for sixty years. France waited thirty years and then recognized them only on condition that they pay her an indemity of $30,000,000, which was probably three times Haiti's total annual exports at the time. There ensued a struggle of survival for 115 years. Ten of these years were under African chieftains; fifty years under monarchs, ten years under Presidents for life; and forty-five years under Presidents for a term of years. Underlying the whole economic development was this often forgotten fact: from the beginning, the Haitians had free access to the soil. There were no landless peasants. There were no peons. From the time of Toussaint down to today, the Haitian laborer was independent because of his practical ownership of the soil. During the first ten years,

32-4-40

Haiti was ruled by chieftains whose power rested on African religion and clan communism. Their duty was to defend Haiti from white aggressors and this Toussaint and Dessalines and Christophe did. The next effort of Haiti was to turn this chieftainship into a monarchy, which would gain the recognition of the states of the world. They did not dare give up concentration of power, and the old Maroon spirit did not allow them to accept permanently a hereditary monarchy. For fifty years, they strove under kings and emperors to achieve independence and union. And this, by 1869, they accomplished. In the next ten years, in 1859 to 1869, presidents for life were elected, but the steady pressure of the country was to change the monarchy so as to have presidents elected for a term of years. This was accomplished by 1870. Up to that time, 70 years, only two rulers of Haiti had been killed in office: one chieftain and one life president. The next forty-five years were the critical years for Haitian development and the years by which she can best be judged. We may divide this time into thirty-eight years of good government, and seven years of bitter factional strife. From 1870 to 1908, Haiti had a succession of eleven presidents in thirty-eight years. None of them were killed in office. Two of them were driven out; three resigned [redacted], and one died a natural death. They accomplished many things for Haiti. The first one, from 1870 to 1874, established under and brought about financial reforms. He was followed for two years by a reactionary, who was driven out. And then came a succession of excellent rulers. From 1876 to 1879, there was a good government in which the claims of foreign nations were adjusted. From 1879 to 1888, under Salomon, there was banking reform; the indemnity to France was finally paid, and Haiti entered the Postal Union. From 1889 to 1895, Hyppolite built market halls and Custom Houses and other public buildings, and established water works. From 1895 to 1902, a retroprocity treaty with France and a Naturalization Treaty with the United States were made; and the centenary of Haitian independence was celebrated. This brings us down to 1908. But during the latter part of the administration of these six forward-looking, and on the whole, progressive presidents, disaster loomed in the horizon and that disaster arose from the industrial and financial imperialism of modern civilized nations. The history of the agressions of foreign nations upon Haiti would make a lecture in itself. It began with France; it was carried on by Spain, and was almost continuous with England; it reached curious culmination with Germany in 1902; and of all the claimants and aggressors, the United States was foremost. One can only contrast the thirty-eight years, on the whole, of progressive government between 1870-1908, with the terrible years from 1908 to 1915, to see the results of this outward pressure and aggression. Former aggression had tried the physical possession of Haiti, but the aggression of 1908 to 1915 took a sudden and more familiar form. It was a matter of debts and claims; of banking and finance; of concessions and commerce. Six times in these years, the United States made open and pressing demand to take charge of Haitian Custom Houses. This had been preceded by pan-knocks and insults. In one case, an American gunboat, unloaded a gun in a Haitian port and limbered it up, and the excuse was that the Captain wanted to see how long it would take. Haitian generosity and humanitarism was held against it. Eight Hundred Haitians saved the American army at Savannah during the American Revolution. The fact was never mentioned. In 1815, the Haitians gave asylum to Bolivar, during his abortive efforts to emancipate South America. He dared not acknowledge it. The abolition of slavery in Haiti by the blacks was for a half century looked upon as a meance and threat to the slave holding United States, and yet the victory of Toussaint L'Ouverture over Napoleon gave to the United States for a song all of Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Wyoming, Montana and the Dakotas, most of Colorado and Minnesota, and all of Washington and Oregon. In the seven years, from 1908 to 1915, when the pressure of foreign governments and the bribery of commercial interests stirred every sort of discord in Haiti, it was impossible for the Haitien nation to proceed in its development of internal order. In these years, there were seven men who tried to seize the presidency, and of these, three were killed in the attempt; or in other words, more presidents were killed in these seven years than in the whole preceeding 108 years of Haitian independence. Indeed, before 1908, Haiti had a perfect right to say, that as compared with the United States and France, her presidential office had been as safe as theirs.

27-4-42

27-1-43

Even in those years of turmoil, Haiti was careful to accomplish the almost impossible feat of maintaining inviolate her relations with foreigners and foreign governments. She was paying her debts; no foreigner was molested or insulted in her country; it was possible to walk unarmed and unattended from one end of the island to the other and be treated with the utmost courtesy. She maintained the beginnings of a system of education, and she could point to accomplishment in literature, art and science, recognized and well-thought of by European critics for a century and more. Notwithstanding this, there were things happening in the world that meant, not simply damnation to Haiti, but almost ~~to~~ the overthrow of all civilization. In these early years of the 20th Century, the Devil's broth of the World War was ~~breaking~~ brewing. White imperialism was preparing for the final liquidation of the colored world. Asia, Africa and the islands of the sea, were going to be ruled by the great white nations for those nations' private profit. China was to be divided; agitation in India was to be put down by strong hand, and final division of Africa was ~~foreboctomed~~ planned. ¶ Here, of course, there were difficulties, and difficulties that led straight to war. There was the trouble of France in Morocco; there were Italy and England waiting for the death of Menelik of Abyssinia; there was the question of the future of the Portuguese colonies, and the scandals in the Congo, and other matters. Nevertheless, agreement then seemed possible in all these cases. In the matter of Liberia, the thing was practically settled, and although Germany and France and England were in dispute, England in 1908 had all her plans laid to seize the country. ¶ The United States had definitely entered on her career of imperialism; her foreign possessions increased in these early years of the century from 595,000 square miles to 716,000 square miles. We were building and preparing to defend the Panama Canal, and especially were we suspicious of England. We were waiting for Revolution to hand us over a part of Mexico, if not of Central America, and in this whole turmoil the fall of Haiti eventually was a foregone conclusion.

¶ Then things began to go awry. The leading nations with their four million soldiers and their great navies could not agree. To the surprise of the world, Japan overthrew Russian imperialism. The Chinese Revolution developed, agitation increased in India; the United States interfered in Liberia; the Mexicans refused to commit suicide, and the only way, as War burst upon the world, for the United States to further her plans and protect herself against England, which she expected them to fight, was to seize Haiti. ¶ The result was a series of demands; a series of claims, wholesale bribery by Germans, English and Americans, the seizure of Haitian funds by a United States battleships, and the overthrow of free institutions in Haiti at the point of the bayonet. ¶ Having seized Haiti, what have we done there? With ourselves as chief creditor, we have distributed & ourselves and other creditors Haitian revenues for the payment of her debts, admitting any claim that had the slightest color of validity. Thus, she has been saddled with a funded debt which ~~shall~~ will keep her in economic slavery to the United States for many generations.

33-4-44

2. We have built roads. They are chiefly military roads, designed for the rapid transfer of Marines and troops and built with scarcely any idea of the development of the Haitian peasantry.

3. In education, we have only attempted to educate an agricultural peasantry. This, with our policy of opening a way for the gradual seizure of the land from the peasants, ~~and~~ will make the ~~attempt~~ establishment of peonage in Haiti an easier thing. Meantime, we have done nothing to overcome the widespread illiteracy in a country where the problem of teaching ~~his~~ is complicated by the fact that the mass of the people do not speak a modern language.

4. We have introduced measures of sanitation, partly for the benefit of the people of Haiti, ~~partly~~ but more for the protection of the conquerors, who are living there.

In all these measures, we have ignored and insulted and refused to use the educated leaders of the Haitian people. On the contrary, we have tried to drive a wedge between the peasantry and these leaders, and the result is, that we have been unable to accomplish a single real forward step, either toward self-government or essential social uplift. Instead of remembering that the independence of the Haitian peasantry and its fight for democracy is the greatest asset of this country, we have, at the same time, tried to displace its natural leaders by foreigners, who disfranchise them, and whose attitude they quickly realize. A large proportion of these foreigners come from Louisiana. If Louisiana has any civilization to spare, she should use it at home. The state is one of the most illiterate in the United States; it has lynched nine hundred persons in the last twenty years; it has been repeatedly swept by mobs and lawlessness.

With the best intentions in the world, no white man, born and trained in Louisiana, is fit to attempt the social uplift of Negroes. Under such circumstances, there is only one decent thing for the United States to do, and that is to withdraw from Haiti as quickly and as decently as the withdrawal can be planned. If the United States does not do this, it will be because of the fact that the nation is willing to do to Negroes what it would never consent to do to white people. And this attitude toward Negroes and decent people surviving the World War is going to be an incentive to further wars; not simply ~~to~~ of friction between white and colored people, but ~~to~~ on account of jealousy between the white people who are seeking to exploit colored labor. Moreover, this exploitation of colored labor yields such profit that the funds ~~thus~~ accumulated can be used and are used to defeat the ends of democracy in white countries, like the United States and England and France. We are facing here a question much larger than the freedom of two million black folk in Haiti.

37-4-46

TRANSCRIPT OF

RADIO BROADCAST

Pg. 12 [illegible]

of his people, a man who is at the same time a scholar and distinguished contributor to literature. If I were to undertake to give you the list of Dr. Du Bois' books, it would take much more time than any chairman ought to take. Therefore, I simply introduce to you now Dr. W. E. B., one of the great leaders of a great race. (Applause)

37-5-53

DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS: When Columbus discovered the Island of San Domingo, it is said there were over 1,000,000 Indians there. Fifty years afterward, one estimate is that there were 153 of those Indians left. During two centuries black slaves were poured into this island, sometimes at the rate of 30,000 a year. It is not possible that less than 2,000,000 slaves were thus brought to Haiti. At the end of the 18th Century there were 1,000,000 there.

We are especially interested in one end, the western end of the island, where toward the end of the 18th Century there were 40,000 white people, something like 28,000 mulattoes, and 500,000 slaves. In each case these people were divided; the white divided into large landholders, small landholders and mechanics; the mulattoes into the slave and the free, the free ones being men who had inherited from their fathers some property and are said to have owned one-third of the land and a fourth of the slaves; and then the 500,000 slaves were also divided, a division we are sometimes apt to forget; a part of them were the maroons who were in the mountains, who had run away; who, in other islands as Jamaica, had fought against the English Government, who still maintained themselves against the French Government in the western part of the Island of San Domingo.

When the French Revolution took place the white people of the island wanted home rule in something the same way that the Southern people of the United States want home rule; that is, the right to deal with Negroes as they choose, without interference from the outside. The mulattoes wanted to share in the right to vote and between the mulattoes and the whites there arose a civil war precipitated by the atrocious murder of two leaders.

Suddenly on that never to be forgotten night of October 22, 1791, the 500,000 slaves began to rise. With the help of the fever and mountains these black men, united with the mulattoes, drove out the white people from Haiti. They overcame the armies of Spain, France and England and established an independent Negro government.

I want to try to epitomize what happened in the 125 years between 1791 and the present time. We can divide that into three periods. First there was a period of eighty years when the rulership of the blacks was in the hands of African chieftains. It was based upon African tradition. Gradually these were transmuted into socalled kings and finally into presidents for life. During that time there were seven of these rulers of Haiti and they ruled on an average, eleven years each. Two of them were killed, one to end the hereditary African chieftainship, and the other in attempt to end the presidency for life.

During that time they accomplished a tremendous task. The first thing they did, and to my mind the most important thing, was to see that the peasantry had access to the land. There are today no peons in Haiti. There is no landless peasantry. Always the free peasants of Haiti have had access to the land, the right to cultivate it, and to that extent have been economically independent.

In the second place, these people were put to work regularly. Then union was kept between the different parts of Haiti which tended to fly apart. The country was defended from external foes and received the recognition of practically all of the countries of the world.

Then there began a second period of thirty-eight years, a period in which there were eight presidents, and a period according to which the Haitians have a right to ask that their country should be judged. It was a time when the presidents were elected for a term of years. Of these presidents not a single one was killed. Some were dismissed, sometimes driven out of office, but not very many.

37-5-54

These eight presidents also had an exceedingly difficult job. It had chiefly to do with the internal development of Haiti. They paid the indemnity to France, a tremendous indemnity as it was first laid down and still large when afterward somewhat reduced; a very large payment for their own freedom. They established order in Haiti. It was possible to go from one end of the Island without being armed. There was very little of theft or fighting. No foreigner was molested during his sojourn in that country.

Then they attempted public works, not on a large scale because they could not, but they built, for instance, water works in Port-au-Prince, some harbors and public markets. They established a school system, a very poor school system, to be sure, but the first school system these people had had after 200 years of compulsory ignorance, a school system which enabled their graduates to go to France in some cases and out of this training there arose a literature and an art which the people of Europe have recognized as worthy of attention.

This period was succeeded by seven years of curious turmoil, when there were seven attempts of men to secure the presidency of Haiti, three of whom were killed; when there was exceeding difficulty in keeping private order in the country. Even at this time, the interest on the debt of Haiti was paid, foreigners were not molested, and the international relations of Haiti were kept in correct order.

What was the difficulty during these seven years from 1908 to 1915? We can look at them from two points of view, first from that of the internal situation in Haiti. If Haiti had been a land of peons, if it had been a land where a handful of people had absolute control over the great mass of labor, you could have had outward peace and quiet. But there was in Haiti as you have seen, a growing sense of democracy which threw off the absolute rulership of the chieftains, which stopped the life presidency, which brought the presidency down to a term of years with the beginning of popular elections.

This growth of democracy meant the same thing in Haiti that it has meant everywhere; the opposing of the interests of the elite and of the mass of laborers. There was only one way in which that could be worked out. It called for time. It meant negotiations. It meant understanding.

We speak of the mass of the people of Haiti as illiterate. That does not mean they are ignorant people in the sense that we so often use that term. They are illiterate because their language of the mass is not a written one. Nevertheless, they have their African Mores, they have interesting methods of education. They were beginning to sense what nationhood meant. The process by which that would have been carried through, by which they would have pounded out by turmoil and uprising a free, popular and modern government—all that called for time and every bit of the strength that they had for this internal adjustment.

Secondly, let us view external conditions. It happened that this development came in the opening years of the 20th Century, and in those years you and I know what was taking place in the world. The white peoples of the world had made up their mind that the liquidation of self government so far as colored people was concerned, was to be finally accomplished. China was going to be divided among European powers. Asia was to come under the final and thorough domination of Europe, if not of America. Little black countries like Liberia and Ethiopia were to disappear. The final adjustment of European ownership in Africa was to take place.

The method of accomplishment was one with which we are quite familiar; the obtaining of raw material from these colored countries at the lowest possible prices, the manufacture of it and selling at high prices, thus making a huge profit out of the exploitation of colored labor. With that idea dominating the century, there was in everybody's mind the conclusion that Haiti must disappear as an independent government. This was on the program, a minor matter to be sure, but a matter made, in the minds of many people, inevitable by the building of the Panama Canal, and the supposed necessity of defending all the approaches to that Canal.

37-5-56

Consequently, there began the pressure of all foreign nations upon Haiti. It would have called forall of the strength and devotion of men of unusual ability to have taken care of the foreign affairs of Haiti in this period. In the first place, Haiti was in the same position that Liberia was and other small countries have been; they could be self-supporting had it not been for the necessity of raising a surplus for export in order that they should pay their foreign debts. That surplus for export was priced at the lowest price for raw material. It meant always a tremendous strain upon the country to keep up installments on that debt, and to keep the interest paid; and the people of Haiti knew perfectly well that any default in that payment was going to be made the excuse for interference.

During the time this program was becoming fixed in the thought of Europe, there were some things that went awry. There was the difficulty between Japan and Russia which put the final division of Asia off at least for a term of years. There was special difficulty in the division of Africa, as for instance, when France seized Morocco, in the whole question of Egypt, in the determination of Germany to share in the dissolution of the colonial system of Portugal, in the proposed taking over of Liberia which was a question between Germany and France and England. All these difficulties postponed the settlement of the ownership of the world by the white nations of the world. Of course, as we know now, it did much more than that. It brought on the World War.

37-5-57

When the World War burst, immediately the United States turned its attention toward Haiti. The United States and Haiti had had curious relations for a long time. When the American Army in 1779 was attacking Savannah and was beaten back, it was 800 Haitian soldiers with Christophe among them, that saved the American Army from defeat. Yet when we celebrated that event a few days ago, there wasn't a single word said throughout the length and breadth of the United States about the held of those soldiers.

Afterwards, when the Haitian Revolution took place, the United States was chief beneficiary. The successful fighting of Toussaint against all enemies, and particularly against the French, meant there was added to the United States the present states of Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, Wyoming, Montana, the Dakotas, Washington and Oregon, and a part of Minnesota. All of this fell almost as a gift into the lap of the United States because of the successful Revolution in Haiti which kept France from realizing her imperial program in the valley of the Mississippi.

Notwithstanding that, it was perhaps natural that the United States should have regarded the revolt of the slaves in Haiti and particularly their triumph, as a direct blow to the United States. Consequently, it was sixty years before this country, the first republic in the Western Hemisphere, recognized the second republic in the Western Hemisphere, which was the Republic of Haiti. In South America when Bolivar was at the nadir of his fortunes in 1815, it was to Haiti that he turned for asylum and relief. Afterward, he was afraid to mention the fact that he had received this aid.

The United States continually from 1847 on has been suggesting to Haiti that she either give up part of her territory for a naval base or allow the United States to superintend some part of her governmental functions, and finally, from 1908 to 1915, during Haiti's greatest internal turmoil and indeed one of the chief causes of that turmoil, six separate times the United States proposed to interfere with Haiti and take charge of a part of its governmental functions. The Haitians objected and made counter proposals, offered reasonable compromise, expressed willingness to receive advice and aid. But no. We wanted more and so it came to force, to removing a half million dollars of Haitian funds to the United States and to taking over the Government at the point of the bayonet. The assassination of a Haitian president was excused and not cause of this high-handed act of aggression.

37-5-58

The question today is—what has been the result of this seizure by the United States of the Government of Haiti? There are a great many things that can be said in detail about what the United States has done there and what it has not done, and yet it seems to me in general the situation is perfectly clear. In the first place, take the matter of order and democracy, that is, of internal government. One, of course, might be facetious and say it is a little curious for the United States to attempt to teach law and order to any land. But suppose we acknowledge that there are citizens in the United States who could do a good deal for the establishment of order and democracy in Haiti—certainly this is true; but the people who are chosen to do this certainly ought not to be taken mainly from the most illiterate state in the Union, the state where a white man, no matter what his good-will is, inevitably could not meet colored people as equals or treat Negroes as men. The citizens of Louisiana may be extremely good citizens. Nevertheless, since 1882, they have lynched 411 human beings without trial. They have perpetrated some atrocities there that parallel anything Haiti ever did; as I have said, to draw a large proportion of the people who are going to "civilize" Haiti, as we say, from Louisiana, was at least a poor piece of diplomacy. (Applause)

37-5-59

If you are going to establish order, as you say, what do you mean by establishing order in Haiti? Apparently people think that there was no order in Haiti in 1915 and yet they acknowledge that a foreigner could go anywhere at any time of day and night without molestation; that the Haitian people were a quiet peaceable people; that they were a people who were courteous to strangers and each other; and that even while they were fighting out their own battle between democracy and aristocracy, they were maintaining a courteous attitude toward the stranger within their gates.

They had not established complete democracy but there are other governments on this continent whose democracy is far from complete. Nevertheless, Haiti was working toward democracy, working slowly. If it had had, as I have said before, a set of peons with those above them who could hold them in absolute silence, it would have seemed a good deal better than it really was. It would not have distressed your ears to hear of fighting, to hear of the massacre of political opponents; but it would not have been nearly as encouraging in the long run. Here was an attempt of black people to fight out this whole battle of democracy and while it took place later than in England or France or other parts of the world, it was no more atrocious or discouraging than the things that have happened in those countries. And, indeed, if we must make comparisons, nothing ever happened in Haiti that was as stupid and cruel and atrocious as the World War. (Applause)

Then there comes the question as to what we have done to increase this democracy. We went in there ostensibly because there was not enough democracy, and thereupon we took away what little democracy there was there. We dispersed their legislature, kept them from electing officials and put them in a position where they are less able today to govern themselves than they have been in the last hundred years.

37-5-60

The United States has done something for Haiti in the matter of roads and communications, but we have to remember even there that the roads are chiefly military roads so the marines can get from one end of Haiti quickly to kill peasants who ask questions.

There has been something done for health and to my mind that has been the best job done by the Americans; and it has been done in large part by the use of Haitians as physicians and the establishment of health stations among the peasantry, manned by these Haitian doctors.

On the other hand, when you come to education and the land (I put them together because the United States puts them together) you have extraordinary failure. Here you had complaint that these people are illiterate and yet practically the education system that we have introduced is doing nothing about illiteracy at all. We have a tremendous interest in agriculture. Why? Because if you can establish in Haiti the same kind of peonage you have in Cuba, you can have the same tremendous profits which you have out of Cuban sugar. This attempt, then, to establish peonage must be accompanied by the acquisition of the land, and one of the first things we did was to see to it that foreigners and foreign corporations could get hold of Haitian land.

We have arranged the debt for Haiti. That is the first thing always done when a great, modern nation goes into a small nation. You can look at the figures and apparently Haiti has been greatly benefited by the partial payment of its debt. As a matter of fact, the Haitian debt is just as large today as it was before the Americans got in there, except that they have paid off part of its face value in the depreciated franc of France, and have substituted Wall Street as the creditor instead of the people of France.

37-5-61

In addition to all this, they have brought into Haiti the color line. They have exploited it. They have brought the Haitian people for the first time face to face with that domestic institution of the United States. What does that mean? It means, of course, that it is impossible for the Haitians to appeal to the generosity and good sense of the world. The color line lies between. What can you expect of Haitians? They are black. Consequently, they cannot appeal usually to the good sense, the sense of fairness of the people of the United States or the people of the civilized world.

If this was simply a matter of the people of Haiti perhaps you could rest content after a good luncheon, but it means a good deal more than that. It means that the method of exploiting people by making the result of their labor give them bare support while it adds tremendous profits to the exploiting country; by making it possible to use those profits as a fund by which democracy is nullified in so many of the so-called republican governments throughout the world, that kind of program rests upon the basis of what is today going on in Haiti and similar exploited peoples.

If you want peace in the world you are not going to get it that way. It wasn't a mere happening that at the same time we were telling

Russia how she should keep peace that it was necessary to send marines to Haiti. It was one of those juxtapositions in time and space which belong together in logic. If you are going to keep the colored world in the position of exploitation in which it is today, then you are going to have war; and not necessarily war between colored and white people, but war between those white people who are fighting for the spoils that come from the exploitation of the colored folk.

37-5-62

It is therefore of great and present interest to you if you want to keep war out of the world, if you want democracy to expand not simply in Haiti but here in the United States, that you should see that this country has back the freedom which it so dearly won. (Applause)

CHAIRMAN MCDONALD: I should like first to make an announcement to the radio audience, not only in the usual course, but because at this moment a number of additional stations come on the air, joining the eighteen or nineteen stations which are already on the air.

This is a meeting of the Foreign Policy of questions indicates your favorite or the reverse. Has some one a question for Dr. Du Bois?

IDA McCARTHY: I have heard this question of race very much discussed. I am just back from Haiti. I didn't see anything of it. Personally I saw all the white members of the occupation very friendly. They were visiting back and forth in their homes. I was in their homes. I didn't see any color line drawn. I should like to ask Dr. Du Bois if there isn't some color line even among the Haitians

37-5-63

CHAIRMAN McDONALD: Miss McCarthy does us the favor of asking a question addressed to Dr. Du Bois. She is just back from Haiti, and on this matter of the color line drawn in Haiti she saw many of the whites intermingling socially with the colored people in Haiti in their homes. She would like to ask Dr. Du Bois whether there isn't a color line drawn among the Haitians themselves.

DR. DU BOIS: I have no information for Miss McCarthy. I do not doubt but that there is a color line drawn in Haiti, but after this picture of the idyllic conditions there, I wonder what is this all about? You seem to be getting on beautifully there. This lady has had contact with people down there. She has seen no difficulty at all betw en the Haitians and the Americans. The money is all carefully accounted for. All the best Haitians are in favor of the American occupation. I am glad to get this new information about Haiti b cause I also have some letters from Haiti. (Applause) to Dr. Du Bois. It is this: What is Dr. Du Bois' practical program which he would like to see carried out? By what steps would he suggest American occupation be withdrawn? (Applause)

DR. DU BOIS: It is very difficult, of course, after a wrong, a great social wrong like this, has been perpetrated, to say exactly what you are going to do to right things. First of all, it seems to me, the American Government publicly and in good faith ought to say that it is going to withdraw from Haiti. It never has said this openly. On the contrary, when the time for withdrawal came before, it forced a revision of the treaty.

We ought to say that we are going to withdraw and then in real consultation with the people who own Haiti, the exact steps of that withdrawal ought to be worked out. There are plenty of ways in which we can see how modern civilization can help backward countries. There isn't any question but that the help can be given, but it need not be given with a club, or with humiliation. Men can sit down and work it out in peace and amity. It isn't a question so much as to just how the thing is to be done as it is that we are going to promise to do it, and we are going to keep our promise. (Applause)

CHAIRMAN MCDONALD: I should like to make one announcement before I ask another question just handed to me to ask of Dr. Du Bois. This announcement is addressed primarily to the radio audience. We are very much interested to know how these particular programs are received, whether the radio audience has as many advantages as I think it has, over the audience which sits here in the Hotel Astor. We have prepared a brief statement of the background of the Haitian problem, together with a list of books, which we should be glad to send to any of the radio audience who will write for it, either to their own local station or to the National Broadcasting Company, 711 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

The question addressed to Dr. Du Bois which I can read in a half minute and which he will have to answer in just twice that time because then the time is up, is this:
May I ask Dr. Du Bois what he meant exactly when he said that the United States acquired land from which the long list of states that he read was made possible as a result of the Haitian Revolution?

37-5-65

DR. DU BOIS: Napoleon Bonaparte had a number of plans of colonial expansion. One of those plans was to develop the ownership of land which France had discovered and partially occupied in the Mississippi Valley and in the West Indies Islands. When the Revolution broke out in Haiti, he determined to put down the revolutionists and then to extend his dominion beyond and up the Mississippi Valley. He sent his brother-in-law with a large French army there. I have said that the black slaves together with the mountains and fever overcame those men and practically killed them all and Napoleon couldn't carry out his plan. It was, therefore, possible for the United States to buy all this territory for a song, a territory they could not have gotten under any circumstances if the slaves of Haiti hadn't achieved their freedom.

CHAIRMAN MCDONALD: The next meeting of the Foreign Policy Association will be on January 4, on the subject "In and Out of the League of Nations". This meeting is adjourned.

... The meeting adjourned at three-thirty o'clock ...

37-5-133

Education and Work

Commencement Address delivered at Howard University, Washington, D. C.
June 6, 1930 by

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

1. Apology

Between the time that I was graduated from college and the day of my first experience at earning a living, there was arising in this land, and more especially within the Negro group, a controversy concerning the type of education which American Negroes needed. You, who are graduating today, have heard but echoes of this controversy and more or less vague theories of its meaning and its outcome. Perhaps it has been explained away to you and interpreted as mere misunderstanding and personal bias. If so, the day of calm review and inquiry is at hand. And I suppose that, of persons living, few can realize better than I, just what that controversy meant and what the outcome is. I want then today in the short time allotted me to state, as plainly as I may, the problem of college and industrial education for American Negroes, as it arose in the past; and then to restate it as it appears to me in its present aspect.

2. Dilemma

First of all, let me insist that the former controversy was no mere misunderstanding; there was real difference of opinion, rooted in deep sincerity on every side and fought out with a tenacity and depth of feeling due to its great importance and fateful meaning.

It was, in its larger aspects, a problem such as in all ages, human beings of all races and nations have faced; but it was new in 1895 as all Time is new; it was concentered and made vivid and present because of the immediate and pressing question of the education of a vast group of the children of former slaves. It was the ever new and age-young problem of Youth, for there had arisen in the South a Joseph which knew not Pharoah,—a black man who was not born in slavery. What was he to become? Whither was his face set? How should he be trained and educated? His fathers were slaves, for the most part, ignorant and poverty-stricken; emancipated in the main without land, tools, nor capital,—the sport of war, the despair of economists, the grave perplexity of Science. Their children had been born in the midst of controversy, of internecine hatred, and in all the economic dislocation that follows war and civil war. In a peculiar way and under circumstances seldom duplicated, the whole program of popular education became epitomized in the case of these young black folk.

37-6-134

3. First Efforts

Before men thought or greatly cared, in the midst of the very blood and dust of battle, an educational system for the freedmen had been begun; and with a logic that seemed, at first, quite natural. The night school for adults had become the day school for children. The Negro day school had called for normal teaching and the small New England college had been transplanted and perched on hill and river in Raleigh and Atlanta, Nashville and New Orleans, and a half dozen other towns. This new Negro college was conceived of as the very foundation stone of Negro training. But, meantime, any formal education for slaves or the children of slaves not only awakened widespread and deep-seated doubt, fear and hostility in the South, but it posed, for statesmen and thinkers, the whole question as to what the education of Negroes was really aiming at, and indeed, what was the aim of educating any working class, if it was doubtful as to how far the social and economic classes of any modern state could be essentially transformed and changed by popular education, how much more tremendous was the problem of educating a race, whose ability to assimilate modern training was in grave question and whose place in the nation and the world, even granted they could be educated, was a matter of baffling social philosophy? Was the nation making an effort to parallel white civilization in the South with a black civilization? Or was it trying to displace the dominant white master class with new black masters or was it seeking the difficult but sure more reasonable and practical effort, to furnish a trained set of free black laborers who might carry on in place of the violently disrupted slave system? Surely, most men said, this economic and industrial problem of the New South was the first—the central, the insistent problem of the day.

37-5-135

4. Two Schools of Thought

There can be no doubt of the real dilemma that thus faced the nation, the Northern philanthropist and the black man. The argument for the New England college, which at first seemed to need no apology, grew and developed. The matter of man's earning a living, said the college, is and must be important, but surely it can never be so important as the man himself. Thus the economic adaptation of the Negro to the South must in education be subordinated to the great necessity of teaching life and culture. The South, and more especially the Negro, needed and must have trained and educated leadership if civilization was to survive. More than most, here was land and people who needed to learn the meaning of life. They needed the preparation of gifted persons for the profession of teaching, and for other professions which would in time grow. The object of education was not to make men carpenters but to make carpenters men.

On the other hand, those practical men who looked at the South after the war said: this is an industrial and business age. We are on the threshold of an economic expansion such as the world never saw before. What ever human civilization has been or may become, today it is industry. The South because of slavery has lagged behind the world. It must catch up. Its prime necessity after the hate and holocaust of war is a trained reliable laboring class. Assume if you will that Negroes are men with every human capacity, nevertheless, as a flat fact, no rising group of peasants can begin at the top. If poverty and starvation are to be warded off, the children of the freedmen must not be taught to despise the humble work, which the mass of Negro race must for untold years pursue. The transition period between slavery and freedom is a dangerous and critical one. Fill the heads of these children with Latin and Greek and highfalutin' notions of rights and political power, and hell will be to pay.

87-5-136

On the other hand, in the South, here is land and fertile land, in vast quantities, to be had at nominal prices. Here are employers who must have skilled and faithful labor, and have it now. There is in the near future an industrial development coming which will bring the South abreast with the new economic development of the nation and the world. Freedom must accelerate this development which slavery so long retarded. Here then is no time for a philosophy of economic or class revolution and race hatred. There must be friendship and good will between employer and employee, between black and white. They have common interests, and the matter of their future relations in politics and society, can well be left for future generations and different times to solve. "Cast down your buckets where you are." cried Booker T. Washington; "In all things that are purely social we can be as separate as the fingers, yet one hand in all things essential to mutual progress."

37-5-137

What was needed, then, was that the Negro first should be made the intelligent laborer, the trained farmer, the skilled artisan of the South. Once he had accomplished this step in the economic world and the ladder was set for his climbing; his future would be assured, and assured on an economic foundation which would be immoveable. All else in his development, if he proved himself capable of development, even to the highest, would inevitably follow. Let us have, therefore, not colleges but schools to teach the technique of industry and to make men learn by doing.

These were the opposing arguments. They were real arguments. They were set forth by earnest men, white and black, philanthropist and teacher, statesman and seer. The controversy waxed bitter. The disputants came to rival organizations, to severe social pressure, to anger and even to blows. Newspapers were aligned for and against; employment and promotion depended often on a Negro's attitude toward industrial education. The Negro race and their friends were split in twain by the intensity of their feeling and men were labelled and earmarked by their allegiance to one school of thought or to the other.

5. Present Conditions

Today, all this is past; by the majority of the older of my hearers, it is practically forgotten. By the younger, it appears merely as a vague legend. Thirty-five years, a full generation and more, have elapsed. The increase in Negro education by all measurements, has been a little less than marvelous. In 1895, there were not more than 1,000 Negro students of full college grade in the United States. Today, there are over 9,000 in college and nearly 150,000 in high schools. In 1895, 60% of American Negroes, ten years of age or over, were illiterate. Today, perhaps three-fourths can read and write. The increase of Negro students in industrial and land grant colleges has been equally large. The latter have over 16,000 students and the increasing support of the government of the states; while the great industrial schools, especially Hampton and Tuskegee, are the best endowed institutions for the education of black folk in the world.

37-5-138

6. Was the Controversy Settled?

What then has become of this controversy as to college and industrial education for Negroes? Has it been duly settled, and if it has, how has it been settled? Has it been transmuted into a new program, and if so, what is that program? In other words, what is the present norm of Negro education, represented at once by Howard University, Fisk and Atlanta on one hand, and by Hampton Institute, Tuskegee and the land grant colleges on the other?

I answer once for all, the problem has not been settled. The questions raised in those days of controversy still stand in all their validity and all their pressing insistence on an answer. They have not been answered. They must be answered, and the men and women of this audience and like audiences throughout the land are the ones from whom the world demands final reply. Answers have been offered; and the present status of the problem has enormously changed, for human problems never stand still. But I must insist that the fundamental problem is still here.

7. What the College Has Done.

Let us see. The Negro college has done a great work. It has given us leadership and intelligent leadership. Doubtless, without these colleges the American Negro would scarcely have attained his present position. The chief thing that distinguishes the American Negro group from the Negro groups in the West Indies, and in South America and the mother group in Africa, is the number of men that we have trained in modern education, able to cope with the white world on its own ground and in its own thought, method and language.

37-5-139

On the other hand, there cannot be the slightest doubt but that the Negro college, its teachers, students and graduates, have not yet comprehended the age in which they live: the tremendous organization of industry, commerce, capital and credit which today forms a super-organization dominating and ruling the universe, subordinating to its ends government, democracy, religion, education and social philosophy; and for the purpose of forcing into the places of power in this organization American black men either to guide or help reform it, either to increase its efficiency or make it a machine to improve our well-being, rather than the merciless mechanism which enslaves us;—for this the Negro college has today neither program nor intelligent comprehension.

On the contrary there is no doubt but that college and university training among us has had largely the exact effect that was predicted; it has turned an increasing number of our people not simply away from manual labor and industry, not simply away from business and economic reform, into a few well-paid professions, but it has turned our attention from any disposition to study or solve our economic problem. A disproportionate number of our college-trained students are crowding into teaching and medicine and beginning to swarm into other professions and to form at the threshold of these better-paid jobs, a white-collar proletariat, depending for their support on an economic foundation which does not yet exist.

Moreover, and perhaps for this very reason, the ideals of colored college-bred men have not in the last thirty years been raised an iota. Rather in the main, they have been lowered. The average Negro undergraduate has swallowed hook, line and sinker, the dead bait of the white undergraduate, who, born in an industrial machine, does not have to think, and does not think. Our college man today, is, on the average, a man untouched by real culture. He deliberately surrenders to selfish and even silly ideals, swarming into semi-professional athletics and Greek Letter societies, and affecting to despise scholarship and the hard grind of study and research. The greatest meetings of the Negro college year like those of the white college year have become vulgar exhibitions of liquor, extravagance and fur coats. We have in our colleges a growing mass of stupidity and indifference.

37-5-140

I am not counselling perfection: as desperately human groups, we must expect our share of mediocrity. But as hitherto a thick and thin defender of the college, it seems to me that we are getting into our Negro colleges considerably more than our share of plain fools.

Acquiring as we do in college no [redacted] guidance to a broad economic comprehension and a sure industrial foundation, and simultaneously a tendency to live beyond our means, and spend for show, we are graduating young men and women with an intense and overwhelming appetite for wealth and no reasonable way of gratifying it, no philosophy for counteracting it.

Trained more and more to enjoy sexual freedom as undergraduates, we refuse as graduates to found and support even moderate families, because we cannot afford them; and we are beginning to sneer at group organization and race leadership as mere futile gestures.

Why is this? What is wrong with our colleges? The method of the modern college has been proven by a hundred centuries of human experience: the imparting of knowledge of the old to the young; the instilling of the conclusions of experience, "line upon line, and precept upon precept." But, of course, with this general and theoretical method must go a definite and detailed object suited to the present age, the present group, the present set of problems. It is not then in its method but in its practical objects that the Negro college has failed.

37-5-141

It is handing on knowledge and experience but what knowledge and for what end? Are we to stick to the old habit of wasting time on Latin, Greek, Hebrew and Eschatology, or are we to remember that, after all, the object of the Negro college is to place in American life a trained black man who can do what the world today wants done; who can help the world know what it ought to want done and thus by doing the world's work well may invent better work for a better world. This brings us right back to the object of the industrial school.

8. What the Industrial School Has Done.

Negro industrial training in the United States has accomplishments of which it has a right to be proud; but it too has not solved its problem. Its main accomplishment has been an indirect matter of psychology. It has helped bridge the transition period between Negro slavery and freedom. It has taught thousands of white people in the South to accept Negro education, not simply as a necessary evil, but as a possible social good. It has brought state support to a dozen higher institutions of learning, and to some extent, to a system of public schools. On the other hand, it has tempered and rationalized the inner emancipation of American Negroes. It made the Negro patient when impatience would have killed him. If it has not made working with the hands popular, it has at least removed from it much of the stigma of social degradation. It has made many Negroes seek the friendship of their white fellow citizens, even at the cost of insult and caste. And thus through a wide strip of our country it has brought peace and not a sword.

But this has all been its indirect by-product, rather than its direct teaching. In its direct teaching, the kind of success which it has achieved differs from the success of the college. In the case of the industrial school, the practical object was absolutely right and still is right: that is, the desire of placing in American life a trained black man who could earn a decent living and make that living the foundation stone of his own culture and of the civilization of his group. This was the avowed object of the industrial school. How much has it done toward this? It has established some skilled farmers and among the mass some better farming methods. It has trained and placed some skilled artisans; it has given great impetus to the domestic arts and household economy; it has encouraged Negro business enterprise. And yet we have but to remember these matters to make it patent to all that the results have been pitifully small compared with the need. Our Negro farm population is decreasing; our Negro artisans are not gaining proportionately in industry and Negro business faces today a baffling crisis. Our success in household arts is due not to our effective teaching so much as to the mediaeval minds of our women who have not yet entered the machine age. Most of them seem still to think that washing clothes, scrubbing steps and paring potatoes were among the Ten Commandments.

37-5-142

Why now has the Industrial School with all its partial success, failed absolutely in its main object when that object of training Negroes for remunerative occupation is more imperative today than thirty-five years ago?

The reason is clear: if the college has failed because with the right general method it has lacked definite objects appropriate to the age and race, the Industrial School has failed because with a definite object, it lacked appropriate method to gain it. In other words, the lack of success of the Industrial education of Negroes has come not because of the absence of desperate and devoted effort, but because of changes in the world which the Industrial School did not foresee, and, which even if it had forseen, it could not have prevented, and to which it had not the ability to adapt itself.

It is easy to illustrate this. The Industrial School assumed that the technique of industry in 1895, even if not absolutely fixed and permanent, was at least permanent enough for training children into its pursuit and for use as a basis of broader education. Therefore, school work for farming, carpentry, bricklaying, plastering and painting metal work and blacksmithing, shoemaking, sewing and cooking was introduced and taught. But, meantime, what has happened to these vocations and trades? Machines and new industrial organization have remade the economic world and ousted these trades either from their old technique or their economic significance. The planing mill does today much of the work of the carpenter and the carpenter is being reduced rapidly to the plane of a mere laborer. The building trades are undergoing all kinds of reconstruction, from the machine-made steel skyscraper, to the cement house cast in molds, and the mass-made mail-order bungalow. Painting and masonry still survive, but the machine is after them; while printing and sewing are done increasingly by elaborate machines. Metal is being shaped by stamping mills. Nothing of shoemaking is left for the hands save mending, and in most cases, it is cheaper to buy a new shoe than to have an old one cobbled. When it comes to the farm, a world-wide combination of circumstances is driving the farmer to the wall. Expensive machinery demands increasingly larger capital; excessive taxation of growing land values is eliminating the small owner; monopolized and manipulated markets and carriers make profits of the individual farmer small or nil; and the foreign competition of farms worked by serfs at starvation wages and backed by world wide aggregations of capital—all this is driving farmers, black and white, from the soil and making the problem of their future existence one of the great problems of the modern world. The Industrial School, therefore, found itself in the peculiar position of teaching a technique of industry in certain lines just at the time when that technique was changing into something different, and when the new technique was a matter which the Negro school could not teach. In fact, with the costly machine, with mass production and organized distribution, the teaching of technique becomes increasing difficult. Any person of average intelligence can take part in the making of a modern automobile, and he is paid, not for his technical training, but for his endurance and steady application.

37-5-143

37-5-144

There were many lines of factory work, like the spinning and weaving of cotton and wool, which the Negro could have successfully been set to learning, but they involved vast expenditures of capital which no school could control and organized business at that time decreed that only white folk could work in factories. And that decree still stands. New Branches of industry, new technique are continually opening—like automobile repairing, electrical installments and engineering—but these call for changing curricula and adjustments puzzling for a school and a set course of study.

In the attempt to put the Negro into business so that from the inner seats of power by means of capital and credit he could control industry, we have fallen between two stools, this work being apparently neither the program of the college nor of the industrial school. The college treated it with the most approved academic detachment, while the Industrial school fatuously assumed as permanent ~~that~~ a business organization which began to change with the 19th Century, and bids fair to disappear with the 20th. In 1895, we were preaching individual thrift and saving; the small retail store and the partnership for business and the conduct of industry. Today, we are faced by great aggregations of capital and world-wide credit, which monopolize raw material, carriage and manufacture, distribute their products through cartels, mergers and chain stores, and are in process of eliminating the individual trader, the small manufacturer, and the little job. In this new organization of business the colored man meets two difficulties: First, he is not trained to take part in it: And secondly, if he gets training, he finds it almost impossible to gain a foothold. Schools cannot teach as an art and trade that which is a philosophy, a government of men, an organization of civilization. They can impart a mass of knowledge about it, but this is the duty of the College of Liberal Arts and not the shop work of the trade school.

37-5-145

Thus the Industrial School increasingly faces a blank wall and its astonishing answer today to the puzzle is slowly but surely to transform the industrial school into a college. The most revolutionary development in Negro education for a quarter-century is illustrated by the fact that Hampton today is one of the largest of Negro colleges and that her trade teaching seems bound to disappear within a few years. Tuskegee is a high school and college, with an unsolved program of the future of its trade schools. And the land grant colleges, built to foster agriculture and industry, are becoming just like other colleges. And all this, as I said, is not the fault of the industrial school, it comes from this tremendous transformation of business, capital and industry in the 20th Century, which few men clearly foresaw and which only a minority of men or of teachers of men today fully comprehend.

9. The Labor Movement

In one respect, however, the Negro Industrial School was seriously at fault. It set its face toward the employer and the capitalist and the man of wealth. It looked upon the worker as one to be adapted to the demands of those who conducted industry. Both in its general program and in its class-room, it neglected almost entirely the modern labor movement. It had little or nothing to teach concerning the rise of trade unions; their present condition, and their future development. It had no conception of any future democracy in industry. That is, the very vehicle which was to train Negroes for modern industry, neglected in its teaching the most important part of modern industrial development, namely, the relation of the worker to modern industry and to the modern state.

37-5-146

The reason for this neglect is clear. The Negro Industrial School was the gift of capital and wealth. Organized labor was the enemy of the black man in skilled industry. Organized labor in the United States was and is the chief obstacle to keep black folk from earning a living by its determined policy of excluding them from unions just as long as possible and compelling them to become "scabs" in order to live. The political power of white labor disfranchised Negroes, and helped build a caste system. How was the Negro Industrial School easily to recognize in this Devil of its present degradation, the Angel of its future enlightenment? How natural it was to look to white Capital and not to Labor for the emancipation of the black world—how natural and yet how insanely futile!

10. The Unsolved Problem

Here then are the successes and the failures of both Negro college and industrial school and we can clearly see that the problem still stands unsolved: How are we going to place the black American on a sure foundation in the modern State? The modern state is primarily business and industry. Its industrial problems must be settled before its cultural problems can really and successfully be attacked. The world must eat before it can think. The Negro has not found a solid foundation in that state as yet. He is mainly the unskilled laborer; the casual employee; the man hired last and fired first; the man who must subsist upon the lowest wage and consequently share an undue burden of poverty, crime, insanity and ignorance. The only alleviation of his economic position has come from what little the industrial school could teach during the revolution of technique and from what the college took up as part of its mission in vocational training for professions.

37-5-147

For the college had to become a trainer of men for vocations. This is as true of the white college as of the colored college. They both tended to change their college curricula into pre-vocational preparation for a professional career. But the effort of the Negro college here was half-hearted. There persisted the feeling that the college had finished its work when it placed a man of culture in the world, despite the fact that our graduates who are men of culture are exceptional, and if placed in the world without ability to earn a living, what little culture they have, does not long survive.

Thus, at the end of the first third of the 20th Century, while both college and industrial school can point to something accomplished, neither has reached its main objective, and they are in process of uniting to become one stream of Negro education with their great problem of object and method unsolved. The industrial school has done but little to impart the higher technique of the industrial process or of the business organization and it has done almost nothing toward putting the Negro working man in touch with the great labor movement of the white world.

On the other hand, the Negro college has not succeeded in establishing that great and guiding ideal of group development and leadership, within a dominating and expanding culture, or in establishing the cultural life as the leading motif of the educated Negro. Its vocational work has been confined to the so-called learned professions, with only a scant beginning of the imparting of the higher technique of industry and science.

11. The New Industrial Revolution.

The result which I have outlined, is not wholly unexpected. Perhaps we can now say that it was impossible fully to avoid this situation. We have a right to congratulate ourselves that we have come to a place of such stability and such intelligence as now to be ready to grapple with our economic problem. The fact of the matter is we have up to this time been swept on and into the great maelstrom of the white civilization surrounding us. We have been inevitably made part of that vast modern organization of life where social and political control rests in the hands of those few white folk who control wealth, determine credit and divide income. We are in a system of culture where disparity of income is such that respect for labor as labor cannot endure; where the emphasis and outlook is not what a man does but what he is able to get for doing it. Where wealth despises work and the object of wealth is to escape work, and where the ideal is power without toil.

37-5-148

So long as a lawyer can look forward to an income of $100,000 a year while a maid servant is well-paid with $1,000, just so long the lawyer is going to be one hundred times more respectable than the servant and the servant is going to be called by her first name. So long as the determination of a person's income is not only beyond democratic control and public knowledge, but is a matter of autocratic power and secret manipulation, just so long the application of logic and ethics to wealth, industry and income is going to be a difficult if not insoluable problem.

In the modern world only one country is making a frontal attack upon this problem and that is Russia. Other countries are visualizing it and considering it, making some tentative and half-hearted effort but they have not yet attacked the system as a whole, and for the most part they declare the present system inevitable and eternal and incapable of more than minor and unstinted improvement.

In the midst of such a world organization we come looking for economic stability and independence. Of course, our situation is baffling and contradictory. And it is made all the more difficult for us because we are by blood and descent and popular opinion an integral part of that vast majority of mankind which is the Victim and not the beneficiary of present conditions; which is today working at starvation wages and on a level of brute toil and without voice in its own government or education in its ignorance, for the benefit, the enormous profit, and the dazzling luxury of the white rulers of the world.

37-5-149

Here, lies the problem and it is the problem of the combined Negro college and vocational school. Without the intellectual leadership of college-bred men, we could not hith rto have held our own in modern American civilization, but must have sunk to the place of the helpless proletariat of the West Indies and of South Africa. But, on the other hand, for what has the college saved us? It has saved us for that very economic defeat which the industrial school was established to ward off, and which still stands demanding solution. The industrial school acted as bridge and buffer to lead us out of the bitterness of Reconstruction to the toleration of today. But it did not place our feet upon the sound economic foundation which makes our survival in America or in the modern world certain or probable; and the reason that it did not do this was as much the fault of the college as of the trade school. The industrial school without the college was as helpless yesterday as the college is today helpless without systematic training for modern industry.

Both college and Industrial School have made extraordinary and complementary mistakes in teaching force: The Industrial School secured usually as teacher a man of affairs and technical knowledge, without culture or general knowledge. The college took too often as teacher a man of books and brains with no contact with or first hand knowledge of real every day life and ordinary human beings and this was true whether he taught sociology, literature or science. Both types of teacher failed.

37-5-150

12. The New Educational Program

What then is the unescapable task of the united college and vocational school? It is without shadow of doubt a new broad and widely efficient vocational guidance and education for men and women of ability, selected by the most careful tests and supported by a broad system of free scholarships. Our educational institutions must graduate to the world men fitted to take their place in real life by their knowledge, spirit, and ability to do what the world wants done. This vocational guidance must have for its object the training of men who can think clearly and function normally as physical beings; who have a knowledge of what human life on earth has been, and what it is now; and a knowledge of the constitution of the known universe. All that, and in addition to that, a training which will enable them to take some definite and intelligent part in the production of goods and in the furnishing of human services and in the democratic distribution of income so as to build civilization, encourage initiative, reward effort and support life. Just as the Negro college course with vision, knowledge and ideal must move toward vocational training, so the industrial courses must ascend from mere hand technique to engineering and industrial planning and the application of scientific and technical knowledge to problems of work and wage.

This higher training and vocational guidance must turn out young men and women who are willing not only to do the work of the world today but to provide for the future world. Here then is the job before us. It is in a sense the same kind of duty that lies before the educated white man but it has an essential and important difference. If we make a place for ourselves in the industrial and business world today, this will be done because of our ability to establish a self-supporting organization sufficiently independent of the white organization to insure its stability and our economic survival and eventual incorporation into world industry. Ours is double and dynamonic function of tuning in with a machine in action so as neither to wreck the machine or be crushed or maimed by it. Many think this is impossible. But if it is impossible, our future economic survival is impossible.

37-5451

Let there be no misunderstanding about this, no easy going optimism. We are not going to share modern civilization just by deserving recognition. We are going to force ourselves in by organized far-seeing effort--by out-thinking and out-flanking the owners of the world today who are too drunk with their own arrogance and power successfully to oppose us if we think and learn and do.

It is not the province of this paper to tell in detail just how this problem will be settled. Indeed I could not tell you if I would. I merely stress the problem and emphasize the possibility of the solution. A generation ago those who doubted our survival said that no alien and separate nation could hope to survive within another nation; that we must be absorbed or perish. Times have changed. Today it is rapidly becoming true that only within some great and all inclusive empire or league can separate nations and groups find freedom and protection and economic scope for development. The small separate nation is becoming increasingly impossible and the League of Nations as well as Briand's proposed League of Europe shouts this from the housetops. And just as loudly, the inevitable disintegration of the British Empire shows the impossibility of world embracing centralized autocracy. This means that the possibility of our development and survival is clear but clear only as brains and devotion and skilled knowledge points the way.

37-5-152

13. Teachers

We need, then, first, training as human beings in general knowledge and experience; then technical training to guide and do a specific part of the world's work. The broader training should be the heritage and due of all but todyy it is curtailed by poverty. The technical training of men must be directed by vocational guidance which finds fitness and ability. Then actual and detailed technical training will he done by a combination of school, laboratory and apprenticeship according to the nature of the work and the changing technique.

The teachers of such a stream of students must be of a high order. College teachers cannot follow the mediaeval tradition of detached withdrawal from the world. The professor of mathematics in a college has to be more than a counting machine, or proctor of examinations; he must be a living man, acquainted with real human beings, and alive to the relation of his branch of knowledge to the technical problem of living and earning a living. The teacher in a Negro college has got to be something far more than a master of a branch of human knowledge. He has got to be able to impart his knowledge to human beings whose place in the world is today precarious and critical and the possibilities and advancement of that human being in the world where he is to live and earn a living is of just as much importance in the teaching process as the content of the knowledge taught.

The man who teaches black-smithing, must be more than a black-smith. He must be a man of education and culture, acquainted with the whole present technique and business organization of the modern world, and acquainted too with human beings and their possibilities. Such a man is difficult to procure. Because Industrial Schools did not have in the past such teachers for their classes and could not get them, their whole program suffered unmerited criticism. The teachers then cannot be pedants or dilettantes, they cannot be mere technicians and higher artisans, they have got to be social statesmen and statesmen of high order. The student body of such schools has got to be selected for something more than numbers. We must eliminate those who are here because their parents wish to be rid of them, or for the social prestige or for passing the time or for getting as quickly as possible into a position to make money to throw away; and we must concentrate upon young men and women of ability and vision and will.

37-6-153

14. Ideal

Today there is but one rivalry between culture and vocation, college training and trade and professional training, and that is the rivalry of Time. Someday every human being will have college training. Today some must stop with the grades, and some with high school and only a few reach college. It is of the utmost importance then and the essential condition of our survival and advance that those chosen for college be our best and not simply our richest or most idle.

But even this growth must be led; it must be guided by Ideals. We have lost something, brothers, wandering in strange lands. We have lost our ideals. We have come to a generation which seeks advance without ideals--discovery without stars. It cannot be done. Certain great landmarks and guiding facts must stand eternally before us; and at the risk of moralizing, I must end by emphasizing this matter of the ideals of Negro students and graduates.

The ideal of Poverty. This is the direct antithisis of the present American ideal of Wealth. We cannot all be wealthy. We should not all be wealthy. In an ideal industrial organization no person should have an income which he does not personally need; nor wield a power solely for his own whim. If civilization is to turn out millionaires it will also turn out beggars and prostitutes either at home or among the lesser breeds without the law. A simple healthy life on limited income is the only reasonable ideal of civilized folk.

37-5-154

The ideal of Work: not idleness, not dawdling, but hard continuous effort at something worth doing, by a man supremely interested in doing it, who knows how it ought to be done and is willing to take infinite pains doing it.

The Ideal of Knowledge--not guess work, not mere careless theory--not inherited religious dogma clung to because of fear and inertia and in spite of logic, but critically tested and laborously gathered fact martialed under scientific law and feeding rather than choking the glorious world of fancy and imagination, of poetry and art of beauty and deep culture.

Finally, and especially the ideal of Sacrifice. I almost hesitate to mention this--so much sentimental twaddle has been written of it. When I say sacrifice, I mean sacrifice. I mean a real and definite surrender of personal ease and satisfaction. I embellish it with no theological fairy tales of a rewarding God or a milk and honey Heaven. I am not trying to scare you into the duty of sacrifice by the fires of a mythical Hell. I am repeating the stark fact of survival of life and culture on this earth:

"Entbehren sollst du—sollst enthehren"

Thou shalt forego, shalt do without.

The insistent problem of human happiness is still with us. We American Negroes are not a happy people. We feel perhaps as never before the sting and bitterness of our struggle. Our little victories won here and there serve but to reveal the shame of our continuing semi-slavery and social caste. We are torn asunder within our own group because of the rasping pressure of the struggle without. We are as a race not simply dissatisfied, we are embodied Dissatisfaction.

To increase abiding satisfaction for the mass of our people, and for all people, someone must sacrifice something of his own happiness. This is a duty only to those who recognize it as a duty. The larger the number ready to sacrifice, the smaller the total sacrifice necessary. No man of education and culture and training, who proposes to face his problem and solve it can hope for entire happiness. It is silly to tell intelligent human beings: be good and you will be happy. The truth is today, be good, be decent, be honorable and self-sacrificing and you will not always be happy. You will often be desperately unhappy. You may even be crucified, dead and buried and the third day you will be just as dead as the first. But with the death of your happiness may easily come increased happiness and satisfaction and fulfillment for other people--strangers, unborn babes, uncreated worlds. If this is not sufficient incentive, never try it--remain hogs.

37-5-155

The present census will show that the American Negro of the educated class and even of the middle industrial class is reproducing himself at an even slower rate than the corresponding classes of whites. To raise a small family today is a sacrifice. It is not romance and adventure. It is giving up something of life and pleasure for a future generation.

If, however, real sacrifice for others in your life work appeals to you, here it is. Here is the chance to build an industrial organization on a basis of logic and ethics, such as is almost wholly lacking in the modern world. It is a tremendous task, and it is the task equally and at once of Howard and Tuskegee, of Hampton and Fisk, of the college and of the industrial school. Our real schools must become centers of this vast Crusade. With the faculty and the student body girding themselves for this new and greater education, the major part of the responsibility will fall upon those who have already done their school work; and that means upon the Alumni who, like you, have become graduates of an institution of learning. Unless the vision comes to you and comes quickly, of the educational and economic problem before the American Negro, that problem will not be solved. You not only enter, therefore, today the worshipful company of that vast body of men upon whom a great center of learning, with ancient ceremony and colorful trappings has put the accolade of intellectual knighthood, but men who have become the unselfish thinkers and planners of a group of people in whose hands lies the economic and social destiny of the darker peoples of the world, and by that token of the world itself.

37-5-156

14. The Shadow of Beauty

Finally no one may fail to stress before any audience, or on any occasion and on any errand bent, the overshadowing and all-inclusive ideal of Beauty--"fair face of Beauty, all too fair to see"--fitness, rhythym, perfection of adaptation of ends to means. It is hard to mention this intelligently without maudlin sentiment and clouded words. May I speak then in parable?

Last night I saw the Zeppelin sailing in silver across the new moon. Brilliant, enormous, lovely, it symbolized the civilization over which it hung. It rode serene above miles of Death; like a needle it threaded together clouds and seas, stars and continents. Within its womb were caged eternal and palpitating forces of the universe, and yet without quiver it faced the utter ends of space. Across the city, mute, dominant, magnificent, imponderable—it flew.

And what it did, men and women of Howard you may do--you must do or die. The Zeppelin is neither miracle nor stroke of genius. It is unremittent toil and experiment and thought and infinite adaptation in the face of every discouragement and failure in the face of death itself.

37-5-157

I thought as I saw it flying there, of an angel flying low—an angel of steel and silk and of grim and awful human aim. I remembered the word of our own poet, great but little known—

I thought I saw an angel flying low.
I thought I saw the flicker of a wing
Above the mulberry trees; but not again.
Bethesda sleeps.....

The golden days are gone. Why do we wait
So long upon the marble steps, blood
Falling from our open wounds? and why
Do our black faces search the empty sky?
Is there something we have forgotten? Some precious thing
We have lost, wandering in strange lands?.....

There was a day, I remember now,
I beat my breast and cried, "Wash me God,
Wash me with a wave of wind upon
The barley: O quiet One, draw near, draw near!
Walk upon the hills with lovely feet
And in the waterfall stand and speak.

W.E.B. DuBois (n.d.)

Delivered at Howard University
Hon. W.E.B. Dubois

Education and Work

Between the time that I was graduated from college and the days of my first experience in earning a living, there was arising in the United States, and particularly within the Negro group, a controversy concerning the type of education which Negroes needed. You, who are graduating today, have heard much of this controversy and many theories of its meaning and outcome. But I suppose that few persons living can realize better than I just what the controversy meant and just what the outcome has been. I want today in the short time allotted to me, to state the problem of college and industrial education for American Negroes as it was in the past; and then to restate it in its present aspect.

First of all, let me insist that the former controversy was no mere misunderstanding; there was a real difference of opinion, rooted in sincerity and fought out with a tenacity and depth of feeling which arose because of its real importance and fateful meaning.

It was in its larger aspects a problem which in all ages has faced human beings of all races and nations; but it was concentrated and made vivid and real in 1895 because of the immediate and pressing question of the education of a vast group of the children of former slaves. Here were people, ignorant and poverty-stricken, beginning their career in the midst of controversy and hatred and the economic dislocation of civil war. Thus, in a peculiar way the whole problem of popular education became epitomized in their case.

On the one hand, not so much as a matter of thought and planning, as of a procedure that seemed perfectly natural at the time, the small New England college was transplanted to the South and became at Raleigh, Atlanta, Nashville, New Orleans and a dozen other different places, the foundation stone of Negro training. On the other hand, this beginning of college training for former slaves, not only awakened fear and hostility, but it brought up the whole question as to what the education of Negroes was really aiming at and what indeed was the aim of educating any working class. Was it an effort to parallel if not displace a dominant social class? Or was it seeking to furnish a trained set of free laborers to carry on in place of the disrupted slave system? Thus a real dilemma faced the nation, the northern philanthropist and the black man. The argument for the New England college was that the South, and particularly the Negro, needed trained and educated leadership; it needed more than most to learn the meaning of life; it needed the preparation of gifted persons for the professions, and especially for the profession of teaching, without which there could be no system of education of any kind. The proponents of college training said frankly that it was not the business of a college to make men carpenters but to make carpenters men.

49-32-27

To this the industrial school retorted with an argument of undoubted strength. The inevitable tendency of college training for Negroes would be to turn them from manual toil and toward the professions; to make them dispise the humble work which the vast mass of them for untold years must pursue if they were to ward off poverty and starvation; that in a transition period between slavery and freedom it was dangerous even to try starting "at the top"; that in the South there was land and fertile land in vast quantities to be had at nominal prices: here was a section of the country whose industrial development had lagged behind the nation and the world, and must, therefore, be accellerated. Modern industry was finding in America its most efficient and fateful development. If now the Negro could be made the intelligent toiler, the trained farmer, the skilled worker of the South, his future would be assured and assured on an economic foundation which would be immoveable. All else in his development would inevitably follow. What was needed, therefore, were schools to teach the technique of industry and learning by actual doing.

These were the arguments. They were set forth by white and black, by philanthropist and teacher, by statesmen and by thinkers. The controversy was bitter. The disputants came to anger and even to blows. The Negro race and their friends were split in two by the intensity of their feeling on this problem.

Today, all this is past; perhaps by the majority of those here it is practically forgotten. Thirty-five years, a full generation and more, have elapsed. The increase in Negro education by all the measurements which we have has been a little less than marvelous. In 1900, there were not more than 1,500 Negro students of full college grade in the United States. Today, there are over 20,000 in college and nearly 150,000 in high schools. In 1890, at least 57% of American Negroes, ten years of age or over, were illiterate. Today, it is probable that three-fourths can read and write. The increase of Negro students in industrial and land grand colleges has been equally large. They have over 15,000 students and the solid support of the government of the states; while the great industrial schools, especially Hampton and Tuskegee, are the best endowed institutions for the education of black folk in the world.

What then has become of this controversy as to college and industrial education for Negroes? Has it been settled, and if it has, how has it been settled? Has it been transmuted into a new program, and if so, what is that program? In other words, what is the present norm of Negro education represented at once by Howard University, Fisk and Atlanta on one hand and by Hampton Institute, Tuskegee and the land grant colleges on the other?

49-33-27

If we turn to the colleges, we must acknowledge that they have not solved their problem. They have given us leadership and intelligent leadership. Doubtless, without them the American Negro would scarcely have attained his present position; and the chief thing that distinguishes the American Negro group from the groups in the West Indies, and in South America and the mother group in Africa, is the number of men that we have trained in modern education able to cope with white people on their own ground and in their own thought, method and language. But, on the other hand, there is no doubt but that college and university training among us has had largely the exact effect that was predicted: it has turned an increasing number of our people from manual labor and industry, from business and from the philanthropy of social uplift into a few well-paid professions. A disproportionate number of our college-trained students are crowding into teaching and medicine and gradually into the other professions and forming at the threshold of the arts a white-collar proletariat. Moreover, the ideals of colleges for college men have not in the last 30 years been raised. The average Negro undergraduate has swallowed hook, line and sinker the program of the white undergraduate. He is a man untouched by modern culture, with selfish often silly ideals, caring more for semi-professional football and Greek Letter societies than for scholarship, knowledge or group leadership. He has an intense and overwhelming desire for achieving large incomes quickly, widespread spending for show, with an acquired tendency to live beyond his means, to enjoy sexual freedom, marry late, and to have few or no children to educate and support. But finally, there is the same tendency among colored colleges, as among white colleges, to change the college into a prevocational preparation school for the professional school.

On the other hand, the industrial school has also had its achievement to failure. It forced the white South to accept the principle of state supported higher training. It kept the Negro from losing all respect for common labor and personal service and from not being too impatient with slow social development. It has placed some skilled black farmers on the soil and some skilled workers in shops. But, nevertheless, in its main object that of securing a strong and stable economic foothold for the Negro on the farm and in industry, it has failed of success. The number of Negro farmers is decreasing and while the Negro is established in industry, he is not established in hardly any of the lines in which the industrial schools specialized, while his hold elsewhere is precarious and uncertain. Moreover, the industrial school made the tremendous mistake of staking its success in the friendship and dole of the capitalist and employer, while it made no approach to organized labor and inculcated no understanding of the modern labor movement. In business the Industrial School has helped the Negro business man along old lines but the whole business structure of America has changed faster than any school can teach and the result is that Negro business faces a future more critical today than in 1895. Added to this, is the fact that the industrial school is today turning from its main object to becoming a college. Instead of training farmers and artisans, it has become, in the case of Hampton, almost entirely a college, and in the case of Tuskegee, a high school and college. The trade teaching in both has decreased and seems to be on the way to almost complete elimination. The Negro college often regards this as a triumph and vindication but it simply means that the industrial object of the Industrial School is now the combined aim of the Negro college and vocational school and await impatiently and insidently a solution.

Thus, at the end of the first third of the 20th Century, while both college and industrial school can point to much accomplished, neither has reached their main objective, and they are in process of uniting to become one stream of Negro education with their great problem of object and method unsolved. The Industrial School has done but little to impart the higher technique of the industrial process or of the business organization and it has done almost nothing toward putting the Negro working man in touch with the great labor movement of the white world. On the other hand, the Negro college has not succeeded in establishing that great and guiding ideal of group development and leadership, within a dominating and expanding culture, or establishing the cultural life as the leading motif of the educated Negro. Its vocational work has been confined to the so-called learned professions, with only a scant beginning of the imparting of the higher technique of industry and science.

49-33-31

Nor is this result wholly unexpected. The fact of the matter is we have up to this time been more or less swept in the great maelstrom of white civilization surrounding us. We have been swept forward, back and around. We have become part of that vast modern organization of life in which social and political control rests in the hands of those who control wealth, and where disparity of income is such that respect for labor as labor is so long as wealth despises work and seeks power without toil impossible. So long as a lawyer can look forward to an income of $100,000 a year, while a maid servant is well-paid with a $1,000 a year, just so long the lawyer is going to be 100 times more respectable than the servant and the servant is going to be called by her first name. The whole process of manufacture has been revolutionized since the time that Hampton and Tuskegee established their trade schools. Mass production, unemployment due to the displacement of labor by machines and the imperial organization of industry which has set two-thirds of the world working at starvation wages for the enormous profit and power of the other third,—all this has made the technique of the industrial school which tried to teach carpentry, cobbling, horse-shoeing and tin-smithing, as far behind the times today as Latin, Greek and Hebrew in a college course. The college has in a sense saved us. That is true. Without the intellectural leadership of college-bred men, we could not have held are own in modern American civilization, but must have sunk to the place of the helpless proleteriat of the West Indies and of South Africa. But, on the other hand, for what has the college saved us? It has saved us from that very economic defeat which the industrial school was established to ward off. The industrial school acted as bridge and buffer to lead us out of the bitterness of reconstruction to the toleration of today. But it did not place our feet upon the sound economic foundation which makes our survival in America or in the modern world certain or probable, and the reason that it did not do this was not its own fault but the fault of the college. The industrial school without the college was as helpless yesterday as the college is today without systematic training for modern industry. Here are two institutions of learning which for a generation have tried to walk in different ways and failed. The industrid school failed because the teacher of blacksmithing has got to be far more than a blacksmith. He must be an educated and cultured man knowing not every present technique but its current changes and its future possibilities and its place in organized industry. But just as truly the professor of mathematics in a college has to be more than a counting machine or proctor of examinations; he must be a living man, acquainted with life as it is and may be and alive to the relation of his branch of knowledge to the problem of living and earning a living. In the modern world, we see as never before, for white people as well as black, the need which spiritual leaders have for manual labor and the technique of physical forces. And we see, too, the need which manual toil has for trained and guiding and correlating thought. The world wants as never before inspiration, leisure and culture, and yet we are creating a world where real culture in science, art and literature and particularly in human happiness is curiously and persistently lacking.

47-32-33

That insistent problem of human happiness is still with us. We American Negroes are no longer a happy people. We feel perhaps as never before the strain and bitterness of our struggle. Our little victories won here and there serve but to reveal the shame of our continuing semi-slavery and social caste. We are torn insunder within our own group because of the rasping pressure of the struggle without. We are as a race not simply dissatisfied, we are embodied dissatisfaction.

What then is the irrescapable task of the United college and vocational school? It is without a shadow of doubt a new broad and widely efficient vocational guidance for men and women of ability, selected by the most careful tastes and supported by a broad system of free scholarships. Our educational institutions must graduate to the world men filled to take their place in real life by their knowledge, spirit and ability to do what the world wants done. This vocational guidance must have for its object the training of men who can think clearly and function normally as physical beings; who have a knowledge of what human life on earth has been, and what it is now and a knowledge of the constitution of the known universe. All that, and in addition to that, a training which will enable them to take a definite and intelligent part in the production of goods and furnishing of human services and in such guidance, of the distribution of income as to build civilization, encourage initiative, reward effort and support life.

This higher training and vocational guidance must turn out young men and women who are willing not only to do the work of the world today but to provide for the future world of tomorrow by begetting children and properly training them. It is probable that the census will show that the American Negro of the educated class and even of the middle industrial class is reproducing himself at an even slower rate than the corresponding classes of whites.

Here then is the job before us. It is in a sense the same kind of duty that lies before the educated white man but it has an essential and important difference. If we make a place for ourselves in the industrial world today, this will be done because of our ability to establish a self-supporting organization sufficiently independent of the white organization to insure its stability, our economic survival and eventual incorporation into world industry. Many think this is impossible. But if it is impossible, our future economic survival is impossible. In addition to that, the industrial organization which we thus being has got to be built on a basis of logic and ethics, almost wholly lacking in the modern world, except so far as the Russian experiment points a new way. This is a tremendous task before us, and it is the task equally and at once of Howard and Tuskegee, of Hampton and Fisk, of the college and of the industrial school. It is particularly and immediately the ask of the newer and younger members of the faculties of these schools. They cannot be pedants or dilettantes, they cannot be mere technicians and higher artisans, they have got to be social statesmen and statesmen of high order. The student body has got to be selected for something else than numbers. We must eliminate from Negro colleges the boys and girls who are there because their parents wish to be rid of them, simply for the social prestige or for passing the time or for getting into a position as quickly as possible to make money; and we must concentrate upon young men and women of ability and vision and will. But even with the faculty and the student body girding themselves for this new and greater education, the major part of the responsibility will fall still upon the Alumni, and that means upon the Alumni who, like you, have just become graduates of an institution of learning. Unless the

43-32-35

(p. 10 MISSING)

the major part of the responsibility will fall upon those who have done their school work, and that means upon the Alumni who, like you, have become graduates of an institution of learning. Unless the vision comes to you and comes quickly, of the educational and economic problem before the American Negro, that problem will not be solved. You not only enter, therefore, today the worshipful company of that vast body of men upon whom a great center of learning, with ancient ceremony and colorful trappings has put the accolade of intellectual knighthood, but men who have become the unselfish thinkers and planners of a group of people in whose hands lies the economic and social destiny of the darker peoples of the world, and by that token of the world itself.

Last night I saw the Zeppilin sailing in silver across the new moon. Brilliant, enormous, lovely it symbolized the civilization over which it hung. It rode serene above miles of Death; like a needle it threaddd together clouds and seas, stars and continents. Within its womb were caged the eternal and palpitating forces of the universe, and yet without quiver it faced the utter ends of space. Across the city, mute, dominant, magnificent, imponderable--it flew.

And what it did, men and women of Howard you may do--you must do or die. The Zeppilin is neither miracle nor stroke of genius. It is unremittent toil and experiment and thought and infinite adaptation in the face of every discouragement and failure in the face of death itself.

I thought as I saw it flying there of an angel flying low--an angel of steel and silk and human aim. I remembered the word of our own poet, great but little known--

I thought I saw an angel flying low,
I thought I saw the flicker of a wing
Above the mulberry trees;, but not again.
Bethesda sleeps.

The golden days are gone. Why do we wait
So long upon the marble steps, blood
Falling from our open wounds? and why
Do our black faces search the empty sky?
Is tere something we have forgotten? some precious thing
We have lost, wandering in strange lands?

There was a day, I remember now,
I beat my breast and cried, "Wash me God,
Wash me with a wave of wind upon
The barley; O quiet One, draw near, draw hear!
Walk upon the hills with lovely feet
And in the waterfall stand and speak.

4/9-32-3B

Without the intellectual leadership of college-bred men, we could not have held our own in modern American civilization, but must have sunk to the place of the helpless proletariat of the West Indies and of South Africa. But, on the other hand, for what has the college saved us? It has saved us for that very economic defeat which the industrial school was established to ward off, and which still stands demanding solution. The industrial school acted as bridge and buffer to lead us out of the bitterness of reconstruction to the toleration of today. But it did not place our feet upon the sound economic foundation which makes our survival in America or in the modern world certain or probable, and the reason that it did not do this was certainly as much the fault of the college as of the trade school. The industrial school without the college was as helpless yesterday as the college is today without systematic training for modern industry.

Here are two institutions of learning which for a generation have tried to walk in different ways and failed. The industrial school failed because the teacher of blacksmithing has got to be far more than a blacksmith. He must be an educated and cultured man knowing not only present technique but its current changes and its future possibilities and its place in organized industry and civilized life. But just as truly the professor of mathematics in a college has to be more than a counting machine, or proctor of examinations; he must be a living man, acquainted with real human beings, and alive to the relation of his branch of knowledge to the technical problem of living and earning a living.

In the modern world, we see as never before, for white people as well as black, the need which spiritual leaders have for manual labor and the technique of physical forces; and we see, too, the need which manual toil has for trained and guiding and correlating thought. The world wants as never before inspiration, leisure and culture, and yet we are creating a world where real culture in science, art and literature and particularly in human happiness is curiously and persistently lacking.

[INCOMPLETE DRAFT]

That insistent problem of human happiness is still with us. We American Negroes are no longer a happy people. We feel perhaps as never before the strain and bitterness of our struggle. Our little victories won here and there serve but to reveal the shame of our continuing semi-slavery and social caste. We are torn asunder within our own group because of the rasping pressure of the struggle without. We are as a race not simply dissatisfied, we are embodied Dissatisfaction.

What then is the unescapable task of the united college and vocational school? It is without a shadow of doubt a new broad and widely efficient vocational guidance and education for men and women of abilityn selected by the most careful tests and supported by a broad system of free scholarships. Out educational institutions must graduate to the world men fitted to take their place in real life by their knowledge, spirit, and ability to do what the world wants done. This vocational guidance must have for its object the training for men who can think clearly and function normally as physical beings; who have a knowledge of what human life on earth has been, and what it is now; and a knowledge of the constitution of the known universe. All that, and in addition to that, a training which will enable them to take a definite and intelligent part in the production of goods and in the furnishing of human services and in the democratic distribution of income so as to build civilization, encourage initiative, reward effort and support life.

This higher training and vocational guidance must turn out young men and women who are willing not only to do the work of the world today but to provide for the future world. Here then is the job before us. It is in a sense the same kind of duty that lies before the educated white man but it has an essential and important difference. If we make a place for ourselves in the industrial and business world today, this will be done because of our ability to establish a self-supporting organization sufficiently independent of the white organization to insure its stability, our economic survival and eventual incorporation into world industry. Many think this is impossible. But if it is impossible, our future economic survival is impossible.

49-32-46

It is not the province of this paper to tell how this problem will be settled. Indeed I could not tell you if I would. I merely stress the problem and emphasize the possibility of the solution. A generation ago those who doubted our survival said that no alien and separate nation could hope to survive within another nation; that we must be absorbed or perish. Times have changed. Today it is rapidly becoming true that only within some great and all inclusive empire or league can separate groups find freedom and protection and economic scope for development. The small separate nation is becoming increasinngly impossible and Briand's League of Europe shouts this from the housetops. This means that the possibility of our development and survival is clear and clear only as brains and devotion and skilled knowledge points the way

It demands sacrifice, and when I say sacrifice I mean sacrifice. I mean a real and definitive surrender of personal ease and satisfaction. I embellish it with no theological fairy tales of a rewarding God or a milk and honey Heaven. I am not trying to scare you into your duty by the fires of a mythical Hell. I am repeating the stark fact of survival of life and culture on this earth.

"Entbehren sollst du-sollst entbehren"

Thou shalt forego, shalt do without.

You must make the sacrifice of raising a family. I do not mean a flock or brood but enough children to ensure our physical survival. The present census will show that the American Negro of the educated class vision comes to you and comes quickly, of the education and problem before the American Negro, that problem will not be solved. You not only enter, therefore, today the worshipful company of that ancient body of men upon who a great center of learning, with ancient ceremony and trappings have laid the accolade of intellectual knighthood, but men who have become the thinkers and planners of a group of people in whose hands lies the economic and social destiny of the darker peoples of the world, and by that token of the world itself.

49-32-36

37-5-127

THE HOUSATONIC RIVER

Speech at the Annual Meeting of the Searles High School, Great Barrington, Massachusetts, July 21, 1930.

On hearing my speech, some of you may have thought of it as a joke and others may have expected an historical disquisition on the history of this valley--but my speech is neither of these. On the contrary it is a bit of philosophy, a little inquiry into the meaning of life in this valley, brought to my mind because of the condition of the Housatonic river. I am not going to try to answer all the questions which I have raised, but I do want to bring them to your mind.

In the earlier days, even before this Anniversary we are celebrating in Massachusetts now, this valley must have been a magnificent sight. The beautiful mountains on either side thickly covered with massive trees, then in the midst of it all, the Housatonic river flowing in great flood, winding here and there switching now and then into lakes which are our present meadows and so on, hurrying always toward the sea. And I think everyone would realize then and now that the river was the center of the picture. In a sense the mountains exist for the river--and no matter how much one might climb their sides, they look back upon the river as the central beauty of the panorama. What has happened? The thing that has happened in this valley has happened in hundreds of others. The town, the whole valley has turned its back upon the river. They have sought to get away from it. They have neglected it. They have used it as a sewer, a drain, a place for throwing their waste and their offal. Mills, homes, and farms have poured their dirt and refuse into it. Almost as if by miracle some beauty still remains--places where the river has gotten for a moment, free from its enemies and tormentors, and dark and exhausted under its tall trees has sunk as some vestiges of its former beauty and charm.

37-5-28

But for the most part the Housatonic has been transformed into an ugly thing. We have crossed it with the most unbeautiful of bridges and we have shifted the flow of its waters.

That choking has been done in many ways, not only by filling up the river with refuse, but by denuding the hillsides of their trees, and shutting off the brooks. I remember one brook in particular, for indeed, the whole Housatonic was close to my boyhood days. With every real Great Barrington boy I was inititiated into the mystery of water by swimming across the Big Ben. Always when I come back here I go down to look at the river in spite of the ofthe indignation and almost physical nausea which most of it causes me todayy-and then I remember that brook. It came down from a slow sloping of the Western hills; it wandered through grove and meadow, and finally miradile dictu it went right through my front yard. That brook had everything to delight a boy's soul--rushing falls, gurgling murmurs, placid lakes upon gravelly beds. It was abbeautiful and magnificent brook, and it brought its waters down across town and emptied them into the Housatonic. And then the world began to thwart and check it. I remember the angry despair of its murmur when in that same hill they put up ugly side walls to confine it; they sent it under Main Street in dark iron culverts; they worried it and suppressed it and filled it up until at last it died. Like a living thing, it disappeared and is not.

Now what is the meaning of this? Of course as I said before, the thing has happened in a hundred places. I remember being once in Jefferson City, Missouri years ago. The magnificent wall of watter, longest in the world, which is the Missouri-Mississippi came down past the city, and the city rejected it; turned its back upon it. It faced the dull dust of the prairie and it used the Missouri for sewage and freight trains, but there came at last a man with a vision, and when the new state house was built he set its plaza right out on the bluff facing the magnificence of the river, facing the whole golden West. and since that, diffidently but plainly, the city has been trying to turn round.

37-5-129

I have just been to Harvard celebrating my Class Anniversary, and while in Boston, I got lost. This is, of course, a common occupation in Boston--but I was particularly out of patience that I should become lost in Cambridge, because Cambridge I know much better. But Cambridge deceived me on account of the Charles river. In my boyhood the Charles river was nothing--it was a little lazy, neglected ditch, fit only for the muckers of Cambridgeport. No real gentleman from Harvard ever paid any attention to it. And thus, very easily I was deceived and mislead because the Charles river had become a park, flanked by beautiful driveways, crossed by arching of stone bridges, in other words, it had taken its place as a park forming a natural center of the beauty of Cambridge and Boston. Of course in those college days there were a few people on the Boston bank of the Charles who received the sunset on the waters in their back yards with a certain hospitality, but they were quite exceptional and queer, while now the river has come into its own. One might multiply these instances. Washington has only quite recently discovered the Potomac, while abroad the rivers have so long been worshiped that we forget the day when the Seine was anything but the great central highway of Paris, and the Rhine unthought of as a story of German civilization and progress. Even where rivers have been made to slave for men and carry their burdens, cities have learned that these hives of industry can be made also things of beauty. St. Louis, Memphis, and New Orleans are discovering this with the Mississippi, and I have stood on the park-like Nijni-Novgorod and seen the panorama of the Volga--that city was storn and maimed by war and famine and steel strife, and the park and the river was still beautiful.

What now is the meaning of all this for Great Barrington, and the veil of the Housatonic?

37-5-130

I take it that it is a greater suggestion than we are willing to accord it. I left New York this morning and rode into this valley with the same feeling that I always bring--that here is a more ordered and satisfying solution to the problem of live than in the hot and crowded and dirty city. Cities are artificial--they are nerve racking with noise, they manufacture by their very organization more social problems than their ingenuity is able to settle. Here is a great country--over nine-tenths of its area is empty and then there are these notoriously congested centers called cities and in these cities civilization is conceived and carried on.

But is this necessary? Why can we not in valleys like this have as efficient a life and surely one more gracious and satisfying. Evidently we can not because no sooner than one stops here any time than they begin to feel the bonds, the frustration of effort, the impossibility of effective carrying out of ideas and wishes and dreams. Why is this? It is impossible for us to answer this offhand. Many of the businesses are bound up with our imperfect technique of industry and communication; with matter of education; with matters of human contact; and so we go on leaving the country and rushing to the city, raising our sons and even our daughters with no idea of keeping them home it seems so perfectly rational to send them away to the hives of human culture. But I wonder if one phase of our difficulty does not come from our treatment of the Housatonic. We turn our backs upon the natural center of the river and try to make it Main St. Mr. Sinclair Lewis has proven to us that Main St. can not be the center of civilization. The river must be the center of this valley. Certainly it is the physical center, perhaps it is the spiritual center, perhaps the very freeing of spirit which will come from our attempt to do the [illegible] not including our greatest source of beauty and completeness, and degrading it with filth and refuse. Perhaps from that very freeing of spirit will come other freedoms and inspirations and aspirations which may be to the whole vast problem of country life and thediffusion and diversification and enrichening of culture throughout this land.

37-6-131

enough I have noticed one or two little things which may indicate change. I am not quite sure why the Sarles High School was built upon the banks of the Housatonic. Perhaps of course it was simply another way of carrying out the idea that school houses are tobe hidden. In the West one often sees an imposing building in the main thoroughfare of the city, but not so here--we hide our school houses in apologetic places and perhaps that is why this school was built on the banks of the Housatonic instead of on Main Street. On the other hand, it may be that some thoughtful person saw far beyond the present and grasped the idea that they were putting this institution on what was the natural great highway of the valley. They may have looked forward to the time when parks and boulevards would line the redeemed river; then the best people would not climb the hills to get away from the valley, but turn about and descend to its gracious invitation--when buildings and and smiling children would make the whole valley glad and the river would come into its own again.

And there is a second bit that is helpful. Up on the steep slope of the river in the upper part of the town there is a house where I lived for a while with blood dripping from its windows--blood or/red paint and down back of that old house was a magnificent vista of river, vast dark trees and hills and rocks. A few years ago coming into town I found that somebody just opened that place as to a little playground--the merest shadow of a thing, so tiny that I feel children are a bit in awe of it. At any rate it is usually empty, andyet that tiny bit overshadows the whole park system. With this beginning we may clear the river, we may even induce the mills if we can find out who owns them, to stop pouring their refuse into the river. It is merely a habit and not a necessity. And so I have ventured to call to the attention of the graduates of the Searles High School this bit of philosophy of living in this valley, that we should rescue the Housatonic and clean it as we have never thought to clean it before and restore its ancient beauty and make it the center of the town, of the valley, and perhaps who knows, of a new way of civilized life.

37-5-32

Manuscript

48-12-17 W. E. B. DuBois (1)

BESIDE THE STILL WATERS

This is peculiarly the occasion to say a word of the relationship between the theatre and the American Negro. The stage still retains among us something of freedom and the forward gaze. Behind the footlights one is permitted to examine and discuss Truth under circumstances where literature is stifled, painting inarticulate, sculpture choked of convention, architecture drowned in waves of monstrosity and music fettered by death.

But this continuing freedom of dramatic art is due to no courage of managers or merit of dramatists and is threatened not only by the well recognized fatty degeneration of musical comedy but by that secret, internal and devastating malady which attacks an art which is free to treat the truth and yet afraid to look it fair in the face. This is the present attitude of the American theatre as it faces the Negro.

(2)

The stranger from the stars bursting in upon earth today would, 48-12-18 without shadow of a doubt or moment of hesitancy, fasten upon the plight of the black man in America as the most dramatic stuff of the modern world. Conceive this harsh and heavy thrust of dark and primitive peoples out of the soft green and gold and clan tradition of the tropics into the spiritual anarchy of the French Revolution and the frozen puritanism of Victoria. // For centuries fish fed on flesh across the whole Atlantic. The isles of the Caribbean shrieked to Boston and New Orleans; black slavery swept the valley of the Mississippi and fought white labor ~~and~~ on Rockies and Appalachians. // Nothing escaped it—neither religion nor philosophy, literature nor art, ~~family, town~~ science nor government. // Across a continent, across a world, the horror and tragedy and farce of this stupendous drama flew, and beside it men and women danced, and above it rolled a never-to-be forgotten song. The souls of stricken millions descended into ~~this~~ Hell ~~of every possible~~

(3)

~~degradation and in~~ and the third century arose again from the dead—with what blood and prickling pain—with such exquisite horror of hurt as humanity has seldom known. // Every known element of human drama, every device of theatrical effect was here—the crucifixtion of motherhood, the murder of ~~babes~~ children, the rape of homes; piteous debasement and nameless exhaltation of the spirit of man. There was lacking no impudence of wealth nor depths of uttermost pits of poverty. There was the sting of whips, the fangs of dogs, the laughter of power, the refinement of cruelty and the sobbing abasement of the lowest of the low—dragged slowly and bitterly and relentlessly out over endless years. // This is the thing that today America makes merry over. It is our major amusement. It is material for clowns and braying asses. It is our national and perennial joke.

Yet for four hundred years of the mad warp and woof of this land's history, the black and crimson thread of Africa has dominated every pattern, and not the double ~~mouths~~ tongues of all the Dunnings and Charles Beards shall alter the red record of one jot of it. 48-12-20

Before this mightiest of human dramas, save here and there a lucid interval, the American theatre has sat distraught, dumb and stupid, with a vacant grin on its face: afraid of the truth, cowed by the tragedy, aghast at the very intricacy and endless implications of the plots. American playwrights have strained their inwards to submerge this drama into farce; to turn the piteous tragedy of the Negro into cheap pornographic bathos; to paint this all too human life into a degenerate reflection of their own sadistic desires. Until today on stage and in literature, in painting, in all art, save alone in music, the souls of black folk have been submerged in fetid filth and white pimps who finance and exploit black prostitutes in "Nigger Heaven" have quite concealed the blazing Hell beneath and persuaded a complacent world that Harlem has no light of common day; that underneath ~~this tear-stained bit of earth seethe no blazing depths of hell.~~ our sale of laughter lie no fools of bitter tears.

Not only has the American theatre refused to face the drama of the

48-12-21

(5)

Negro problem, but it has opposed every effort of the Negro himself to find dramatic expression on the stage. It is not enough, in this great and free commonwealth of the spirit of man, that ~~the chief~~ most training schools of drama and ~~painting~~ art are closed to black folk; it is not enough that in ~~the~~ Annual nationwide radio audition no voice of an angel in a black skin, ~~though it were the voice of angels,~~ may be heard; it is not enough that the American schools at Fontainbleau, supported by the leaders in American painting, sculpture and architecture, have sought to extend the American color line across ~~Europe~~ France all this perhaps must be tolerated and even awaited in arts dominated by money, by the private profit ideal and by cheap and smug convention. But in the freer air of the drama, despite its all too evident pandering to monopoly and the intellectual mob, it is astonishing to realize the fight which the black actor has had to gain the merest shadow of foothold on Broadway. No one is child enough to believe that a black skin makes an actor, or that the suffering of a people creates of itself the delicate art to portray it. But when the artist does appear, proven and clear, it is almost unbelievable that his fellow white artists would so long and so persistently deny him full recognition.

(6)

48-12-22

When Europe of the early 19th Century recognized the great Jewess, Rachel, and the great Negro, Aldridge, as the two outstanding leaders of the stage, whom governments and science and art delighted to honor, that black man could not put foot on a single legitimate stage in the land of his birth. But even after slavery, and from 1870 down nearly to our day, the Negro actor could appear at Court only as the ~~white~~ king's fool, with cap and bells, with quip and joke, ready over his own heartbreak to guffaw lustily and dance fantastically for the massed amusement of morons. Even when the unchangeable logic of a particular plot demanded black characters, up until yesterday, even these parts must be taken by white folk with blackened faces, unknown dialect and an unusually dumb mental equipment. This nonsense in time went beyond the limit ~~even~~ of New York complacency/and today/not even burnt cork/could save a miserable play/although supported by the bad acting/of the royal family.

This hesitancy/of our freest form of art/really to be free/—this refusal of managers,/playwrights/and players/to use normally and intelligently,/the abundant stuff of dramatic material/and the not infrequent genius in acting/which a nation within a nation furnishes//a black nation greater than Ireland, Belgium, Austria or Portugal—a nation equal in numbers to Egypt, Persia, Czechoslovakia and all Scandinavia/—this studied neglect/of the most dramatic material in America/has already reacted/and will react/on the theatre in the United States./ A freedom unused/is perverted or lost./ If the stage dare not/frankly and fully portray the Negro problem/because of fear and snobbery,/—because of a provincial mentality/born of the slave oligarchy,/spawned south of the Mason and Dixon's line/and transplanted to the congenial concrete sidewalks of New York/—the American theatre will find itself/with all the greater ease/and easier logic/denied the right to discuss sex and war, socialism and Russia, liquor and wealth,/and anything which/at anytime an entrenched autocracy or a prurient puritanism/or a Nordic impudence/ may guard/with the shackles of censorship.

48-12-24

The abiding refuge/of our optimism/is the slow growth of normal/ dramatic instinct/among us/even anent the Negro;/the slow expansion of a national receptive audience/unafraid of racial problems./ True it is that the fear still lurks;/for the stage is still slow/and the effective audience too small/—and already something may have been eternally lost/ in creative genius, dramatic ability/and the unhampered critical spirit;/ but "The Green Pastures"/has helped our hope/ And it has helped/not so much in form and word and authorship/as in the deft and subtle marvel of its interpretation./ For skillful as the written play may be, the secret of its triumph/lies in its interpretation by Negro actors/and above all in the high and delicate genius/of Richard Berry Harrison.

48-12-25

(9)

Even here/ an abundant satisfaction/ is haunted by a bleak memory. I have known Richard Harrison for thirty-five years./ He stands before you tonight/ with smiling lips and tranquil courage of a high heart./ But I know—I know what crucifixion this man has suffered./ Here is a white man/ of singular capacity and noble beauty/ who had ~~the accident of~~ a black great-grandfather/ And who because of that fact/ and that alone--/ because of a truth he ~~was too proud~~ saw no reason to deny or conceal,/ he has been given/ in this land of the free/ and home of the brave/ ~~during a life of nearly seventy years,~~ from 1864-1930-66 years no real opportunity, no fair chance, no liberty for the genius that always lay in him, until 1930/ and even then almost by accident.

What the author of this play/ expected in its presentation, I do not know,/ but you and I know full well/ and of a certainty/ what the first audiences expected—what any average American audience expects/ when Negro actors appear in a Negro play. They expected amusement; they expected slap-stick and broad farce;/ they expected filth. They licked dry lips/ for "The Green Pastures" 48-12-26 of their imagination/ would be gaudy with food and fun,/ and of the Still Waters ~~beyond~~ beneath they recked nothing./

(10)

If Richard Harrison/ had learned to dance clog/ and make faces/ in his youth,/ he might have riches now./ But his demand for sincere drama, for the sting of tragedy and the high humor of true comedy,/ had led him long years/ face to face with hunger and ~~threadbare~~ poverty, straight on toward careless neglect./ He was not one to complain./ He has the high ~~clothes on to~~ and African gift of laughter./ He too has looked at death and smiled.

At last the closed gate opened,/ so casually, so carelessly, that Harrison himself was not sure of what he saw—not sure it was The Gate.

Someone was needed/ to portray God/ as a nigger minstrel/ on Broadway. 11 But it had to be delicately done/ There were churches and censors to avoid,/ there were susceptibilities to be soothed/ and creeds to be molli-

48-12-27

(11)

field./ The audience must surely/be tickled and amused,/but its mirth must be in bounds/subdued to something like decorum/at least in spots.

This called for subtlety in interpretation/and understanding/for a deep and human knowledge of mankind,/especially of that manner of men/who live behind/the veil of color,/yet are men./ Human beings, whether dark and singing slaves/or white and bored seekers of Broadway pleasure,/must/on this stage/see God and live./ Who could do this miracle of ~~a play~~? acting?

When manager and playwright/turned to find such a man/they faced a wall. They knew few Negro actors. To Broadway/the Negro was not an actor,/he was a vaudeville turn./ True it was/that Charles Gilpin,/by the tragedy of his own damnation/had, with dying flair of genius/and ~~the~~ clairvoyance of O'Neill,/forced the Negro defeatist psychology/partially across the footlights./ Half willingly thereafter,/Broadway endured patronizingly/Robeson and Rose McClendon/for limited periods/and with the clearly expressed proviso,/that the author engage in the climax to kill the black hero/or destroy him/or rend his soul from his body./ Then the white audience/could depart/secure in the knowledge/that all Negro aspiration and effort,/by the very constitution of the universe,/must ever end/in annihilation and defeat, frustration and death.

48-12-28

(12)

But this climax/would not suit "The Green Pastures"// Even on the American stage, God must be reasonably successful;/and that Richard Harrison almost as a last resort/was offered the opportunity/to try this role was ~~almost~~ a matter of chance.

What he ~~did~~ accomplished, the nation knows./ By the breadth of a hair and half-turn of a phrase—by a gesture & silence—he guided a genial comedy into a great and human drama./ Small wonder/that only those who see the miracle/can gauge the genius of its doing/or realize the rare perfection/of its detailed accomplishment./ The south, the west,/which have not seen the actor and the play/are curious and skeptical concerning it./ With puzzled frown/they inquire into its impression and results/and shake vague heads./ One can clearly understand how England, reading the text alone, can not escape the feeling that its content must either be blasphemy or farce. And yet no human soul witnessing a performance can doubt the lure of its human kindliness and the mighty tragedy beneath the deep and reverent guidance of a great actor.

What you then as audience and 2 as authors have unleashed and unbound in this great soul — what you have freed and unfettered in a man and a race, is but earnest of what actors you may see and what drama you may evoke, if instead of hiding your heads in the sand and scurrying abroad to borrow for the American stage the second-hand situations of Paris and Vienna, — you open purblind eyes and glance about you.

This meeting tonight is a tribute to Richard Harrison — a tribute belated and artifical, but none the less sincere. He is in his charm and courtesy, his tact and tolerant philosophy, one to be emulated and envied. Toward this distracting problem of race, he is far finer than many of his darker friends, for he walks without plaint or protest even in his hurt, while I, by God, front earth and high Heaven with insistent and unceasing clamor against this throttling of the Art of beauty, against this enchaining of the human spirit — against, to be sure, its cruelty and pain, but even more, against its crass stupidity.

W. E. B. Du Bois.

BESIDE THE STILL WATERS

By W. E. B. Du Bois

This is peculiarly the occasion to say a word of the relationship between the theatre and the American Negro. The stage still retains among us something of freedom and the forward gaze. Behind the footlights one is permitted to examine and discuss Truth under circumstances where literature is stifled, painting inarticulate, sculpture choked of convention, architecture drowned in waves of monstrosity and music fettered by death.

But this continuing freedom of dramatic art is due to no courage of managers or merit of dramatists and is threatened not only by the well recognized fatty degeneration of musical comedy but by that secret, internal and devastating malady which attacks an art which is free to treat the truth and yet afraid to look it fair in the face. This is the present attitude of the American theatre as it faces the Negro.

The stranger from the stars bursting in upon earth today would, without shadow of a doubt or moment of hesitancy, fasten upon the plight of the black man in America as the most dramatic stuff of the modern world. Conceive this harsh and heavy thrust of dark and primitive peoples out of the soft green and gold and clantradition of the tropics into the spiritual anarchy of the French Revolution and the frozen puritanism of Victoria. For centuries fish fed on flesh across the whole Atlantic. The isles of the Caribbean shrieked to Boston and New Orleans; black slavery swept the valley of the Mississippi and fought white labor on Rockies and Appalachians. Nothing escaped it—neither religion nor philosophy, literature nor art, science nor government. Across a continent, across a world, the horror and tragedy and farce of this stupendous drama flew, and beside it men and women danced, and above it rolled a never-to-be forgotten song. The souls of stricken millions descended into Hell and the third century arose again from the dead—with what blood and prickling pain—with such exquisite horror of hurt as humanity has seldom known. Every known element of human drama, every device of theatrical effect was here—the crucifixtion of motherhood, the murder of children, the rape of homes; piteous debasement and nameless exhaltation of the spirit of man. There was lacking no impudence of wealth nor depths of uttermost pits of poverty. There was the sting of whips, the fangs of dogs, the laughter of power, the refinement of cruelty and the sobbing abasement of the lowest of the low—dragged slowly and bitterly and relentlessly out over endless years. This is the thing that today America makes merry over. It is our major amusement. It is material for clowns and braying asses. It is our national and perennial joke.

4/8-12-1

Yet for four hundred years of the mad warp and woof of this land's history, the black and crimson thread of Africa has dominated every pattern, and not the double tongues of all the Dunnings and Charles Beards shall alter the red record of one jot of it.

Before this mightiest of human dramas, save here and there a lucid interval, the American theatre has sat distraught, dumb and stupid, with a vacant grin on its face: afraid of the truth, cowed by the tragedy, aghast at the very intricacy and endless implications of the plots. American playwrights have strained their inwards to submerge this drama into farce; to turn the piteous tragedy of the Negro into cheap pornographic bathos; to paint this all too human life into a degenerate reflection of their own sadistic desires. Until today on stage and in literature, in painting, in all art, save alone in music, the souls of black folk have been submerged in fetid filth and white pimps who finance and exploit black prostitutes in "Nigger Heaven" have quite concealed the blazing Hell beneath and persuaded a complacent world that Harlem has no light of common day; that underneath our sale of laughter lie no pools of bitter tears.

48-12-2

Not only has the American theatre refused to face the drama of the Negro problem, but it has opposed every effort of the Negro himself to find dramatic expression on the stage. It is not enough, in this great and free commonwealth of the spirit of man, that most training schools of drama and art are closed to black folk; it is not enough that in the annual nationwide radio audition no voice of an angel in a black skin may be heard; it is not enough that the American schools at Fontainbleau, supported by the leaders in American painting, sculpture and architecture, have sought to extend the American color line across France—all this perhaps must be tolerated and even awaited in arts dominated by money, by the private profit ideal and by cheap and smug convention. But in the freer air of the drama, despite its all too evident pandering to monopoly and the intellectual mob, it is astonishing to realize the fight which the black actor has had to gain the merest shadow of foothold on Broadway. No one is child enough to believe that a black skin makes an actor, or that the suffering of a people creates of itself the delicate art to portray it. But when the artist does appear, proven and clear, it is almost unbelievable that his fellow white artists would so long and so persistently deny him full recognition.

48-12-3

When Europe of the early 19th Century recognized the great Jewess, Rachel, and the great Negro, Aldridge, as the two outstanding leaders of the stage, whom governments and science and art delighted to honor, that black man could not put foot on a single legitimate stage in the land of his birth. But even after slavery, and from 1870 down nearly to our day, the Negro actor could appear at Court only as the king's fool, with cap and bells, with quip and joke, ready over his own heartbreak to guffaw lustily and dance fantastically for the massed amusement of morons. Even when the unchangeable logic of a particular plot demanded black characters, up until yesterday, even these parts must be taken by white folk with blackened faces, unknown dialect and an unusually dumb mental equipment. This nonsense in time went beyond the limit of New York complacency and today not even burnt cork could save a miserable play although supported by the bad acting of the royal family.

This hesitancy of our freest form of art really to be free—this refusal of managers, playwrights and players to use normally and intelligently, the abundant stuff of dramatic material and the not infrequent genius in acting which a nation within a nation furnishes—a black nation greater than Ireland, Belgium, Austria or Portugal—a nation equal in numbers to Egypt, Persia, Czechoslovakia and all Scandinavia—this studied neglect of the most dramatic material in America has already reacted and will react on the theatre in the United States. A freedom unused is perverted or lost. If the stage dare not frankly and fully portray the Negro problem because of fear and snobbery,—because of a provincial mentality born of the slave oligarchy, spawned south of the Mason and Dixon's line and transplanted to the congenial concrete sidewalks of New York—the American theatre will find itself with all the greater ease and easier logic denied the right to discuss sex and war, socialism and Russia, liquor and wealth, and anything which at anytime an entrenched autocracy or a prurient puritanism or a Nordic impudence may guard with the shackles of censorship.

The abiding refuge of our optimism is the slow growth of normal dramatic instinct among us even anent the Negro; the slow expansion of a national receptive audience unafraid of racial problems. True it is that the fear still lurks; for the stage is still slow and the effective audience too small—and already something may have been eternally lost in creative genius, dramatic ability and the unhampered critical spirit but "The Green Pastures" has helped our hope, and it has helped not so much in form and word and authorship as in the deft and subtle marvel of its interpretation. For skillful as the written play may be, the secret of its triumph lies in its interpretation by Negro actors, and above all in the high and delicate genius of Richard Berry Harrison.

48-12-1

Even here an abundant satisfaction is haunted by a bleak memory. I have known Richard Harrison for thirty-five years. He stands before you tonight with smiling lips and tranquil courage of a high heart. But I know—I know what crucifixion this man has suffered. Here is a white man of singular capacity and noble beauty who had a black great-grandfather. And who because of that fact and that alone—because of a truth he saw no reason to deny or conceal,—he has been given in this land of the free and home of the brave, from 1864-1930--66 years, no real opportunity, no fair chance, no liberty for the genius that always lay in him, until 1930 and even then almost by accident.

What the author of this play expected in its presentation, I do not know, but you and I know full well and of a certainity what the first audiences expected—what any average American audience expects when Negro actors appear in a Negro play. They expected amusement; they expected slap-stick and broad farce; they expected filth. They licked dry lips for "The Green Pastures" of their imagination would be gaudy with food and fun, and of the Still Waters beneath they recked nothing.

If Richard Harrison had learned to dance clog and make faces in his youth, he might have riches now. But his demand for sincere drama, for the sting of tragedy and the high humor of true comedy, had led him long years face to face with hunger and poverty, straight on toward careless neglect. He was not one to complain. He has the high and African gift of laughter. He too has looked at death and smiled.

At last the closed gate opened, so casually, so carelessly, that Harrison himself was not sure of what he saw—not sure it was The Gate.

Someone was needed to portray God as a nigger minstrel on Broadway.

48-12-5

But it had to be delicately done. There were churches and censors to avoid, there were susceptibilities to be soothed and creeds to be mollified. The audience must surely be tickled and amused, but its mirth must be in bounds, subdued to something like decorum at least in spots.

This called for subtlety in interpretation and understanding—for a deep and human knowledge of mankind, especially of that manner of men who live behind the veil of color, yet are men. Human beings, whether dark and singing slaves or white and bored seekers of Broadway pleasure, must on this stage see God and live. Who could do this miracle of acting?

When manager and playwright turned to find such a man they faced a wall. They knew few Negro actors. To Broadway the Negro was not an actor, he was a vaudeville turn. True it was that Charles Gilpin, by the tragedy of his own damnation had, with dying flair of genius and clairvoyance of O'Neill, forced the Negro defeatist psychology partially across the footlights. Half willingly thereafter, Broadway endured patronizingly Robeson and Rose McClendon for limited periods and with the clearly expressed proviso, that the author engage in the climax to kill the black hero, or destroy him or rend his soul from his body. Then the white audience could depart secure in the knowledge that all Negro aspiration and effort, by the very constitution of the universe, must ever end in annihilation and defeat, frustration and death.

But this climax would not suit "The Green Pastures". Even on the American stage, God must be reasonably successful; and that Richard Harrison almost as a last resort was offered the opportunity to try this role was a matter of chance.

What he accomplished, the nation knows. By the breadth of a hair and half-turn of a phrase—by a gesture and a silence, he guided a genial comedy into a great and human drama. Small wonder that only who see the miracle can gauge the genius of its doing or realize the rare perfection of its detailed accomplishment. The south, the west, which have not seen the actor and the play are curious and skeptical concerning it. With puzzled frown they inquire into its impression and results and shake vague heads. One can clearly understand how England, reading the text alone, can not escape the feeling that its content must either be blasphemy or farce. And yet no human soul witnessing a performance can doubt the lure of its human kindliness and the mighty tragedy beneath the deep and reverent guidance of a great actor.

48-12-6

What you then as audience and two as authors have unleashed and unbound in this great soul—what you have freed and unfettered in a man and a race, is but earnest of what actors you may see and what drama you may evoke, if instead of hiding your heads in the sand and scurrying abroad to borrow for the American stage the second-hand situations of Paris and Vienna,—you open purblind eyes and glance about you.

48-12-1

This meeting tonight is a tribute to Richard Harrison—a tribute belated and artifical, but none the less sincere. He is in his charm and courtesy, his tact and tolerant philosophy, one to be emulated and envied. Toward this distracting problem of race, he is far finer than many of his darker friends, for he walks without plaint or protest even in his hurt, while I, by God, front earth and high Heaven with insistent and unceasing clamor against this throttling of the Art, of beauty, against this enchaining of the human spirit—against, to be sure, its cruelty and pain, but even more, against its crass stupidity.

B E S I D E T H E S T I L L W A T E R S

This is peculiarly the occasion to say a word of the relationship between the theatre and the American Negro. The stage still retains, among us, something of freedom and the forward gaze. Behind the footlights one is permitted to examine and discuss ~~tents~~ Truth under circumstances where literature is stifled, painting inarticulate, sculpture choked of convention, architecture drowned in waves of monstrosity and music fettered by death.

But this continuing freedom of dramatic art is due to no courage of managers or merit of dramatists, and is threatened not only by the well recognized fatty degeneration of musical comedy, but by that secret, internal and devastating malady which attacks an art ~~which is~~ free to treat the truth and yet afraid to look it fair in the face. This is the present attitude of the American theatre as it faces the Negro.

The stranger from the stars, bursting in upon earth today would, without shadow of a doubt or moment of hesitancy, fasten upon the plight of the black man in America as the most dramatic stuff of the modern world. Conceive this harsh and heavy thrust of dark and primitive peoples, out of clan tradition

the soft green and gold of the tropics into the spiritual anarchy of the French Revolution and the ~~broken~~ FROZEN puritanism of Victoria. For centuries, fish fed on flesh across the whole Atlantic. The isles of the Caribbean shrieked to Boston and New Orleans; black slavery swept the valley of the Mississippi and fought white labor ~~and~~ on Rockies and Appalachians. Nothing escaped it - neither religion nor philosophy, literature nor art, ~~family, town~~ science nor government. Across a continent, across a world, the horror and tragedy and farce of this stupendous drama flew and ~~beside~~ beneath it men and women danced, and above it rolled a never-to-be-forgotten song. The souls of stricken millions descended into ~~this hell of every possible degradation,~~ Hell and in the third century arose again from the dead - with what blood and prickling pain - with ~~such~~ what exquisite ~~horror~~ sting of hurt as humanity has seldom known. Every known element of human drama, every device of theatrical effect was here - the crucifixtion of motherhood, the murder of babes, the rape of homes, piteous debasement and nameless exhaltation of the spirit of man. There was lacking no ~~impudence~~ arrogance of wealth nor depths ~~of uttermost pits~~ of poverty. There was the sting of whips the fangs of dogs, the laughter of power, the refinement of cruelty and the sobbing abasement of the lowest of the low - dragged slowly and bitterly and relentlessly out over endless years. This is the thing that today America makes merry over. It is our major amusement. It is material for clowns and braying asses. It is our national and perennial joke.

38-12-223

Yet for four hundred years of the mad warp and woof of this land's history, the black and crimson thread of Africa ~~has~~ dominated every pattern; and not the double tongues ~~mouths~~ of all the Dunnings and Charles Beards shall alter the red record of one jot of it.

Before this mightiest of human dramas, save here and there, a lucid interval, the American theatre has sat distraught, dumb and stupid with a vacant grin on its face: afraid of the truth, cowed by the tragedy, aghast at the very intricacy and endless implications of the plot. American playwrights have strained their inwards to ~~submerge~~ transmute this drama into farce; to turn the ~~piteous~~ grim tragedy of the Negro into cheap pornographic bathos; to paint this all too human life into a degenerate reflection of ~~their own~~ sadistic desires. Until today, on stage and in literature, ~~in painting~~ nearly in all art save ~~alone in~~ alone music, the souls of black folk have been submerged in fetid filth and white pimps who finance and exploit black prostitutes in "Nigger Heaven" have ~~quite~~ persuaded a complacent world that Harlem has no light of common day; that underneath ~~this tear-stained bit~~ have quite concealed the blazing Hell beneath;

our vale of laughter hi no floods of bitter tears
~~of earth | see the no blazing depths of hell.~~

Not only | has the American theatre | refused to face the drama of the Negro problem, but it has opposed every effort of the Negro himself | to find dramatic expression on the stage. | It is not enough, in this great and free commonwealth | of the spirit of man, that ~~the chief~~ most training schools of drama and painting are closed to black folk; it is not enough that in ~~the~~ nationwide radio audition no voice, of an angel in a black skin ~~though it were the voice of angels~~ | may be heard; it is not enough | that the American schools at Fontainblew, supported by the leaders in American painting, sculpture and architecture have sought to extend the American color line to France ~~across Europe~~ - all this | perhaps | must be tolerated and even awaited | in arts dominated by money, by the private profit ideal | and by cheap and smug convention. But in the freer air of the drama, despite its all too evident | pandering to monopoly and the intellectual mob, | it is astonishing to realize | the fight which the black actor has had | to gain the ~~merest~~ shadow of foothold | on Broadway. // No one is child enough | to believe that a black skin makes an actor | or that the suffering of a people | creates of itself | the delicate art to portray it. But when the artist does appear, proven and clear, it is almost unbelievable | that his fellow white artists would so long | and so persistently | deny him ~~full~~ recognition.

When Europe | of the early 19th Century | recognized the great Jewess Rachel and the great Negro Aldridge, as the two outstanding leaders of the stage, whom governments and science and art delighted to honor, that black man could not put foot on a single legitimate stage in the land of his birth. ~~But even~~ And after slavery and from 1870 down nearly to our day, the Negro actor could appear at the white Court of Monnis only as ~~the white~~ king's fool, with cap and bells, with quip and joke, ready over his own heartbreak to guffaw lustily and dance fantastically for the massed amusement of morons. Even when the unchangeable logic of a particular plot demanded black characters, up until yesterday, ~~even~~ these parts must be taken by white folk with blackened faces, unknown dialect and an unusually dumb mental equipment. This nonsense in time went beyond the limit of New York complacency and today ~~not~~ even burnt cork could not save a miserable play although supported by the ~~best~~ bad acting of the royal family.

38-12-225

38-12-226

This hesitancy of our freest form of art really to be free - this refusal of managers, playwrights and players to use normally and intelligently the abundant stuff of dramatic material and the not infrequent genius in acting which a nation within a nation furnishes - a black nation greater than Ireland, or Belgium, Austria or Portugal - a nation equal in numbers to Egypt, Persia, Czechoslovakia and all Scandinavia - this studied neglect of the most dramatic material in America has already reacted and over reacts on the theatres in the United States. A freedom unused is perverted or lost. If the stage dare not frankly and fully portray the Negro problem because of fear and snobbery, because of a provincial mentality born of the slave oligarchy, spawned south of the Mason and Dixon's line and transplanted to the congenial concrete sidewalks of New York - the American theatre will find itself with all the greater ease and easier logic denied the right to discuss sex and war, socialism and Russia, liquor and wealth and anything or which at anytime an entrenched autocracy or a prurient puritanism or a Nordic impudence may guard with the shackles of censorship. The abiding refuge of our optimism is the slow growth of normal dramatic instinct among us even anent the Negro; the slow expansion of a national receptive audience unafraid of racial problems. True it is that the fear still lurks, for the stage is slow and the effective audience too small - and already something may have been eternally lost in creative genius, dramatic ability and the unhampered critical spirit; but "The Green Pastures" has helped our hope. And it has helped not so much in form and word and authorship as in the deft and subtle marvel of its interpretation. For skillful as ~~its~~ the written ~~play~~ plot may be, the secret of the triumph of this play lies in its interpretation by Negro actors and above all in the high and delicate genius of Richard Berry Harrison.

38-12-222

Even here an abundant satisfaction is haunted by a bleak memory. I have known Richard Harrison for thirty-five years. He stands before you tonight with smiling lips and the tranquil courage of a high heart. But I know - I know what crucifixion this man has suffered. Here is a white man of singular capacity and noble beauty who had ~~the accident of~~ a black great grandfather. And who because of that fact and that alone - because of a truth he ~~was too proud~~ saw no reason to deny or conceal, he ~~has been~~ was given in this land of the free and home of the brave, ~~during~~ a ~~life of nearly seventy years~~, no opportunity, no chance, no liberty for the genius that always lay in him from 1864 until 1930 and ~~even~~ then almost by accident.

What the author of this play expected in its presentation, I do no know, but you and I know full well and of a certainty what the first audiences expected - what any average American audience expects when Negro actors appear in a Negro play. They expected amusement; they expected slap-stick and broad farce; they expected filth. They licked dry lips, for "The Green Pastures" of their imagination would be gaudy with food and fun and of the Still Water, ~~beyond~~ beneath they recked nothing.

38-12-226

If Richard Harrison had learned to dance clog and make faces in his youth, he might have riches now. But his demand for sincere drama, for the sting of tragedy and the high humor of true comedy, has led him long years face to face with hunger and ~~threadbare clothes on to careless~~ poverty straight on toward an end neglect. He was not one to complain. He has the high and African gift of laughter. He too has looked at death and smiled.

~~At last~~ The closed gate opened, opened so casually, so carelessly, that Harrison himself was not sure of what he saw - not sure it was the gate.

Someone was needed to portray God as a nigger minstrel on Broadway. But it had to be delicately done. There were churches and censors to avoid, there were susceptibilities to be soothed and creeds to be mollified. The audience must surely be tickled and amused, but its mirth must be in bounds, subdued to something like decorum at least in spots.

This called for subtlety in interpretation and understanding - for a deep and human knowledge of mankind, especially of that manner of men who live behind the veil of color, yet are men. Human beings, whether dark and singing slaves, or white and bored seekers of Broadway pleasure, must on this stage see God and live. Who could do this miracle of ~~a play~~? acting?

When manager and playwright turned to find such a man they faced a wall. They knew few Negro actors. To Broadway the Negro was not an actor, he was a vaudeville turn. True it was that Charles Gilpin, by the tragedy of his own damnation had, with ~~the~~ dying flair of genius and ~~the~~ clairvoyance of O'Neill forced the Negro defeatist psychology partially across the footlights. Half willingly thereafter Broadway endured patronizingly, Robeson and Rose McClendon for limited periods and with the clearly expressed proviso, that the author engage, in the climax, to kill the black hero, or destroy him or rend his soul from his body. Then the white audience could depart secure in the knowledge that all Negro aspiration and effort, by the very constitution of the universe, must ever end in annihilation and defeat, frustration and death.

But this climax would not suit "The Green Pastures." Even on the American stage, God must be reasonably successful; and that Richard Harrison ~~almost~~ as a last resort was offered the opportunity to try this role was almost a matter of chance.

38-12-230

What he accomplished did, the nation knows. By the breadth of a hair and half tone of a phrase, by silence & the lifting of a hand he guided a genial comedy into a great and human drama. Small wonder that only those who see the miracle can gauge the genius of its doing, or realize the rare perfection of its detailed accomplishment. The south, the west, which have not seen the actor and the play, are curious and skeptical concerning it. With puzzled frown they inquire into its impression and results, and shake vague heads. One can clearly understand how England, reading the text alone, can not escape the feeling that its ~~content~~ message must either be blasphemy or farce. And yet no human soul witnessing a performance can doubt the lure of its human kindliness and the mighty tragedy beneath the deep and reverant guidance of a great actor.

What you then as audience and two as author have unleashed and unbound in this great soul - what you have freed and unfettered in a man and a race, is but earnest of what actors you may see and what drama you may evoke if instead of hiding your heads in the sand and then scurrying abroad to borrow for the American stage the second hand situations of Paris and Vienna, you open your fur blind eyes and glance about you.

This meeting tonight is a tribute to Richard Harrison - a tribute belated and artifical, but none the less sincere.

38-12-231

38-12-232

He is in his charm and courtesy, his tact and tolerant philosophy, one to be emulated and envied. / Toward this distracting problem of race, he is far finer than many of his darker friends, for he walks without plaint or protest even in his hurt; while I, by God, front earth and high Heaven, with insistent and unceasing clamor against this throttling of the Arts of beauty, against this enchaining of the human spirit -- against, to be sure, its cruelty and pain but even more against its crass stupidity.

W. E. B. DuBOIS.

[INCOMPLETE]

~~A FORWARD.~~

BESIDE THE STILL WATERS.

This is peculiarly the time to say a word of the relationship between the theatre and the American Negro. The stage still retains among us something of freedom and the forward gaze. Behind the footlights one is permitted to examine and discuss Truth under circumstances where literature is stifled, painting inarticulate, sculpture choked of convention, architecture drowned in waves of monstrosity and music fettered by death.

But this continuing freedom of dramatic art is due to no courage of managers nor merit of dramatists, and is threatened not only by the well recognized fatty degeneration of musical comedy, but by that secret, internal and devastating malady which attacks an art which is free to treat the truth, and yet afraid to look it fair in the face. This is the present attitude of the American theatre as it faces the Negro.

41-6-357

The stranger from the stars bursting in upon earth today would, without shadow of a doubt or moment of hesitancy, fasten upon the plight of the black man in America as the most dramatic stuff of the modern world. Conceive this harsh and heavy thrust of dark and primitive peoples, out of the soft green and gold and clan tradition of the tropics, into the anarchy of the Reformation and French Revolution and the puritanism of Victoria! For centuries fish fed on flesh across the whole Atlantic. The isles of the Caribbean shrieked to Boston and New Orleans; black slavery swept the valley of the Mississippi and fought white labor on Rockies and Appalachians.

Nothing escaped it—neither religion nor philosophy, literature nor art, science nor government. Across a continent, across a world, the horror and tragedy and farce of this stupendous drama flew, and beside it men and women danced, and above it rolled a never-to-be forgotten song.

The souls of stricken millions descended into Hell and the third century arose again from the dead—with what blood and prickling pain—with such exquisite horror of hurt, as humanity has seldom known.

Every known element of human drama, every device of theatrical effect was here—the crucifixion of motherhood, the murder of children, the rape of homes; piteous debasement and nameless exaltation of the spirit of man. There was lacking no impudence of wealth nor depths of uttermost pits of poverty. There was the sting of whips, the fangs of dogs, the laughter of power, the refinement of cruelty and the sobbing abasement of the lowest of the low—dragged slowly and bitterly and relentlessly out over endless years. This is the thing that today America makes meery over. It is our major amusement. It is material for clowns and braying asses. It is our national and perennial joke.

41-6-358

Yet for four hundred years of the mad warp and woof of this land's history, the black and crimson thread of Africa has dominated every pattern, and not the double tongues of all the Dunnings and Charles Beards shall alter the red record of one jot of it.

Before this mightiest of human dramas, save here and there a lucid interval, the American theatre has sat distraught, dumb and stupid, with a vacant grin on its face: afraid of the truth, cowed by the tragedy, aghast at the very intricacy and endless implications of the plots. American playwrights have strained their inwards to submerge this drama into farce; to turn the piteous tragedy of the Negro into cheap pornographic bathos; to paint this all too human life into a degenerate reflection of their own sadistic desires. Until today on stage and in literature, in painting, in all art, save alone in music, the souls of black folk have been submerged in fetid filth and white pimps who finance and exploit black prostitutes in "Nigger Heaven"

have quite concealed the blazing Hell beneath; and persuaded a complacent world that Harlem has no light of common day; that underneath our sale of laughter lie no pools of bitter tears.

Not only has the American theatre refused to face the drama of the Negro problem, but it has opposed every effort of the Negro himself to find dramatic expression on the stage. It is not enough, in this great and free commonwealth of the spirit of man, that most training schools of drama and art are closed to black folk; it is not enough that in the annual nationwide radio audition no voice of an angel in a black skin may be heard; it is not enough that the American schools at Fontainbleau, supported by the leaders in American painting, sculpture and architecture, have sought to extend the American color line across France—all this perhaps must be tolerated and even awaited in arts dominated by money, by the private profit ideal and by cheap and smug convention. But in the freer air of the drama, despite its all too evident pandering to monopoly and the intellectual mob, it is astonishing to realize the fight which the black actor has had to gain the merest shadow of foothold on Broadway. No one is child enough to believe that a black skin makes an actor, or that the suffering of a people creates of itself the delicate art to portray it. But when the artist does appear, proven and clear, it is almost unbelievable that his fellow white artists would so long and so persistently deny him full recognition.

41-6-359

When Europe of the early 19th Century recognized the great Jewess, Rachel, and the great Negro, Aldridge, as the two outstanding leaders of the stage, whom governments and science and art delighted to honor, that black man could not put foot on a single legitimate stage in the land of his birth. But even after slavery, and from 1870 down nearly to our day, the Negro actor could appear at Court only as the king's fool, with cap and bells, with quip and joke, ready over his own heartbreak to guffaw lustily and dance fantastically for the massed amusement of morons. Even when the unchangeable logic of a particular plot demanded black characters, up until yesterday, even these parts must be taken by white folk with blackened faces, unknown dialect and an unusually dumb mental equipment. This nonsense in time went beyond the limit of New York complacency and today not even burnt cork could save a miserable play, although supported by the bad acting of the royal family.

41-6-360

This hesitancy of our freest form of art really to be free; this refusal of managers, playwrights and players to use normally and intelligently, the abundant stuff of dramatic material and the not infrequent genius in acting which a nation within a nation furnishes—a black nation greater than Ireland, Belgium, Austria or Portugal—a nation equal in numbers to Egypt, Persia, Czechoslovakia and all Scandinavia—this studied neglect of the most dramatic material in America, has already reacted and will react on the theatre in the United States. A freedom unused is perverted or lost. If the stage dare not frankly and fully portray the Negro problem because of fear and snobbery—because of a provincial mentality born of the slave oligarchy, spawned south of the Mason and Dixon line and transplanted to the congenial concrete sidewalks of New York—the American theatre will find itself with all the greater ease and easier logic denied the right to discuss sex and war, socialism and Russia, liquor and wealth, and anything which at any time an entrenched autocracy or a prurient puritanism or a Nordic impudence may guard with the shackles of censorship.

The abiding refuge of our optimism is the slow growth of normal

1931 Return 2 NYSDD

James Weldon Johnson, in whose honor we are here tonight, was born in Jacksonville, Florida June 17, 1871. He received his training at Atlanta University in Georgia and then became a high school teacher. In 1897, he was admitted to the bar and for four years practiced law. Then, in 1901, he came to New York City and for five years collaborated with his brother in producing music and light opera. From 1906 to 1912, he represented the United States as Consular Officer in Venezuela and Nicaragua. In 1917, he became Field Secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and in 1920 its Executive Secretary.

This year he resigned his Secretaryship to devote himself to literature and to serve as Spence Professor at Fisk University.

I repeat these dates and details as an interpretative background for Mr. Johnson's spiritual development. He is characterized by a sort of genial humor which escapes cynicism, on the one hand, and on the other, is never mere light-heartedness. Indeed, his very charm of character rises from this union of philosophical humor with such stern experience, within the American veil of color, as his career indicates.

Mr. Johnson, for instance, was once nearly lynched in Florida; and quite naturally lynching to him, despite all obvious excuses and explanations and mitigating circumstances, can never be less than terribly real. He may smile over aspects of it but it can never be a mere joke.

His practice of law in the South gave him infinite opportunities to laugh at the plight of Negroes but he could never stop simply with laughing.

Coming to New York as a young man of 30, he had unusual opportunity to escape provincialism, both of race and of section. He met men and women of all walks of life and knew the metropolitan scene on a broad and tempting scale. He developed here that characteristic ability to meet and know and please all manner of men; and yet withal the straitness of the gates before him, the limitations of everyday life, the curious and recurrent difficulties of a Negro's artistic career never allowed him to mistake Life for the enjoyment of Life.

33-6-21

In South America Mr. Johnson touched in some respects an even wider world of nations, customs and languages. He escaped for the moment the hitherto inescapable sense of the color bar and he acquired that poise and individuality, that breadth and culture which his friends especially appreciate and admire. And yet even in this career, he could not altogether lose himself in the larger world because the Department of State too peremptorily refused him merited promotion for less than a reason, and Mr. Johnson suddenly found himself at 40 back in New York and at the end of an era.

33-6-22

There was a certain incongruity in having a man with such training join the executive staff of the N. A. A. C. P. Ours was an unpopular and disturbing fanaticism. One does not usually train a teacher, lawyer, poet and diplomat and set him to propaganda and social agitation. And yet here there were singular compensations. It was, for instance, easy for Mr. Johnson to converse genially with professional Southerners and admit the difficulties of the Negro problem, the humors of the color situation, and the eternal triumph of character. But with all this, no one could more easily prove than James Weldon Johnson that the color line was no mere myth nor wild phantasmagoria of bitter souls. Mr. Johnson, therefore, easily created a role of interpretation and sympathetic contact, both with his fellow workers and with the outer world, while at the same time he pushed a furious anti-lynching campaign and beseiged the courts with cases of color discrimination which could not easily be dismissed.

33-6-23

This, then, has been James Weldon Johnson's life and work, and for this we honor him tonight. And yet, I have no doubt but that the majority of his friends here are much less stirred and motivated in their praise by these facts, than by the real and delightful comradeship which they have been privileged to enjoy with a broad and catholic soul. Mr. Johnson is one of the few men who can invade my office at 11 o'clock in the morning and receive a welcoming smile.

And finally the friends here are especially pleased tonight to mark with applause the fact, that in the early evening of life when the sun still lingers in color on the horizon, and when creative Beauty still beckons James Weldon Johnson is going to have some leisure to loaf and invite his soul to those pastures which he is so fittingly trained to enjoy.

33-6-24

AWE. DuBois

Baird of New Jersey.

The population of New Jersey has increased from 1,880,000 in 1900 to 2,500,000 in 1910 and 3,155,000 in 1920. There are today more than 3,500,000 people in the state. The Negro population from 1900 to 1920 forms from 3½% to three and seven-tenths percent of the population. Today, it probably forms at least 4% of the population and probably exceeds 200,000. There were in 1920 75,000 Negroes 21 years of age and over, men and women. Today there must be near 100,000 potential voters. Thus, the Negroes of New Jersey will cast in the coming elections 4% or more of the total vote. This is not a large vote. In the six presidential elections, from 1896-1916, 75,000 votes would have decided the electral vote of New Jersey. In 1920-1924, the State went so overwhelmingly Republican that the Negro vote was not decisive. In 1928, although the vote was nearer, still the Negroes alone could not have swung the election. But in 1932, the situation is different. The Negro vote is larger than ever, the different appeals of the Republicans and Democrats are small, unless all signs fail, it is going to be a close election, and that means that the black vote is going to come pretty near settling the result. The candidate for Governor is David Baird, Jr. He was born in New Jersey in 1881; educated at Princeton, where he met no colored students, and was United States Senator by appointment from 1929-1931. When the Parker case came up in the Senate, all classes of New Jersey colored people asked Senator Baird to vote against John J. Parker of North Carolina as Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Branches of the N. A. A. C. P., ministers, fraternal organizations, women's clubs, petitioned Mr. Baird. Mr. Baird replied May 7, 1930: "That the United States Senator should vote his personal conviction, and that he proposed to support the President." This is the basis of fact before us. What are we going to do about it? If we are wise and patriotic, we are going to vote against Mr. Baird. Not because he is a bad man, not because he is not personally friendly to many of us, but because as [illegible] our political representative he did not do as we asked him to do. He was not compelled to do this. Neither are we compelled to vote for him if we do not wish to do it. It is a plain matter of barter and sale. A man holds political office in order to carry out the will of his constituents according to his own best knowledge and belief. If he conscientiously votes for a measure which his constituents do not wish to have put through, then he has no right to complain if his constituents prefer another person. And these constituents are dishonest with themselves and unpatriotic if they do not vote for the man that carries out their ideas in government. Senator Baird voted to put a man on the Bench of the Supreme Court who did not believe in the right of the Negroes to vote, and he did this frankly, openly, knowing what your wish was. If you do not punish him, you have no right to claim that you are intelligent voters.

49-5-63

RUSSIA ENGLAND GERMANY FRANCE

INDIA CHINA LIBERIA

U.S.A. { 1776 / 1861 / 1931

DAVID BAIRD

(INCOMPLETE) Atlantic City Speech

Sept. 2, 1931

Du Bois

Baird of New Jersey.

The population of New Jersey has increased from 1,880,000 in 1900 to 2,500,000 in 1910 and 3,155,000 in 1920. There are today more than 3,500,000 people in the state. The Negro population from 1900 to 1920 forms from 3½% to three and seven-tenths percent of the population. Today, it probably forms at least 4% of the population and probably exceeds 200,000. There were in 1920, 75,000 Negroes 21 years of age and over, men and women. Today there must be near 100,000 potential voters. Thus, the Negroes of New Jersey will cast in the coming elections 4% or more of the total vote. This is not a large vote. In the six presidential elections, from 1896-1916, 75,000 votes would have decided the electral vote of New Jersey. In 1920-1924, the State went so overwhelmingly Republican that the Negro vote was not decisive. In 1928, although the vote was nearer, still the Negroes alone could not have swung the election. But in 1932, the situation is different. The Negro vote is larger than ever, the different appeals of the Republicans and Democrats are small, unless all signs fail, it is going to be a close election, and that means that the black vote is going to come pretty near settling the result. The candidate for Governor is David Baird, Jr. He was born in New Jersey in 1881; educated at Princeton, where he met no colored students, and was United States Senator by appointment from 1929-1931. When the Parker case came up in the Senate, all classes of New Jersey colored people asked Senator Baird to vote against John J. Parker of North Carolina as Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Branches of the N. A. A. C. P., ministers, fraternal organizations, women's clubs, petitioned Mr. Baird. Mr. Baird replied May 7, 1930: "That the United States Senator should vote his personal conviction, and that he proposed to support the President." This is the basis

Delivered at Mecca Temple — Peace Meeting undated

The Economics of War

Yesterday, I rode across the George Washington Bridge. I had watched its building from week to week since the first wire was thrown across. And yet, as I looked down from its high and magnificent triumph to the waters below, I realized that it was set thus upon a hill and enhanced tremendously in cost, not for the added beauty of its high reality, but so that the masts of battleships might more easily sail below it.

I could not help but remember that a single one of those battleships costs today near half the price of this bridge, and that if all the battleships of our navy paraded beneath it, as they probably will, it would represent sufficient to build nearly five bridges as beautiful and useful and destined for efficiency three or four times as many years as the ships.

38-12-65

Moreover, this vast waste comes out of that taxation of which the United States and all the world is complaining in these days of depression. When the United States government collects $4 in taxes, it spends $3 of this directly or indirectly for war. And even if we allow that some of this war expenditure is not total waste, it is nevertheless true that much less than half of our national taxation is left for those things for which governments ought primarily to exist: for law-making and the execution of the law; for the Civil Service and the direction of industry; for parks and public buildings; for science and education; for justice and social study. For all these things we have little to spend, as compared with what we spend in war and preparation for war.

All this has been said many times and with much emphasis, until it is so clear as a matter of logic that it scarcely needs repeating.

And yet, the difficulty with the statement and with the underlying philosophy of Peace is that they do not meet, and they are not designed to meet, a set of facts which contradict them and lead straight to war and war expense.

I believe that the War against War suffers more from this mistake and this contradiction in logic than from anything else. For instance, the arguments against war between England and the United States are so overwhelming that one gasps for words. The favorite expression is that such a war is "unthinkable!" When the World War was impending and that little German war vessel swept into Agadir, we who sat in London in 1911, at a world conference of Races, repeated the same futile words: a war among the civilized nations of the earth is unthinkable. And it was unthinkable, as a matter of self defence, as a matter of military glory—for any cause, unless you remembered all that there was at stake and in dispute between France and Germany, and England and Austria, and America and the world: you must, out of the surrounding haze of word and action, recall that the rivalry for Income and Profits between the leading nations of modern civilization was not simply an incident of their relations; it was, on the contrary, a great and increasing reason for Fear and Distrust, just as it is between England and the United States today. Moreover, the main area of that fight was not Europe but Africa and Asia, South America and the islands of the sea; the area was not close and clear to the eyes of citizens and voters but far off among people of different language, race, religion and culture. The men on the spot who were leading the rivalry and staking out the claims and fortifying the industrial positions, were not the great leaders of European and American civilization; they were not the writers and teachers and ministers of religion, the professors of science, and the inventors, the social workers and the thinkers and philosophers, and natural molders of public opinion; they were rather the hard-bitten, and ruthless pioneers whose job it was to make profit and ever more profit on their transactions; to buy cheap and sell dear; to control labor, even by slavery; and to pour into the Babylons of modern civilization streams of tribute. They came to be aided as time went by astute propagandists and wise molders of fact until every school boy knew the character of the White Man's Burden among the child races and how different Liberty and Democracy were in England and Nigeria.

38-12-66

38-12-67

Such profit was worth fighting for, and that is the reason that the world went to war in 1914; but even before the conflagation reached Europe, it was alight here and there and always throughout the world; and in just the same way and with the same apparent lack of interest or attention on the part of the mass even of intelligent people, we must remember that since the Armstice of 1918 up until this very day, there has not been a single year, when European and American troops have not been waging war in some part of the world.

We can roughly divide this war of white Europe and America against the World into fifteen different wars covering the last thirteen years: it has been fought in Russia; South Africa and the Egyptian Sudan, time and time again in the Belgian Congo; in Portuguese Angola, French and British West Africa, Italian Africa, Indo-China and Syria; in Nicaragua and in Haiti, not to mention China and Turkey, and today in Cyprus.

There has not been a single year, if even a single day, since the World War Armstice, that the world has not been engaged in organized murder somewhere upon its surface, and in practically every case the leading civilized countries of Europe and America have been chief among the fighters, or instigating the fight or at least sitting armed on the sidelines ready for eventualities.

I have often repeated, and I shall never forget, that meeting of the New York Peace Society at the time of the war in the Balkans which preceded the World War, and was indeed, one of its many beginnings. It was Andrew Carnegie himself who stood before us in the Hotel Astor and explained that when we talk of world peace, we are not talking about the Balkans or other backward lands—we are talking about peace between the great civilized nations of the world. I firmly believe that it is principally this kind of argument that is making war permanent in the world and making it proceed upon the assumption that fires which we set and keep going in the wilderness about us have nothing to do with conflagations that threaten the whole world.

38-12-68

Why is it now that we do not make the logical nexus between a war to collect debts due our banking institutions in Nicaragua, a war to insure the regular flow of copper and diamonds out of Africa, a war to break down home rule in Syria and Indo-China,—and the fact that in the United States of America we spend two billion dollars on the army, navy and pensions, and with the fantastic sum which the world today is spending for military preparedness? can we longer refuse to consider the relation between this expenditure and the present economic organization of the world, as the prime present problem of Peace?

Upon what does the economic and cultural supremacy of Europe and America depend today? To some extent upon technique, education, science and literature; but to a far greater extent upon the low cost of labor in Asia and Africa and other parts of the world which we call backward. Our present power depends on keeping this cost of labor low, by holding down the standard of living, by restricting education and thinking, by curbing agitation, by making religion a soporif, by introducting a minimum of those labor restrictions by which we protect labor in civilized countries, and by so marshalling religious, tribal and social jealousies that no concerted movement of revolt, self-rule and self-realization can get started.

The result is cheap raw material; This raw material which the new world industry devours, comes ever more largely from the colored laborers and the backward countries of the world. A stream of rubber, sugar, coffee, cocoa, cotton, metals, fibers, spices, in addition to gold, silver and diamonds, pour into the lap of Europe and America at a cost which is kept low, and back of all the devices for keeping this cost low has stood and must stand military power. Ask yourselves? What would you say to a free, self-governing Asia, Africa and Carribean? with schools, colleges, industry and high wages? You would, of course, preclude argument by saying it was impossible. But if it were possible, remember that the chief reason for war would go. We are fighting today all over the world for cheap labor and materials for ourselves.

32-12-69

It is for these reasons that Europe and America have their armies. It is not for direct defense against each other, but it is to keep down rebellion and self-assertion in the backward countries, and to ward off aggression on the part of other civilized countries in case they wish to share the profit of cheap labor and cheap raw material in these subject lands.

Unless now we face this nexus between economic imperialism and organized war and preparation for war, our arguments will lead us nowhere. For the very men who would view with displeasure if not horror increasing armaments for war between France, England, Germany and the United States, can easily be brought to see a number of vague but very real duties which England has in India and America in Manchuria and France in Indo-China.

They can be made to assent to collecting debts by force in the West Indies without inquiry too narrowly into what we gave for those debts. But beyond the cost of direct war and the danger of widespread wars of rivalry, goes the greater cost to our own land of successful exploitation of poor, weak lands and peoples. When such trade and industry backed by military power become successful, the results are amazing. There is first the tremendous world-wide effort to buttress the system by race prejudice—by making everybody believe instinctively that the only method of dealing with most of the world's workers is to drive them and cow them and keep them ignorant. That is what they are fit for and nothing else. The whole old national philosophy of the working class is transferred from the nation to the world.

Beyond this go extraordinary results in the country which reaps the profit. It is the direct competition of low labor costs in backward countries which enables the English cotton manufacturer not simply to get cheap raw material but even to transfer his whole factory; and it makes those who thus dominate the distribution of capital and the direction of industry, independent of national labor conditions, and the demands of organized labor and independent of the popular vote. If, in a country like this, agriculture remains unorganized and depressed, it is partly because cheap agricultural foreign labor comes in direct competition with our agriculture, and in addition to this, because of the power of the masters of industry by which they can favor manufacturing and distribution at the expense of those who raise raw material in their own land. They can command ability, direct legislation, fill the cities and empty the country because out of concentrated city life the profit of investment is larger.

38-12-70

When statements like these are made, many people doubt their truth, of if they admit the truth, they take refuge in an attitude of helplessness; they insist that those who own and direct industry must be motivated by the great rewards of industry, and that you cannot have a United States or an England or a France unless the possibility of becoming a millionaire, encourages able men to organize and do the world's work.

And yet no sooner has one stated this, than one faces a contradiction. Because it is manifest that even in industry our greatest organizers and executives are not our riches men; our greatest inventors and technicians are seldom millionaires; it is not unusual to have a man who has contributed priceless things to the organization of human industry, die comparatively poor, perhaps in actual poverty.

The reasons for this come out of our war philosophy. Through war and preparedness for war, we are herding the workers of the world and taking their raw material at the cheapest price. The resultant profit to manufacturers is so great that the manipulators of capital through world-wide gambling operations in the transfer of capital, and in the redirection of industry, are enabled to make fabulous sums, or in other words, to gain tremendous economic power; that economic power which is used to direct industry and to distribute wealth in a great country like the United States is not in the hands of our thinkers, of our inventors, of our teachers, of our prophets, or of our leaders of religion. It is ever more largely in the hands of men ignorant of the great landmarks of civilization, trained to a narrow outlook on life and work, and unable of their own initiative to inaugurate reform and afraid to attempt it lest the very machine which they dominate cannot be reformed without destroying the machine.

38-12-71

The great leaders of our industry and of the industrial organization of the world are, therefore, caught in a terrible dilemma; the organization which they have made is beyond their own comprehension. The world unity which has come to us through economic imperialism is not built upon reason, not humanity, it is built upon force. When it breaks down we do not know what it is that is broken or what can lead to rebuilding, because the real thinkers are without power in the economic process, and the industrial leaders can conceive no other organization which could dominate the world.

All efforts, therefore, at reform are met with a blank negative. You cannot treat African natives like men because they are not men. China can never govern itself and Indian independence is a dream. Moreover, you will ruin commerce, you will ruin industry, and you will not have peace. You can always negotiate for small retrenchments of armament among the leading countries, but the thing must be done carefully, and with universal suspicion. Otherwise, the result will be mere changes in ownership of the cheap labor and cheap materials of the world, which will transfer vast streams of profit from one to another of the dominant countries of today.

38-12-72

On the other hand, if you are thorough-going, if you mean the overthrow of the idea of war, if you envisage the same doing away of arms among nations, as we have largely accomplished among individuals in civilized communities, then the defenders of militarism see and see with perfect truth that the main foundations of present international commerce will be overthrown; the streamof profit to Europe and America from Asia and Africa will be cut down; perhaps for long stretches of time absolutely destroyed. In other words, real pacificism, as contrasted with peace-meal disarmament, means that Europe must and America must give up their exploitation of wealth from the poor of the world and live upon their own labor and industry and upon a fair exchange with peoples able to bargain because free and uncowed by armies, navies and airplanes.

Thus, the real economics of war prove to us that pacificism, like all thorough-going reform, can only be had at great cost, and that the main problem of the United States is whether we will pay this cost or whether we prefer to continue to be one of the great armed powers of the world with our feet on the necks of mankind and our hands in their pockets.

38-12-73

49-33-30

Address
Boston Community Church (1)
December, 1931

. . . What the New Negro Is Thinking.

It would be effrontery for any one person to pretend that he could with authority and truth state just what twelve million people were thinking. There is no such unity and definiteness in human thought which would make such knowledge possible. It is difficult enough for a single human being to be reasonably sure of his own thoughts and feelings from day to day, and while we talk glibly about a Group Mind, there is after all but scant reality back of such general statement.

When, therefore, I try to tell you what the new Negro is thinking, I must, to a large extent, be expressing my own thought. But I am sincerely seeking in this case to modify my own opinion by what other Americans of Negro descent have said to me and to others and have written in books and papers and have given voice to, both in private conversation and on the public platform.

49-33-31 (2)

My excuse for being willing to essay so large a task is the fact that I have wide personal acquaintance with this group of people. I have come in contact with them in every state of the Union during some thirty years of public life. I have not only known them in great centers of Negro population, like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, New Orleans, St. Louis, Indianapolis and Los Angeles, but I have also lived on the plantations of the far South and in small towns and in waste places.

Also because it is usually difficult, even impossible, for me to be accommodated at public hotels or restaurants, I have been a guest in thousands of Negro homes of all sorts and grades. And finally, whatever community of blood and training and life-long environment make for knowledge Which we call instinctive—all this I have. On this basis of fact, I am going to try to tell you what seems to me today to be the leading currents of thought among colored folk. This must immediately narrow itself to those whose thinking is fairly articulate. In other words, I am talking about those who are thinking, writing and speaking. Not, however, simply the opinions of persons of superior education, but also of intelligent laborers and common workers, porters and servants, as well as teachers and professional men.

This stream of thought has in the last hundred years been slowly but definitely integrating; that is, from extreme individualism and discreet groups and separate cities and sections, there has gradually come so many agreements and so much of conference, so many resolutions and statements, that one can with considerable approximation of truth speak today of public opinion among American Negroes.

In the 18th Century, and even in the early 19th Century, such a statement would have been inaccurate. There was the great division into the free Negroes and the slaves. The slaves who were eight-ninths of all were carefully segregated into plantation groups and all communication and spread of intelligence from group to group and place to place, sternly discountenanced. Secret and unusual information spread but with difficulty and distortion. The 100,000 free Negroes of the South were watched, harried and often re-enslaved. The three hundred and more thousand Northern free Negroes in the 18th century had little intellectual or social intercourse with each other. Small groups, like those in Boston, in Newport, and in New York and Philadelphia seldom visited each other, had no periodicals that circulated between them, had few meetings. They were, however, the thinkers for four and one-half millions and tended to develop a strong individualistic philosophy. Every man was thought to progress according to his own deserts and efforts. Two wide lines of thought, therefore, developed: | one, that the Negro was an American, | and eventually was going to disappear into the American nation, | -not all Negroes, but this particular Negro who was doing the thinking | and who was exceptional; | and this philosophy was proven true in thousands of cases. | Or, the Negro was really an African. He was going to leave this country for some country in Africa | or elsewhere | where he could be a man. | John Brown Russwurm, the first Negro college graduate, | the son of a white man, with a white stepmother, | came out of ~~college~~ BOWDOIN in 1826 with the idea of achieving American citizenship for himself; | he faced American life two years, editing the first Negro weekly, | and then he turned straight around and said, | there is no chance for me to become a man in America. | He went to Liberia.

49-33-34

(5)

Gradually the different groups got in touch with each other.

49-33-35

(6)

Late in the 18th Century there was written correspondence between the Negroes of Newport and Philadelphia. | Inter-group travel increased. | In 1830, occurred the first conference of Negroes in Philadelphia | with William Lloyd Garrison as guest. | From then down to the Civil War, | conventions reached wider and wider circles; | small monthly and weekly papers began to appear; | speakers, like Frederick Douglass and others went from group to group talking | not only to white people | but ~~[illegible]~~ even more effectively to colored people.

Then came the miracle of Emancipation. | Negroes were united by one new and astonishing ideal | and plan of development. | For the first time | among the mass of Negroes | the thought | that had been in the minds of only a few unusual and stalwart black thinkers, | namely: that far from being forever slaves or members of a despised caste, ~~[illegible]~~ there was a chance of their becoming real American citizens | appeared as a realizable ideal.

49-33-36

(7)

There ensued those ~~fearful~~ fateful years | between 1863-1870 | when Negroes become recognized soldiers, voters and officeholders. | They apparently had the public opinion of the United States | back of them. | Skin-color was but an incident, | manhood and ability only | counted, | and the way to uplift was education. — | Learning to read and write, — | learning to handle figures, — | knowing what the world was and had been! Education! | It would not be true | to say that all Negroes believed this. | The thoughtful still doubted, | the thoughtless had no dreams; | but the great surging mass | uprooted from all past experience, | brought into close contact with each other for the first time | and listening to the voices of orators and agitators, | idealists and teachers, — This middle mass went through a physical, | spiritual and social revolution | more violent than any that ever happened to ~~the~~ four and one-half million people in less than a decade.

49-33-37 Then, from 1870-1880, came disillusion. | The reassertion ~~of~~ power by the white master | allied with the enfranchised poor white, | who feared and hated Negroes, | the reappearance of race animosity in the North, | which had only been disguised and lulled but not essentially changed or eradicated | and the new ~~organization of~~ revolution in industry | slapped | the jubilant and emerging Negro | full in the face. | The Negro group was ~~tremendously~~ shaken to its immost soul. | It did more thinking | in those days | than it had done even in the days of the war. | It began to drift and swirl into centers of opposition, inquiry, despair. | There were those who said; "I told you so." | You can never ~~not~~ trust white people. | There were others who said: | "Our rights may be postponed, but with the ballot | and even physical force, | we can regain them." | Still others were sure | that no small minority | could bring force to bear, | either political or physical | against the overwhelming mass of the nation. | ~~Then came the question as to how united and overwhelming this white mass was.~~ Segregation, migration, emigration | armed resistance | race suicide | — all had their advocates.

(8)

(Ward Emancipation)

49-33-38

(9)

But There was one shining and deciding light, and that was the influence of the white school teachers who went South to teach the Negroes. Their influence from 1870-1890 was tremendous. No cynical voice could arise among Negroes, decrying whites, doubting the faith of the nation, sneering at the failure of law, but there immediately arose in opposition the strong, quiet unswerting knowledge of thousands upon thousands of young men and women who knew white people as personal friends, knew them as teachers, advisers, leaders, companions. Moreover, this young group were the new educated leaders of the mass. They were the thinkers and dreamers (preachers, teachers). Against this knowledge of a new élite nothing could prevail, neither despair, revolt, emigration nor bitter recrimination; and the Negro under the leadership of these ~~men~~ students settled down to an unswerving faith in the ultimate triumph of race equality, despite disfranchisement, "Jim Crow" laws and lynching.

49-33-39

(10)

From 1890-1910 however came ominous and portentous change. The inner and real economic problem of Emancipation forced itself for the first time to the front. It had been camouflaged and half-concealed by war, politics, and sentiment. Now came the real problem of transforming four million slaves & wage-earners in the new industry. The slaves had been suddenly changed from Capital & Labor, with no land or tools, suddenly enfranchised & suddenly disfranchised, with little skill no labor unions and in bitter competition with white labor. White labor had growing political power, strong unions and Racial prestige. When Negroes

49-33-40

10½

But from 1890-1910, the same economic difficulties, the logical aftermath of slavery and only postponed by war, political revolution and social unrest, but now increasingly and insistently evident. How were freed slaves and their children going to enter organized industry in America? It was the natural aftermath of Emancipation. In the attempt of slaves to establish themselves permanently as free laborers with a fair wage, they found themselves not only in competition with white labor, but handicapped by growing disfranchisement and race hate. * when they looked to white friends, the white friends, embarrassed looked away

Funds for education decreased. Lynching increased—reaching in 1892, most murders two every three days, in the year and this with little public protest. Matters seemed approaching an impasse when, in 1895, Booker T. Washington voiced his famous compromise. He proposed that Southern industry be opened to Negro workers; that Negroes no longer insist on the ballot, and be trained mainly to work and that Northern philanthropy furnish the funds. The South leaped at the suggestion for it meant docile cheap labor and new industry. The North leaped just as eagerly for it meant common ground with the South, and better returns for capital and it evaded ~~no necessity for soul-racking for over philanthropic~~ platitudes on Negro equality which seemed increasingly dangerous. The Negro eagerly agreed to the compromise—it meant work, education, even eventual wealth, without violence or strife and in the midst of peace. North and South. The philosophy became almost universal. Train the Negro to labor and thrift and establish him as an indispensable part of the tremendous American economic organization. The thesis was clear, simply and logical, and back of it stood the most influential molders of public opinion, black and white.

49-33-41

11

Nevertheless, it eventually tore the Negro race in two; and it did so because it cut straight across the long prepared public opinion of this calm, courageous and faithful mass of educated Negroes who were beginning 49-33-42

to get real education. They were not agitators. They were not doctrinaires. (12)
But they knew facts because they had learned from excellent teachers
They tried from the first quietly to speak and warn, but they had the utmost difficulty in making themselves heard. They were moving against a tremendous current of public opinion. They found themselves misrepresented as being ashamed of working with the hands despising all but white collar jobs, eager for Latin and Greek and the frills of education and unwilling to buckle down to the hard tasks of achieving their own economic emancipation.

jealous of new leadership

But they persisted. They had to persist or die. They hammered at the ears of public opinion and tried to say, and gradually in the early days of the 20th Century succeeded in saying, more and more clearly: the education of Negroes for entrance into the present economic organization is not enough. ~~They and their leaders must be~~ That organization may change and has changed. The new industry — mass production, chain distribution, concentration of capital, international trade and credit, will bring new methods, new organization, new (12½) skill, new machines, & while these new conditions the black worker must be intelligently led and guided Unless he has political power he cannot compete with white groups who have political power. As a social outcast he cannot protect the wealth he accumulates. No matter how much skill he acquires if he has no further education, when industrial methods change he will be helpless. The object of education is not created the Atlanta U. conference in 1902 to make more carpenters, it is to make carpenters men. Thus the educated Negro-minority fought for existence from 1890 & 1910.

49-33-43

49-33-44

(13)

educated more broadly, else with any change of technique or increase of competition, they are going to find themselves not only without bread and butter, but without political power, vision or ideal. Their words and protests grew in volume and force, and if they had not been listened to, if the number of educated and thinking Negroes had not in the 20th Century reached proportions large enough to give the group a real thinking leadership, the American Negro would have been submerged and ruined during and since the World War.

As it was, there was sufficient thought and vision to guide him into modern industry when the World War made openings, to insist on migration from the feudal South, to make Negroes protest more and more against disfranchisement, caste legislation and mob violence, to organize his protest, and to make him more self-assertative and self-conscious, even in the face of increasing race separation or organized race hate.

49-33-45 All this brings us down to the present post-war days, and to a statement of what the Negro of average intelligence is thinking about his present situation. First of all, his earlier individualism has quite gone. He recognizes that only in inner organization and united strength is he going to defend himself or make any headway in the United States. He must more and more submit himself to inner voluntary organized control. His organizations today are vast and intricate, Churches, of course; Fraternal associations to help him in amusement and sickness; insurance organizations to escape the discrimination of white companies; even weak attempts to organize his own credit in banks; tentative entrance into retail trade to distribute goods to his own people and employ his own labor; a larger share in directing the education of his people, so that colleges and universities with white teachers have almost disappeared, and all the old contacts are dying out; and particularly there comes an unquenchable thirst for the Negro to

(14)

We would like to keep these organizations inter-racial but this is at present impossible. He has lost vital connections + friendships with the whites express for himself and in his own way the meaning of this struggle in the souls of black folk.

49-33-46

(15)

His attitude toward this nation is, therefore, logical. He has no patriotism. He dislikes exceedingly to sing "My Country 'Tis of Thee", and he laughs, albeit secretly, at "The Star-Spangled Banner". His patriotism is almost wholly toward his own group or mass consciousness, even when accompanied, as it always is, by bitter self-criticism, inner bickering and widespread lack of mutual faith. This is usual in hard-pressed, ignorant, poor minorities but it leads by inevitable contradiction to sympathy with other hard-pressed and disadvantaged groups. Thus the American Negro is increasingly eager to learn about other minority groups and disadvantaged peoples all over the world. There is, therefore, a tendency as yet small and yet growing with rapidity toward an international point of view. It is handicapped by the difficulty which he has in getting in direct contact with suffering minorities. It is almost impossible for Negroes to get regular and authentic news from their own kinsmen in South, East and West Africa, with the peoples of India and other parts of Asia. Even intercourse with colored West Indians and South Americans is largely and artificially handicapped. An American Negro can hardly get a passport visa to visit the great black world south of us. Notwithstanding this, however, the Negro is reaching out toward these peoples with greater and greater determination and understanding.

(16)

49-33-47

Curiously enough, however, there is one tremendously disadvantaged group at his very side concerning which the Negro has little knowledge and less sympathy and that is the white American laborer, native and foreign-born. This is not because of ignorance and snobbish ideals but it is rather because for three centuries white labor has sat on the black man's back, kicked, cuffed and lynched him and denied him every kind of human

Negroes have known white teachers but never white plumbers equality.[2] I can remember as a boy that the most fearsome thing in life were the yells [redacted] and fists of the German and Irish factory children of my birthplace. Their squalid homes, dirt and ignorance, were all in my child mind but part of their deep hatred and enemity toward me. It has taken some determined mental readjustments in my mature years to make me realize a common cause for their degradation and mine. No such metamorphosis has taken place today among the mass of [redacted] Negroes. White labor to them is the group that steals their jobs keeps them out of work, denies them property, hounds them out of decent living quarters, and swells the mob.

(17)

49-33-48

For this reason the average Negro is the ally of wealth and capital, not because he has been trained in snobbery, not because he is lead and dominated by a bourgeoise, but because he is ignorant of the modern labor movement and its relation to him. How should he learn?

49-33-49

(17½)

Moreover this only recourse for defense against the political and economic attacks of white labor is white capital: White wealth gives black men education charity and jobs and in return gets a chance to make more wealth at the expense of all labor. Whose fault is this? and who shall remedy it? You might look to the Negro intellectual leaders, but his

49-33-50

His intellectual elite in the passing generation got the old economic teaching of thrift and saving, wealth as the reward of work and sacrifice and wage as limited by inefficiency and the Wages Fund. The student never [illegible]—white and black—is getting no economic teaching at all except by permission of the Power Trust and Public Utilities magnates. The economic teaching of the present generation is coming from labor unions and radical groups and they either never think of the Negro or begin by barring him out for not knowing instinctively, that which he has had no opportunity to learn.

The result is pathetic. The Negroes' great pressing problem is today economic emancipation—completing the step begun in 1863, re-directed in 1895, hastened forward in the World War and thrown into disorder by the present depression. The economic thought and planning called for by this plight is non-existent. His industrial philosophy is chaotic and the mass see no light even in Roosevelt's power.

The political path of the Negro is strewn with difficulties which he sees all too clearly. He recognizes the social bankruptcy of the two main parties. He does not agree by any means with the majority of the nation as to just where they have failed. But he knows that so far as he is concerned, their failure has been lack of any disposition to protect him in his political or civil rights, to stop lynching, to uproot peonage, to secure him justice in the courts and a chance to work at decent wage. If, even, he starts to vote independently, he is at first faced by the severe economic pressure brought upon him. He is liable to lose his job or his customers unless he votes ~~for~~ the Republican ticket, or again, the bribe of office and even of money is exaggerated in his case because of his small income. ~~Especially~~, 96 however, he faces and ignores these considerations. The practical question is, what political allies can he find who will bid for his vote and give him consideration in return? | He can expect nothing of the old-time Republican Party, except a few minor offices and small campaign largesse funds. | He can expect little from the Democratic Party which must depend upon the South for its main support, and the political South is built upon the disfranchisement of the Negro. | The independent Negro voter | can expect little from the Northern Liberal and reformers. He is enthusiastic for all reforms | except those which mainly effect the Negro, | and he is hesitant, even absolutely opposed to giving the Negro any representation or voice. He can get recognition | from local grafting gangs | in large cities like New York and Chicago, | but this involves co-operation in their political methods. | From the Socialists and the Communists, | he gets a determination to recognize color caste as a problem | only insofar as it is a labor problem | and to insist that the solution of the labor problem

For which Negroes get widely damned

automatically
is going to solve the race problem, a dictum which the Negro neither understands nor believes. So that the independent Negro voter finds himself with a ballot in his hands that nobody is really bidding for and he concludes in a large number of cases that he might just as well not go to the trouble of even casting it. Once in a while, as in the defeat of Judge ~~the~~ Parker ~~case~~, he becomes part of an accidental majority ~~and accident gives him~~ a startling victory. But he has no illusions in this case. It was accident and little more. White labor was ashamed of the alliance! /// How does all this affect

~~In the meantime, there comes~~ the Negro's attitude toward himself, his family, his friends and neighbors. The Negro family is not only a broken, imperfect thing, it has been systematically smashed for all the centuries that he has been American.

The magnificent and intricate organization of the African family show[ed] determined effort to survive in the West Indies and was at the bottom of the Haitian Revolution, but it did not survive slavery in the United States. The new family on European lines simply could not adequately exist in slavery, although it made progress. It did exist among the free Northern Negroes, except that it was tremendously handicapped by poverty and ignorance which made family unity difficult and often impossible. Today the Negro family, like the white American family, is forced to be small because of its small income, and is continually broken up by migration and caste difficulties and the group AS expressed in the church or the neighborhood tends to transplant the family in social potency. It's problem of the Second Generation is enormous

The ideal of education still persists. No group in the United States, considering its income, is trying harder to educate its children but there again this education is handicapped by poverty and ~~it tends~~ by its ~~more and more~~ tendency, even in the North, to be a closed group training with all the provincialism and group loyalties of segregated communities. Education which throws white and colored pupils and students into close and understanding contact is less and less frequent, and quite contrary to the days of the past, Negro students ~~went~~ prefer to go to Negro schools.

49-33-55
They hesitate and shrink from the kind of persecution which they suffer in white schools, and they are more and more convinced that the white schools ~~have no monopoly of knowledge or method~~ cannot teach them properly or fully.
On the other hand, their vision of social development is clouded. They cannot at present see a way out. They are face to face with the problem of prejudice. They believe without any hesitancy that they are kept poor and ignorant by prejudice and that if they had an opportunity they could be just as effective in industry and science as any other group in the United States. Their tendency is thus naturally to exaggerate their genius, desert and accomplishment and to attribute all failure to race discrimination.

The resultant and growing bitterness toward white people has in this way double growth. The Negro attributes his success to his overcoming ~~prejudices~~ of white folks and his failure to the overwhelming difficulties of color caste. If he is weak and lazy, he excuses himself by pointing out the failures of black men who have been strong and energetic. If he is restless and ambitious, he is not willing to wait and work for success for he forsees in every obstacle failure because of prejudice. If he tries to overlook race discrimination, it suddenly rises and slaps him in the face. If he refuses to attempt to succeed because he is sure he will not be allowed to, ~~he fails because he has never tried and~~ his failure is pointed out by white and black and attributed to exactly opposite causes. The resultant conflict among Negro youth greatly handicaps its best endeavor.

It especially forms the key to contemporary Negro art. This art—this vision of life—is not natural nor spontaneous. It is involved and artificially exotic. The black man clings to his primitive enjoyment of life but it is a conscious and calculated clinging. Negro joy has today no natural spontaneity. Cynicism, bitterness among colored folk, is much more spontaneous than ebullient joy. But the motions of joy and carefree abandon must still be gone through with. They pay. They are almost the only things that do pay among Negroes, in music and vaudeville, and even in books and writings. It is, nevertheless, more and more a pose—a method of earning a living. After and when the New Negro art enjoys a real freedom with a compensating chance of livelihood, there will pour forth a flood of bitter recrimination and tragedy which will astonish the more complacent white world.

49-33-57

(25)

This complacency of the white world, its smug assumptions concerning Negroes, give rise to deep and twisted judgments. In the religion of white people, the American Negro has not the slightest faith, although he may still regard himself a religious person. ~~The mass of Negroes profess~~

The inner religious attitude of the Negro race and especially of its thinking portion has undergone great change. On the naive calvinism of the great ignorant mass has been elected an attitude of complete indifference so far as the doctrines of

49-33-58

(16)

Christianity are concerned. The church is still well attended, even by Negroes of intelligence, except in a few large cities, like New York. But this church is an effective and fairly well-equipped social organization. The sermon falls into two categories: an old statement of the plan of salvation without criticism and without contradiction. A practical interpretation of present social affairs, particularly within the church. Between these two extremes nothing is said. There is no attempt to modernize the old religious doctrine; there is no attempt to put social organization upon a ~~logical~~ reasonable ethical basis. This does not mean the persistence of religion. It means the death of it, and at the same time a persistence and growth of the church. But this growth of the church is threatened by lack of educated leadership. The only revolt against religion in the Negro race is shown by the small number of Negroes who are willing to become ministers. On the other hand this means that Negroes are sure

~~do not believe in the religion of white people.~~ Negroes ~~[illegible]~~

49-33-59

* that nine out of ten white folks do not believe half that they profess. They say ~~and perfectly well~~ that white folk do not believe in turning the other cheek, or in loving a neighbor unless the neighbor ~~has something they want~~ belongs to one's own class — all even these are Kaplan D (27)

~~or in real sacrificing charity.~~ They know, of course, that white people give ~~many forms of money~~ charity that they support numbers of Negro institutions and efforts, but Negroes do not for a moment believe that this is because of any love for Negroes or ~~any real wish for their~~ really self-sacrificing ~~success~~. They think it is partly from habit, partly from fear, ~~and partly because~~ ~~[illegible]~~ ~~[illegible]~~ ~~[illegible]

and
~~a~~ belief, Negroes' attitude toward the great moral problems of the 49-33-60
world is naturally apathetic. Preach the cause of world peace to a (28)
colored audience and see how much enthusiasm you get. Peace, of course.
They are peaceful people, and because they were peaceful, they were slaves and are still in semi-slavery. They ~~believe~~ suspect that the peace movement is mainly a movement of agreement among white people to make their domination over black, brown and yellow people more secure.

Talk to them of the freedom and uplift of women, and they immediately assume that the real interest in this movement is white women and not colored women. They are not interested in the World Court, simply because they know that the justice of the World Court is not for colored folk. They are politely incredulous of the League of Nations because they regard it as essentially a league of white nations, ~~despite the fact that a few colored nations are included.~~ This cold, cynical attitude toward the great moral movements of today thus defeats itself and reacts upon a people naturally sunny, joyful and credulous. They are not sunny. They are not joyful. They do not believe. They disbelieve in the world and its ideals, and yet with all that, they are fighting on and pathetically searching for a cosmic ray of light.

49-33-61

(29)

To this definitely pessimistic interpretation of Negro thought there is one ~~practically~~ equally optimistic note to be added. The ~~~~ inclusion of the two aspects is illogical and inexplicable, and yet it is true that the Negro race in America is optimistic and ~~~~ has not the slightest doubt, but that in the end it is going to triumph in each one of its demands. No writer, no speaker, no leader, ever suggests that the Negro is going to be submerged and ~~~~ held permanently in a caste position. The most pessimistic of Negro thinkers always concludes with ~~his~~ their audience that in the end the cause of a universal democracy which includes black men must triumph. It is hard to say whence this optimism arises. Certainly, the current facts do not support it. It is only a vague generalization to say that such thinking is the racial characteristic of an exuberant group. This may be a true statement but it is no explanation. I presume that the real cause of Negro optimism is the tremendous strides by which in their own experience or the experience of fathers and grandfathers whom they have known they have accomplished such extraordinary things. For this reason, probably no accomplishment seems too extraordinary or contradictory in the reasonable future. At the same time, there creeps in continually today a new element: The faint foretaste of a willingness to hopeless sacrifice; a wild call for the ordeal of blood in the very face of the impossible; all of the world-old dreams of immolation, hari-kari, and the "voice without reply." This is not yet articulate but one feels it as a groundswell. One senses flames ready to burst and burn.

Address
Boston, Community Church, Dec. 27, 1931

What the New Negro Is Thinking.

It would be effrontery for any one person to pretend that he could with authority and truth state just what twelve million people were thinking. There is no such unity and definiteness in human thought which would make such knowledge possible. It is difficult enough for a single human being to be reasonably sure of his own thoughts and feelings from day to day, and while we talk glibly about a Group Mind, there is after all but scant reality back of such a general statement.

When, therefore, I try to tell you what the new Negro is thinking, I must, to a large extent, be expressing my own thought. But I am sincerely seeking in this case to modify my own opinion by what other Americans of Negro descent have said to me and to others and have written in books and papers and have given voice to, both in private conversation and on the public platform.

My excuse for being willing to essay so large a task is the fact that I have wide personal acquaintance with this group of people. I have come in contact with them in every state of the Union during some thirty years of public life. I have not only known them in great centers of Negro population, like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, New Orleans, St. Louis, Indianapolis and Los Angeles, but I have also lived on the plantations of the far South and in small towns and in waste places.

Also, because it is usually difficult, even impossible, for me to be accommodated at public hotels or restaurants, I have been a guest in thousands of Negro homes of all sorts and grades. And finally, whatever community of blood and training and life-long environment make for knowledge which we call instinctive—all this I have. On this basis of fact, I am going to try to tell you what seems to me today to be the leading currents of thought among colored folk. This must immediately narrow itself to those whose thinking is fairly articulate. In other words, I am talking about those who are thinking, writing and speaking. Not, however, simply the opinions of persons of superior education, but also of intelligent laborers and common workers, porters and servants, as well as teachers and professional men.

33-6-112

This stream of thought has in the last hundred years been slowly but definitely integrating; that is, from extreme individualism and discreet groups and separate cities and sections, there has gradually come so many agreements and so much of conference, so many resolutions and statements, that one can with considerable approximation of truth speak today of public opinion among American Negroes.

In the 18th Century, and even in the early 19th Century, such a statement was inaccurate. There was the great division into the free Negroes and the slaves. The slaves who were eight-ninths of all were carefully segregated into plantation groups and all communication and spread of intelligence from group to group and place to place sternly discountenanced, secret and casual information spread but with difficulty and distortion. The 100,000 free Negroes of the South were watched, harried and re-enslaved. The three hundred and more thousand Northern free Negroes had little intellectual or social intercourse with each other. Small groups like those in Boston, in Newport, and in New York and Philadelphia seldom visited each other, had no periodicals that circulated between them, had no meetings. They were, however, the thinkers for four and one-half millions and tended to develop a strong individualistic philosophy. Every man was thought to progress according to his own deserts and efforts. Two wide lines of thought, therefore, developed: one, that the Negro was an American, and eventually was going to disappear into the American nation,--not all Negroes, but this particular Negro who was doing the thinking and who was exceptional; and this philosophy was proven true in thousands of cases. Or, the Negro was really an African. He was going to leave this country for some country in Africa or elsewhere where he could be a man. John Brown Russwurm, the first Negro college graduate, the son of a white man, with a white stepmoth r, came out of college with the idea of achieving American citizenship for himself; he faced American life two years, editing the first Negro weekly, and then he turned straight around and said, there is no chance for me to become a man in America. He went to Liberia.

Gradually the different groups got in touch with each other. Late in the 18th Century there was written correspondence between the Negroes of Newport and Philadelphia. Inter-group travel increased. In 1830, occurred the first conference of Negroes in Philadelphia with William Lloyd Garrison as guest. From then down to the Civil War, conventions reached wider and wider circles; small monthly and weekly papers began to appear; speakers, like Frederick Douglass and others went from group to group talking not only to white people but just as effectively to colored people.

Then came the miracleof Emancipation. Negroes were united by one new and astonishing ideal and plan of development. For the first time among the mass of Negroes the thought that had been in the minds of only a few unusual and stalwart black thinkers, namely: that far from being forever slaves or members of a despised caste, that there was a chance of their becoming real American citizens appeared as a realizable ideal.

There ensued those fateful years between 1863-1870 when Negroes become recognized soldiers, voters and officeholders. They apparently had public opinion of the United States back of them. Skin-color was but an incident, manhood and ability only counted, and the way to uplift was education. Learning to read and write, learning to handle figures, knowing what the world was and had been! Education! It would not be true to say that all Negroes believed this. The thoughtful still doubted, the thoughtless had no dreams; but the great surging mass uprooted from all past experience, brought into close contact with each other for the first time and listening to the voices of orators and agitators, idealists and teachers.—This middle mass went through a physical, spiritual and social revolution more violent than any that ever happened to the four and one-half million people in less than a decade.

33-6-114

Then, from 1870-1880, came disillusion. The reassertion by power by the white master, allied with the enfranchised poor white, who feared and hated Negroes; the recrudescence of race animosity in the North, and the new organization of industry, slapped the jubilant and emerging Negro full in the face. The Negro group was tremendously shaken to its soul. It did more thinking in those days than it had done even in the days of the war. It began to drift and swirl into centers of opposition, inquiry, despair. There were those who said; "I told you so!" You can not trust white people. There were others who said: "Our rights may be postponed, but with the ballot and even physical force, we can regain them." Still others were sure that no small minority could bring force to bear, either political or physical, against the overwhelming mass of the nation. Then came the question as to how united and overwhelming this white mass was.

There arose one shining and deciding light, and that was the influence of the white school teachers who went South to teach the Negroes. Their influence from 1870-1890 was tremendous. No cynical voice could arise among Negroes, decrying whites, doubting the faith of the nation, sneering at the failure of law, but there immediately arose in opposition, the strong, quiet unswerting knowledge of thousands upon thousands of young men and women who knew white people as personal friends; knew them as teachers, advisers, leaders, companions. Moreover, this young group were the new educated leaders of the mass. They were the thinkers and dreamers. Against this knowledge of a new élite nothing could prevail, neither despair, revolt, emigration nor bitter recrimination; and the Negro under the leadership of these folk settled down to an unswerving faith in the ultimate triumph for race equality, despite disfranchisement, "Jim Crow" laws and lynching.

33-6-115

But from 1890-1910, there came economic difficulties, the logical aftermath of slavery and only postponed by war, political revolution and social unrest; but now increasingly and insistently evident. How were freed slaves and their children going to enter organized industry in America. It was the natural aftermath of Emancipation. In the attempt of slaves toestablish themselves permanently as free laborers with a fair wage, they found themselves not only in competition with white labor, but handicapped by growing disfranchisement and race hate. When they looked for white friends they found the number dwindling. Funds for education decreased. Lynching increased—reaching in 1892, two every three days, and this with little public protest. Matters seemed approaching an impasse, when in 1895, Booker T. Washington voiced his famous compromise. He proposed that Southern industry be opened for Negro workers; that Negroes no longer insist on the ballot, and that Negroes be trained ~~humanly~~ mainly to work and that Northern philanthropy furnish the funds. The South leaped at the suggestion for it meant cheap labor and new industry. The North leaped just as eagerly for it meant common ground with the South, better returns for capital and no necessity for contradicting former philanthropic platitudes on Negro equality. The Negro eagerly agreed to the compromise—it meant work, education, eventual wealth, without violence or protest and in the midst of peace, North and South. The philosophy became almost universal. Train the Negro to labor and thrift, and establish him as an indispensable part of the tremendous American economic organization. The thesis was clear, simply and logical, and back of it stood the most influential molders of public opinion, black and white.

33-6-116

Nevertheless, it tore the Negro race in two; and it did so because it cut straight across the long prepared public opinion of this calm, courageous and faithful mass of educated Negroes who were beginning to get real education.

They tried from the first quietly to speak and warn, but they had the utmost difficulty in making themselves heard. They were moving against a tremendous current of public opinion. They found themselves misrepresented as being ashamed of working with the hands, despising all but white collar jobs, eager for Latin and Greek and the frills of education, and unwilling to buckle down to the hard tasks of achieving their own economic emancipation.

But they persisted. They had to persist or die. They hammered at the ears of public opinion and tried to say, and gradually in the early days of the 20th Century succeeded in saying, more and more clearly: the education of Negroes for entrance into the present economic organization is not enough. They and their leaders must be educated more broadly, else with any change of technique or increase of competition, they are going to find themselves not only without bread and butter, but without political power, vision or ideal. Their words and protests were ~~pathetic~~ insistence, and if they had not been listened to, if the number of educated and thinking Negroes had not in the 20th Century reached proportions large enough to give the group a real thinking leadership, they would have been submerged and ruined during and since the World War.

33-6-117

As it was, there was sufficient thought and vision to guide them into modern industry when the World War made openings, to insist on migration from the feudal South, to make Negroes protest more and more against disfranchisement, caste legislation and mob violence, and to make them more self-assertative and self-conscious, even in the face of increasing race separation.

All this brings us down to the present post-war days, and to a statement of what the Negro of average intelligence is thinking about his present situation. First of all, his earlier individualism has gone. He recognizes that only in organization and united strength is he going to defend himself or make any headway in the United States. He must more and more submit himself to inner voluntary organized control. His organizations today are vast and intricate. Fraternal associations to help him in sickness; insurance organizations to escape the discrimination of white companies; even weak attempts to organize his own credit in banks; tentative entrance into retail trade to distribute goods to his own people and employ his own labor; a larger share in directing the education of his people, even in colleges and universities where white teachers are rapidly disappearing and all the old contacts dying out; and particularly an unquenchable thirst to express for himself and in his own way the meaning of this struggle in the souls of black folk.

His attitude toward this nation is, therefore, curious. He has no patriotism. He dislikes exceedingly to sing "My Country 'Tis of Thee", and he laughs, albeit secretly, at "The Star-Spangled Banner". His patriotism almost wholly toward his own group or mass consciousness, even when accompanied, as it always is, by bitter self-criticism, inner bickering and ~~words~~ wide-spread lack of mutual faith. This is usual in hard-pressed, ignorant, poor minorities, but it leads by inevitable contradiction to sympathy with other hard-pressed and disadvantaged groups. The American Negro is increasingly eager to learn about other minority groups and disadvantaged peoples all over the world. There is, therefore, a tendency as yet small and yet growing with rapidity, toward an international point of view. It is handicapped by the difficulty which he has in getting in direct contact with suffering minorities. It is almost impossible for Negroes to get regular and authentic news from his own kinsmen in South, East and West Africa, with the peoples of India and other parts of Asia. Even intercourse with colored West Indians and South Americans is largely and artificially handicapped. An American Negro can hardly get a passport visa to visit the great black world south of us or east of us. Notwithstanding this, however, the Negro is reaching out toward these peoples with greater and greater determination.

Curiously enough, however, there is one tremendously disadvantaged group at his very side concerning which the Negro has little knowledge and less sympathy and that is the white laborer, native and foreigner. This is not because of ignorance and snobbish ideals—but it is rather because for three centuries white labor has sat on the black man's back, kicked, cuffed and lynched him and denied him every kind of human equality. I can remember as a boy that the most fearsome thing in life were the yells, sneers and fists of the German and Irish factory children of my birthplace. Their squalid homes, dirt and ignorance, were all in my child mind but part of their deep hatred and enemity toward me. It has taken some determined mental readjustments in my mature years to make me realize a common cause to their degradation and mine. No such metamorphosis has taken place today among the mass of thinking Negroes. White labor to them is the group that steals their jobs, keeps them out of work, denies them property, hounds them out of decent living quarters, and swells the mobs.

33-6-118

For this reason the average Negro is the ally of wealth and capital, not because he has been trained in snobbery, not because he is lead and dominated by a bourgeoise but because he is ignorant of the modern labor movement and its relation to him. How should he learn? His intellectual elite in the passing generation got the old economic teaching of thrift and saving, wealth as the reward of work and sacrifice and wage as limited by inefficiency and the Wages Fund. The newer ~~generation~~ student--white and black--is getting no economic teaching at all except by permission of the Power Trust and Public Utilities magnates. The best economic teaching of the present generation is coming from labor unions and radical groups and they either never think of the Negro or begin by bawling him out for not knowing instinctively ~~instinctions~~ that which he has had no opportunity to learn.

The result is pathetic. The Negroes' great pressing problem is today economic emancipation—completing the step begun in 1863, re-directed in 1895, dissipated in the World War and thrown into disorder by the present depression. The economic thought and planning called for by this plight is non-existent. His industrial philosophy is chaotic and the masses see no light

The politiqal path of the Negro is strewn with difficulties which he sees all too clearly. He recognizes the social bankruptcy of the two main parties. He does not agree by any means with the majority of the nation as to just where they have failed. But he knows that so far as he is concerned, their failure has been lack of any disposition to protect him in his political or civil rights, to stop lynching, to uproot peonage, to secure him justice in the courts. If, even, he starts to vote independently, he is at first faced by the severe economic pressure brought upon him. He is liable to lose his job or his customers unless he votes for the Republican ticket, or again, the bribe of office and even of money is exaggerated in his case because of his small income. ~~Especially~~, 91 however, he faces and ignores these considerations, the practical question is, what political allies can he find who will bid for his vote and give him consideration in return? He can expect nothing of the old-time Republican Party, except a few minor offices and campaign funds. He can expect little from the Democratic Party which must depend upon the South for its main support and the political South is built upon the disfranchisement of the Negro. The independent Negro voter can expect little from the Northern Liberal and Reformers. He is enthusiastic for all reforms except those which mainly effect the Negro, and he is hesitant, even absolutely ~~afraid~~ to ~~in~~ giving the Negro any representation or voice. He can get recognition from local grafting gangs in large cities like New York and Chicago, but this involves co-operation in their political methods. From the Socialists and the Communists, he gets a determination to recognize color caste as a problem only insofar as it is a labor problem and to insist that the solution of the labor problem is going to solve the race problem, a dictum which the Negro neither understands nor believes. So that the independent Negro voter finds himself with a ballot in his hands that nobody is really bidding for and he concludes in a large number of cases that he might just as well not go to the trouble of even casting it. Once in a while, as in the Parker case, a series of accidents gives him a startling victory. But he has no illusions in this. It was accident and little more.

33-6-120
33-6-120

33-6-121

In the meantime, there comes the Negro's attitude toward himself, his family, his friends and neighbors. The Negro family is not only a broken, imperfect thing, it has been systematically smashed for all the centuries that he has been American.

33-6-121

The magnificent and intricate organization of the African family showed determined effort to survive in the West Indies and was at the bottom of the Haitian Revolution, but it did not survive slavery in the United States. The new family on European lines simply could not adequately exist in slavery, although it made progress. It did exist among the free Northern Negroes, except that it was tremendously handicapped by poverty and ignorance which made family unity difficult and often impossible. Today the Negro family, like the white American family, is forced to be small because of its small income, and is continually broken up by migration and caste difficulties and the group as expressed in the church or the neighborhood tends to transplant the family in social peonage.

The ideal of education still persists. No group in the United States, considering its income, is trying harder to educate its children; but there again this education is handicapped by poverty and it tends more and more, even in the North, to be a closed group training with all the provincialism and group loyalties of segregated communities. Education which throws white and colored pupils and students into close and understanding contact is less and less frequent, and quite contrary to the days of the past, Negro students want to go to Negro schools. They hesitate and shrink from the kind of persecution which they suffer in white schools, and they are more and more convinced that the white schools have no monopoly of knowledge or method. On the other hand, their vision of social development is clouded. They cannot at present see a way out. They are face to face with the problem of prejudice. They believe without any hesitancy that they are kept poor and ignorant by prejudice and that if they had an opportunity they could be just as effective in industry and science as any other group in the United States. Their tendency is thus naturally to exaggerate their genius, desert and accomplishment and to attribute all failure to race discrimination.

The resultant and growing bitterness toward white people has in this way double growth. The Negro attributes his success to his overcoming [redacted] white folks and his failure to the overwhelming difficulties of color caste. If he is weak and lazy, he excuses himself by pointing out the failures of black men who have been strong and energetic. If he is restless and ambitious, he is not willing to wait and work for success for he forsees in every obstacle failure because of prejudice. If he tries to overlook race discrimination, it suddenly rises and slaps him in the face. If he refuses to attempt to succeed because he is sure he will not be allowed to, he fails because he has never tried and his failure is pointed out by white and black and attributed to exactly opposite causes. The resultant conflict among Negro youth greatly handicaps its best endeavor.

33-6-122

It especially forms the key to contemporary Negro art. This art—this vision of life—is not natural nor spontaneous. It is involved and artifically exotic. The black man clings to his enjoyment of life but it is a conscious and calculated clinging. Negro joy has today no natural spontaneity. Cynicism, bitterness among colored folk, is much more spontaneous than ebullient joy. But the motions of joy and carefree abandon must still be gone through with. They pay. They are almost the only things that do pay among Negroes, in music and vaudeville, and even in books and writings. It is, nevertheless, more and more a pose—a method of earning a living. After and when the New Negro art enjoys a real freedom with a compensating chance of livelihood, there will pour forth a flood of bitter recrimination and tragedy which will astonish the more complacent white world.

This complacency of the white world, its smug assumption concerning Negroes, give rise to deep and twisted judgments. In the religion of white people, the American Negro has not the slightest faith, although he may still regard himself a religious person.

The inner religious attitude of the Negro race and especially of those thinking portion has undergone great change. On the naive calvinism of the great ignorant mass has been elected an attitude of complete indifference so far as the doctrines of Christianity are concerned. The church is still well attended, even by Negroes of intelligence, except in a few large cities, like New York. But this church is an effective and fairly well-equipped social organization. The sermon falls into two catagories: an old statement of the plan of salvation without criticism and without conviction. A practical interpretation of present social affairs, particularly within the church. Between these two extremes nothing is said. There is no attempt to modernize the old religious doctrine; there is no attempt to put social organization upon a logical ethical basis. This does not mean the persistence of religion. It means the death of it, and at the same time a persistance and growth of the church. But this growth of the church is threatened by lack of educated leadership. The only revolt against religion in the Negro race is shown by the small number of Negroes who are willing to become ministers. Negroes do not believe that nine out of ten white folks believe half what they profess. They know perfectly well that white folk do not believe in turning the other cheek, in loving a neighbor unless the neighbor has something they want, or in real sacrificing charity. They know, of course, that white people give away loads of money; that they support numbers of Negro institutions and efforts, but Negroes do not for a moment believe that this is because of any love for Negroes or any real wish for their success. They think it is partly from habit, partly from fear, and partly because they do not know that else to do.

33-6-123
33-6-123
33-6-123
33-6-123

33-6-124

33-6-124

Of science and learning, Negroes are equally skeptical. They realize that for years science has been misused to their disadvantage, and that many theories concerning their race which formerly had the benediction of science are proven absolutely false; and yet plenty of similar falsehoods are replacing them. With this specific knowledge and belief, Negroes' attitude toward the great moral problems of the world is naturally apathetic. Preach the cause of world peace to a colored audience and see how much enthusiasm you get. Peace, of course. They are peaceful people, and because they were peaceful, they were slaves and are still in semi-slavery. They believe that the peace movement is mainly a movement of agreement among white people to make their domination over black, brown and yellow people more secure.

33-6-124

Talk to them of the freedom and uplift of women, and they immediately assume that the real interest in this movement is white women and not colored women. They are not interested in the World Court, simply because they know that the justice of the World Court is not for colored folk. They are politely incredulous at the League of Nations because they regard it as a league of white nations, despite the fact that a few colored nations are included. This cold, cynical attitude toward the great moral movements of today thus defeats itself and reacts upon a people naturally sunny, joyful and credulous. They are not sunny. They are not joyful. They do not believe. They disbelieve in the world and its ideals, and yet with all that, they are fighting on and pathetically searching for a cosmic ray of light.

Address -
Boston - Community Church
Dec, 1931

What the New Negro Is Thinking.

It would be audacious for any person to pretend that he could with authority and truth state just what twelve million people were doing. There is no unity and definiteness which would allow any such statement to be proven as true. It is difficult enough for a single human being to be reasonably sure of his own thoughts and feelings from day to day, and while we have talked gullibly about a group in mind, there is after all but scant reality back of such general statements. When, therefore, I try to tell you what the new Negro is thinking, I am, to a large extent, ignoring my own thought, so far as I understand it. But I am seeking in this case to modify this thought and my own opinions by what other Americans of Negro descent have said to me and to others and written in books and papers and have given voice to, both in private conversation and on the public platform. My excuse for being willing to essay so large a class is the fact that I have wide personal acquaintance with this group of people. I have come in contact with them in every state of the Union during some thirty years of public life. I have especially known them in great centers of Negro population, like New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, New Orleans, St. Louis, Indianapolis and Los Angeles, but I have also lived on the plantations of the far South and in small towns and in waste places. Also, because it is usually difficult, even impossible, for me to be accommodated at public hotels or restaurants, I have been a guest in thousands of Negro homes. From this wide place of fact, I am going to try to tell you what seems to me today to be the leading currents of thought among colored folk. And, of course, this immediately narrows itself to those whose thinking is fairly articulate. In other words, I am talking about those who are thinking, writing and speaking. Not necessarily simply persons of broad education, but laborers and common workers, porters and waiters, as well as teachers and professional men.

33-6-101

This statement of thought has in the last one hundred years been slowly but definitely integrating; that is, from extreme individualism and discreet groups and separate cities and sections, there has gradually come so many agreements and so much of conference, so many resolutions and statements, that one can with considerable approbation of truth speak today of a public opinion among American Negroes. In the 18th Century, and even in the early 19th Century, such statement was impossible. There was the great definition into the free Negroes and the slaves. The free Negroes, particularly, had little intellectual or social intercourse with each other. The small group in Boston, the small group in Newport, the Negroes of New York and Philadelphia almost never visited each other, had no periodicals that circulated with each other, had no meetings together. They developed a strong intellectual philosophy. Every man was growing up according to his deserts and efforts. The more radical took two wide lines of thought: one, that the Negro was an American, and eventually was going to disappear into the American nation. Not all Negroes, but this particular Negro who was doing the thinking and that happened in thousands of cases. Or the Negro was really an African. He was going to leave this country for some country in Africa or elsewhere where he could be a man. John Brown Russwurm, the first Negro college graduate, the son of a white man, with a white stepmother, came out of college with the idea of achieving American citizenship for himself, and then turned straight around within two years and said, there isn't any chance for me to become a man in America, and went to Liberia.

33-6-102

Then, gradually, the different groups got in touch with each other. Late in the 18th Century there was correspondence between the Negroes of Newport and Philadelphia. In 1830, occurred the first conference of Negroes in Philadelphia with William Lloyd Garrison as guest. From then down to the Civil War, conventional newspapers reached wider and wider circles, small monthly and weekly papers began to appear. Speakers, like Frederick Douglass and others went from group to group talking not only to white people but just as effectively to colored people. Then came the miracle of Emancipation. Negroes were united in one new and astonishing ideal and plan of development. For the first time they assumed this position the thing that had been in the minds of only a few unusual and stalwart black thinkers, namely: that far from being forever slaves or members of a despised caste, that there was a chance of their becoming ~~real economic~~ citizens. There ensued those fearful years between 1863-1870 when Negroes become recognized soldiers, voters and officeholders. They apparently had public opinionof the United States back of it. Skin-color was but an incident, manhood and ability counted, and the way to uplift was education. Learning to read and write, learning to handle figures, knowing what the world was and had been. Education. It would not be true to say that all Negroes believed this. The thoughtful doubted, the thoughtless had no dreams, but the great surging mass uprooted from all thinkers, brought into close contact readings for the first time and listened to the voices of orators and agitators. This middle mass coalesced in their thinking to some such definite ideal. Then, from 1870-1880, came disillusion. The Ku Klux Klan, revolutions inn Southern states, the growing voice of race animosity in the North. The Negro group was tremendously shaken to its soul. It did more thinking in those days than it had done in the days of the war. It

23-3-103

It began to drift into centers of opposition, inquiry, despair. There were those who said; "I told you so!" You can not trust white people. There were others who said: "Our rights may be postponed, but without ballot and physical force, we cannot regain them." Still others were sure that no small minority could bring to bear force, either political or physical, against the overwhelming mass of the nation. Then came the question as to how united and overwhelming this white mass was. There arose one shining and deciding light, and that was the influence of the white school teachers who went South to teach the Negroes. Their influence from 1870-1890 was tremendous. No voice could arise among Negroes, decrying whites, doubting the faith of the nation, sneering at the failure of law, but then there arose an opposition, the strong, quiet unswerving knowledge of thousands upon thousands of young men and women who knew white folks as personal friends; knew them as teachers, advisers, leaders, companions. Against this knowledge of a new elite nothing could prevail, and the Negro, steered down under the leadership of these folk to an unswerving faith in the ultimate triumph for race divisions in the United States. But from 1890-1910, there came pressing economic difficulties; difficulties of earning a living, of expenditures, of chances to take advantage of opportunities. It was the natural aftermath of Emancipation. The attempt of slaves to establish themselves permanently as free laborers with a fair wage. They found themselves not only in competition with white labor, but handicapped by growing disfranchisementand they seized eagerly upon the way out pointed by George Washington. Here was interesting leading labor. Train the Negro to labor and thrift, and establish them as an indispensable part of the tremendous American economic organization. The thesis was clear, simply and logical, and back of it stood the most influential molders of public opinion, black and white. It tore the Negro race in two, because it cut absolutely straigh[t] across the [ ] of this calm, courageous and faithful mass of educated Negroes who were beginning to get real broad education. They tried to speak and warn but they had the utmost difficulty in making themselves heard. They were moving against a tremendous current of public opinion. They were misrepresented as being ashamed of working with the hands, despised all white collar jobs, eager for Latin and Greek and the frills of education, and unwilling to buckle down to the hard tasks of achieving their own economic Emancipation. But they tried to say and gradually in the early days of the 20th Century they succeeded in saying more and more clearly: the education of Negroes for entrance into those openings in the present economic organization which are free to them, is not enough. They or their leaders must be educated more broadly , else with any chance of technique or increase of competition, they are going to find themselves not only without bread and butter, but without vision or ideal. Their words and protests were pathetic, and if they had not been listened to, if the number of educated and thinking Negroes had not in the 20th Century reached proportions large enough to give the group a real thinking leadership, they would have been submerged and ruined during and since the World War. As it was, there was sufficient thought and vision to guide them into modern industry when the World War made openings, to make them protest more and more against caste legislation, to make them more self-assertative and subconscious, even in the face of increasing race separation. All this brings us down to the present post-war days, and to a statement of what the Negro of average intelligence is thinking about his situation. His earlier individualism has gone.

3-16-104

33-6-105

He recognizes that only in organization and united strength is he going to defend himself or make any headway in the United States. He must more and more submit himself to organized control. His organizations today are vast and intricate in extent. Fraternal associations to help him in sickness, insurance organizations to escape the discrimination of white organizations, attempts even ot organize his own credit to banks, tentative entrance into retail trade to distribute goods to his own people, a larger share in the education of his people, even in colleges and universities where white teachers are rapidly disappearing and all the old contacts dying out, and particularly an unquenchable desire to express for himself in his own way the meaning of this struggle in the souls of black folk. His attitude toward this nation is, therefore, curious. He has no patriotism. He dislikes exceedingly to sing "My Country 'Tis Of Thee", or "The Star-Spangle Banner", his patriotism is toward his own group or mass consciousness, but increasingly toward minority groups and disadvantaged peoples all over the world. There is a tendency as yet small and yet growing with curious rapidity toward an into national point of view. It is handicapped by the difficulty whichhe has in getting in direct contact with suffering minorities. It is almost impossible for him to get regular news and human connections with his own people in South, East and West Africa, with the people of India and other parts of Asia. Even intercourse with colored West Indians and South Americans is largely and artifically handicapped. Notwithstanding this, however, the American Negro is reaching out toward these peoples with greater and greater determination. In the meantime, there comes his attitude toward himself, his family, his friends and neighbors. The Negro family is not only a broken, imperfect thing, it has been systematically smashed for all the centuries that he has been American.

33-3-106

The magnificent and intricate organization of the African family shows determined effort to sacrifice in the West Indies and also at the bottom of the Haitian Revolution, but it did not sacrifice slavery in the United States. The new family on European lines simply could not adequately exist in slavery, although it made great progress. It did exist among the free Negroes and the Northern Negroes, except that it was tremendously handicapped by poverty and ignorance which made family unity difficult and often impossible. Today again the Negro in the American family is forced to be small because of its small income, and is continually broken up by migration and caste, and the group as expressed either in the church or the society of the neighborhood tends to transplant the family in social potency. The ideal of education still persists. No group in the United States, considering its income, is trying harder to educate its children, but there again this education is handicapped by poverty and it tends more and more, even in the North, to be a groupeducation. And education where the incidents that throw white and colored pupils and students together are less and less frequent, so that quite contrary to the days of the past, Negro students want to go to Negro schools. They hesitate and shrink from the kind of persecution which they suffer in white schools, and they are more and more convinced that the white schools have no monopoloy of knowledge or method. But, on the other hand, their vision of economic emancipation is crowded. They cannot at present see a way out. They are face to face with the problem of prejudice inwork and wage, and how a caste group in modern economic organization can earn enough to live upon decently. They believe without any hesitancy that they are kept poor and ignorant by prejudice and that if they had an opportunity they could be just as effective in industry and science as any other part of the United States.

3-31-07

And that bitterness toward white people is predicated more on their domination than on any other single thing. On the other hand, that economic familiarity has not brought them to make common cause with white labor, and this through no fault of colored people. But because of the intrenched prejudice of white workers. The mass of the unions of the better trades systematically exclude Negroes, either by open announcement or by secret manipulation. And, therefore, united white and black labor stoops before this indisputable fact and is the greatest handicap which the labor movement has in the United States. The labor movement has itself deliberately trained a nation of twelve million scabs, and this vast group of un_____ laborers can see no chance for betterment in so long as their white fellow laborers keep their present prejudices. Beyond this, comes the Negro 's vision of the world. He clings to his enjoyment of life but it is a conscious and determined clinging. Negro joy has no natural spontaneity today. Cynicalism, bitterness among colored folk, is much more spontaneous than ebullient joy. But the motions of joy and carefree abandon are still gone through. They pay. They are almost the only things that do pay among Negroes in music and vaudeville, and even in books and writings. It is, nevertheless, more and more opposed a method of earning a living. After and when the new Negro art enjoys a real freedom with a compensating chance of livelihood, there will pour forth a flood of bitter recrimination and tragedy which will astonish the more complacent white leaders. In the relation of white people, the American Negro has not the slightest faith. He may still be disliked, as himself a religious person. The mass of Negroes profess strongly the old pln of salvation, but even for themselves they do not particularly believe init. You will hear sermons along orthodox lines, but if your watch the colored audience you will find they are not taking the sermon seriously. They do take seriously the effort of the minister to balance his budget, to have a good and even luxurious church building, to multiply the group activities. They are orthodox in theory but absolutely indifferent to the old-time religion in practice, and if that is true of their own religion, it is even more true so far as white people are concerned. They do not believe in the religion of white people. They do not believe that nine out of ten white folks believe half that they profess. They know perfectly well that they do not believe in turning the other cheek, in loving a neighbor unless your neighbors has got something that you want, or in real charity. They know that white people give loads of money. That they support numbers of Negro institutions. But they do not for a moment believe that this is because of any love for Negroes or wish for their success. They think it is partly from habit, partly from feeling, and partly because they do not know what else to do under the circumstances. Of sciences and sanitation, Negroes are equally skeptical. They realize that for years science has been misused to their disadvantage. And that many theories concerning their race have formerly had the benediction of science, and that plenty of similar falsehoods are now current. With this specific knowledge and belief, their attitude toward the great moral problem of the world is naturally strongly apathetic. Preace the cause of peace to a colored audience and see how much enthusiasm who get. Peace, of course. They are peaceful people, and because they were peaceful, they were slaves and are still in semi-slavery. They believe that the peace movement is a movement of agreement among white people to make their domination over black, brown and yellow people more secure.

33-6-108

33-109

Talk to them of the freedom of uplift of women, and they immediately assume that the real interest in this movement is white women and not colored women. They are not interested in the World Court, simply because they know that the justice of the World Court is not for colored folk. They are politely incredulous at the League of Nations because they regard it as a league of white nations, despite the fact that a few colored nations are included. This old cynical attitude toward the great moral movements of today

33-6-110

Alpha meeting Cincinnati Address
Dec 1931 Address.

Economic Planning for the American Negroes

In an address at Howard University, June, 1930, I discussed the history and present situation with regard to industrial and higher education among American Negroes, and I tried to show that at present neither the colleges nor the industrial schools were solving our problem of work and wages. Since that time, in several other addresses, I have tried to go further along this line and emphasize the fact that careful economic planning has got to take place among us if we are going to solve our present problems. I want in this address to gather up conclusions and statements which I have made before into one constructive whole and to discuss economic planning for American Negroes.

First of all, let me stress the factsin the situation of which most of us do not seem aware; and that is, the appalling ignorance in the United States, among all people, concerning the principles of economics and the specific facts of labor and income. This id due largely to the complete collapse of real economic teaching in our colleges. Beginning long before the World War and coincident with the triumph of international commerce, mass production, and large industry, of chain retail distribution, economic teaching in the United States has been reduced to the smallest possible proportions. Outstanding economic figures have either been discouraged or dismissed from their academic positions, with the result that today in a time of the most severe industrial crisis that this country and the world have known, there is no economic leadership, and least of all are we turning toward the colleges for information or guidance. This is true of the great white universities, and it is even more true of colored institutions. The older teachers in these colored institutions do not realize the new economic situation, and the younger teachers have been taught in the white institutions of the North. We face, therefore, a situation almost fantastic. Here we are with a partial and increasing educational system of our own, which has taken immense strides during the last decade. We have three institutions that bid fair to be real universities. We have a half-dozen first-class colleges that can be compared with the old New England college. We have not near enough high schools but we do have an increasing number of well-equipped, well-housed and well-manned secondary schools. The number of Negroes in college have increased phenomenally, not only in Negro colleges but as well in white colleges; and yet we face the gravest problem of our history not knowing what we can do to earn a living and how we may properly be trained for it.

33-6-94

Coming out of college, we face, as youth has ever faced, the three great possibilities of Service, Fame and Wealth. Service to fellow men; Fame as the applause of the world; and Wealth for enjoying life. The Negro college of my day stressed Service. Perhaps it was even maudlin and sentimental about it. We were all going out to lead our people and to be of service to them. The reiteration of this ideal led undoubtedly to a great deal of hypocrisy; but on the other hand, there was a tremendous amount of earnest and reall willingness to sacrifice. There was here and there something of the true martyr spirit. I have seen men and women deliberately turn their backs on reputation and good income and go down with shining eyes into the backwoods of the South and devote themselves to a forlorne hope.

Today, however, this ideal has not even the saving tribute of of hypocrisy. We have throughout our schools a plain statement that what the graduates are looking for is income and fame. That service is all right in its way but it is incident to the main chance. This,

however, increases the contradiction between our opportunities and our dreams. Let us, for instance, survey the fields opened to a college-bred Negro. First of all, he looks to the professions. He regards college training as a pre-professional training. He feels that if he does not enter a profession after going to college that he is to a degree disgraced. His family and friends are disappointed. College means a profession and it means it whether it means for his particular profession or not. First of all, comes medicine, a profession which calls for long training, strong physique, wide knowledge of human nature, the ability to endure strain and suffering. The man who goes into medicine gives very little time or thought to the service which the physician may give a community or a group. It is not a matter of health and healing, it is a matter of a paying practice amid pleasant surroundings. The result is a profession already overcrowded. Not from the point of view of the need of medical service, but from the point of view of the money and fame which Negro physicians are able to get out of the present situation. There are dentistry and pharmacy with their usual demands upon physical strength. There again the service is the last thing thought of by most candidates and the income and the chances for gain are the main incentives. There is teaching, where the income is moderate or small but the tenure long. If the teacher keeps his mouth shut and follows the given routine, he can have for life with a short day's work and a short week's work, and a long summer vacation. Of the service which he can do to the children under him, he gives thought to be sure, but not nearly the amount of thought which the profession demands. The ministry is out of focus altogether. Of course, no modern college-bred Negroes give it a thought. It calls for competition with a type of untrained men where they are seldom successful. The Civil Service and political life is more alluring. There is a chance for large pay but insecure tenure, coupled with the law, which may bring considerable gains. But it demands a certain facility in things that most young men, certainly at first, shrink from. The field of journalism is narrowed to a comparatively few weekly papers. It has possibilities but the present openings are exceedingly few. Then there is the artist, the man who would write and the poet. Real success here calls for starvation for a long time. Anything less than real success defeats the artist's ideal. There are few who are willing to stick to this career. For, however, the professions, we have schools. Schools of theology, law, medicine, and there is alike, the professions for normal schools and teachers. But none of these schools today are addressing themselves fundamentally to the ethical or psychological aspects of the Negro professional man and to his problem of service as modifying and making a peculiar problem of his income. There are many college graduates who would like to enter business. Many of them are not attracted or adapted to the professions. Others, even if they are adapted to the professions, look at the world around them where the great rewards of life are going to business men. If they come froma northern college, their classmates by overwhelming majority go into business. The income of these men reach fabulous heights. They escape a certain kind of unpleasant publicity as to his personal affairs which is forced upon the professional man. They are allowed under the ethics of business to do things that the ethics of the professional man would not allow. But at the very beginning, they are faced by the problem of capital and credit. It is not the old problem of inheriting the wages of fifty parents, or of accumulating one's own capital, or of receiving personal credit from a friend. The capital which is used today is on so vast a scale that few white men and almost no Negroes inherit sufficient to go into business on an adequate scale. Capital is accumulated now by great institutions of credit and the masters of the banking system designate the persons who can use this credit and they do not designate black men. Moreover, in manufacturing, we have mass production, calling for capital and machinery on a vast scale. Into the great standard organizations colored people enter with great difficulty or not at all. The distribution of goods is coming also under the chain system and in these chains Negroes have little or no part. The result is that today the efforts of educating young men to go into the business are for the most part dismal failures. They can to some extent take advantage of certain manifestations of prejudice and go into insurance business and again back of the insurance business must start the credit organization of the country, and this is overwhelmingly in the hands of those who are not particularly eager to have Negroes succeed. Into the third field of industry, the difficulties are even greater. In the first place, there is the old prejudice. College-bred Negroes do not want to go into industry. He figures that the world is going to look down upon him if with his training he becomes an artisan. And yet he has the perfectly natural urge for the work of the chemist and physics, for the work of the engineer, for the work of the artisan, for the good hard physical labor. And then he comes to the personal service, whether it is nursing or conducting a household, or serving drinks in a drugstore. The difficulty here, however, is three-fold. First, in the higher ranks of the engineer, the openings for the most gifted Negro are frightfully small. The artisan is faced with the displacing machine and the average trade union.

33-6-96

3-97

And labor and personal service has its handicaps of small wage and public distress. Here, then, are the fields of the professions, business and industry, and we stand not outside of locked doors but a succession of closed doors, and the first doors that are partially opened are crowded and jammed with candidates so that they are in each other's way, so that few of them have any real chance to exercise their individual bent but are doing things because they are the only chances for earning a living. If here is not a chance for leadership, where is there? That there should be among twelve million people in a world of work any lack of work, any lack of chances for a man to develop his own bent to the highest is simply idiotic. A nation half the size of Spain, a nation as large as Belgium or Holland, a nation far larger than most of the new nations that grew up after the World War, hasn't any business to sit down in helplessness like this before a problem. It calls for thought and planning, but altogether logical thought and perfectly business planning. The people who demand services, professional and personal, the people who demand goods made by hands and machines, the people who demand the transportation and distribution of goods, the people who themselves furnish the capital which is being used by the world, those are our own people. They are the congregations. They fear our churches. They are the people that fear our streets and the Negro districts of our cities and counties. They need service. They have to have it. And they are willing to give labor and service for it, but as the organization is today, their labor and service is given principally to white people and the trained colored people who could give them their service are simply not there to give it, or not prepared to give it, or do not know how to give it. Even in our organization of health

23-6-98

and medicine, we are not doing one-tenth that the field demands, and so far as furnishing food and clothes and shelter and recreation goes, there is simply no meeting place for demands and supplies. I have walke through a Negro district in Wilmington and seen white artisans putting roofs on colored houses. You go through the business districts and see white clerks waiting upon colored customers. You pass factories where white workers are making things that colored people must buy. You go into banks where colored people have their wages and where colored people cannot borrow. You see roads on which Negroes must be transported, but which they cannot help make. And yet the solution of all these problems is clear and easy. There are examples all over the world. The experience of England and Denmark, of Russia andqCzecho-Slovakia, of all parts of the world for_____ for us, if these_____ were properly taught in our colleges and schools, and then logical inferences carried out inour universities. And all this must be done if we are going to enjoy that higher life for which the colleges are seeking to give us, the broad education. It is the man with leisure who explains the art and thought and ideals of the world. We have no leisure. Our income does not permit it. We are faced, therefore, with the necessity of such a careful collection of facts and figures, sufficient organization of life, sufficient direction of action as will extricate us from this absolutely unnecessary dilemma. The author of Laughing Boy told me of a case in New Mexico. There was a man and family who lived in a house which they had built. They ate the food left in the garden and from the animals which they raised. The animals furnished them wool and leather which they spun and tanned. They had wide lands for work and r creation. They had a lake for bathing. They needed only to buy a few things, like coffee and sugar which they could easily get from the surplus of what they raised. They were independent and happy. And there is no reason in the world why on a larger scale that this and under the peculiar difficulties of the way in which we live, twelve million Negroes might do the same thing and be an economic _____ mass of people with a refusal to think and play and dream.

33-6-100

W.E.B.D undated

Economic Planning for the American Negroes

In an address at Howard University, June, 1930, I discussed the history and present situation with regard to industrial and higher education among American Negroes, and I tried to show that at present neither the colleges nor the industrial schools were solving our problem of work and wages. Since that time, in several other addresses, I have tried to go further along this line and emphasize the fact that careful economic planning has got to take place among us if we are going to solve our present problems. I want in this address to gather up conclusions and statements which I have made before into one constructive whole and to discuss economic planning for American Negroes.

38-12-244

First of all, let me stress the facts in the situation of which most of us do not seem aware; and that is, the appalling ignorance in the United States, among all people, concerning the principles of economics and the specific facts of labor and income. This id due largely to the complete collapse of real economic teaching in our colleges. Beginning long before the World War and coincident with the triumph of international commerce, mass production, and large industry, of chain retail distribution, economic teaching in the United States has been reduced to the smallest possible proportions. Outstanding economic figures have either been discouraged or dismissed from their academic positions, with the result that today in a time of the most severe industrial crisis that this country and the world have known, there is no economic leadership, and least of all are we turning toward the colleges for information or guidance. This is true of the great white universities, and it is even more true of colored institutions. The older teachers in these colored institutions do not realize the new economic situation, and the younger teachers have been taught in the white institutions of the North. We face, therefore, a situation almost fantastic. Here we are with a partial and increasing educational system of our own, which has taken immense strides during the last decade. We have three institutions that bid fair to be real universities. We have a half-dozen first-class colleges that can be compared with the old New England college. We have not near enough high schools but we do have an increasing number of well-equipped, well-housed and well-manned secondary schools. The number of Negroes in college have increased phenomenally, not only in Negro colleges but as well in white colleges; and yet we face the gravest problem of our history not knowing what we can do to earn a living and how we may properly be trained for it.

38-12-245

Coming out of college, we face, as youth has ever faced, the three great possibilities of Service, Fame and Wealth. Service to fellow men; Fame as the applause of the world; and Wealth for enjoying life. The Negro college of my day stressed Service. Perhaps it was even maudlin and sentimental about it. We were all going out to lead our people and to be of service to them. The reiteration of this ideal led undoubtedly to a great deal of hypocrisy; but on the other hand, there was a tremendous amount of earnest and real willingness to sacrifice. There was here and there something of the true martyr spirit. I have seen men and women deliberately turn their backs on reputation and good income and go down with shining eyes into the backwoods of the South and devote themselves to a forlorn hope.

Today, however, this ideal has not even the saving tribute of of hypocrisy. We have throughout our schools a plain statement that what the graduates are looking for is income and fame. That service is all right in its way but it is incident to the main chance. This,

however, increases the contradiction between our opportunities and our dreams. Let us, for instance, survey the fields opened to a college-bred Negro. First of all, he looks to the professions. He regards college training as a pre-professional training. He feels that if he does not enter a profession after going to college that he is to a degree disgraced. His family and friends are disappointed. College means a profession and it means it whether it means for his particular profession or not. First of all, comes medicine, a profession which calls for long training, strong physique, wide knowledge of human nature, the ability to endure strain and suffering. The man who goes into medicine gives very little time or thought to the service which the physician may give a community or a group. It is not a matter of health and healing, it is a matter of a paying practice amid pleasant surroundings. The result is a profession already overcrowded. Not from the point of view of the need of medical service, but from the point of view of the money and fame which Negro physicians are able to get out of the present situation. There are dentistry and pharmacy with their usual demands upon physical strength. There again the service is the last thing thought of by most candidates and the income and the chances for gain are the main incentives. There is teaching, where the income is moderate or small but the tenure long. If the teacher keeps his mouth shut and follows the given routine, he can have for life with a short day's work and a short week's work, and a long summer vacation. Of the service which he can do to the children under him, he gives thought to be sure, but not nearly the amount of thought which the profession demands. The ministry is out of focus altogether. Of course, no modern college-bred Negroes give it a thought. It calls for competition with a type of untrained men where they are seldom successful. The Civil Service and political life is more alluring. There is a chance for large pay but insecure tenure, coupled with the law, which may bring considerable gains. But it demands a certain facility in things that most young men, certainly at first, shrink from. The field of journalism is narrowed to a comparatively few weekly papers. It has possibilities but the present openings are exceedingly few. Then there is the artist, the man who would write and the poet. Real success here calls for starvation for a long time. Anything less than real success defeats the artist's ideal. There are few who are willing to stick to this career. For, however, the professions, we have schools. Schools of theology, law, medicine, and there is alike, the professions for normal schools and teachers. But none of these schools today are addressing themselves fundamentally to the ethical or psychological aspects of the Negro professional man and to his problem of service as modifying and making a peculiar problem of his income. There are many college graduates who would like to enter business. Many of them are not attracted or adapted to the professions. Others, even if they are adapted to the professions, look at the world around them where the great rewards of life are going to business men. If they come from a northern college, their classmates by overwhelming majority go into business. The income of these men reach fabulous heights. They escape a certain kind of unpleasant publicity as to his personal affairs which is forced upon the professional man. They are allowed under the ethics of business to do things that the ethics of the professional man would not allow. But at the very beginning, they are faced by the problem of capital and credit. It is not the old problem of inheriting the wages of fifty parents, or of accumulating one's own capital, or of receiving personal credit from a friend. The capital which is used today is on so vast a scale that few white men and almost no Negroes inherit sufficient to go into business on an adequate scale. Capital is accumulated now by great institutions of credit and the masters of the banking system designate the persons who can use this credit and they do not designate black men. Moreover, in manufacturing, we have mass production, calling for capital and machinery on a vast scale. Into the great standard organizations colored people enter with great difficulty or not at all. The distribution of goods is coming also under the chain system and in these chains Negroes have little or no part. The result is that today the efforts of educating young men to go into the business are for the most part dismal failures. They can to some extent take advantage of certain manifestations of prejudice and go into insurance business and again back of the insurance business must start the credit organization of the country, and this is overwhelmingly in the hands of those who are not particularly eager to have Negroes succeed. Into the third field of industry, the difficulties are even greater. In the first place, there is the old prejudice. College-bred Negroes do not want to go into industry. He figures that the world is going to look down upon him if with his training he becomes an artisan. And yet he has the perfectly natural urge for the work of the chemist and physics, for the work of the engineer, for the work of the artisan, for the good hard physical labor. And then he comes to the personal service, whether it is nursing or conducting a household, or serving drinks in a drugstore. The difficulty here, however, is three-fold. First, in the higher ranks of the engineer, the openings for the most gifted Negro are frightfully small. The artisan is faced with the displacing machine and the average trade union.

38-12-246

38-12-242

38-12-248

And labor and personal service has its handicaps of small wage and public distress. Here, then, are the fields of the professions, business and industry, and we stand not outside of locked doors but a succession of closed doors, and the first doors that are partially opened are crowded and jammed with candidates so that they are in each other's way, so that few of them have any real chance to exercise their individual bent but are doing things because they are the only chances for earning a living. If here is not a chance for leadership, where is there? That there should be among twelve million people in a world of work any lack of work, any lack of chances for a man to develop his own bent to the highest is simply idiotic. A nation half the size of Spain, a nation as large as Belgium or Holland, a nation far larger than most of the new nations that grew up after the World War, hasn't any business to sit down in helplessness like this before a problem. It calls for thought and planning, but altogether logical thought and perfectly business planning. The people who demand services, professional and personal, the people who demand goods made by hands and machines, the people who demand the transportation and distribution of goods, the people who themselves furnish the capital which is being used by the world, those are our own people. They are the congregations. They fear our churches. They are the people that fear our streets and the Negro districts of our cities and counties. They need service. They have to have it. And they are willing to give labor and service for it, but as the organization is today, their labor and service is given principally to white people and the trained colored people who could give them their service are simply not there to give it, or not prepared to give it, or do not know how to give it. Even in our organization of health and medicine, we are not doing one-tenth that the field demands, and so far as furnishing food and clothes and shelter and recreation goes, there is simply no meeting place for demands and supplies. I have walke through a Negro district in Wilmington and seen white artisans putting roofs on colored houses. You go through the business districts and see white clerks waiting upon colored customers. You pass factories where white workers are making things that colored people must buy. You go into banks where colored people have their wages and where colored people cannot borrow. You see roads on which Negroes must be transported, but which they cannot help make. And yet the solution of all these problems is clear and easy. There are examples all over the world. The experience of England and Denmark, of Russia and Czecho-Slovakia, of all parts of the world for_____ for us, if these_____ were properly taught in our colleges and schools, and then logical inferences carried out inour universities. And all this must be done if we are going to enjoy that higher life for which the colleges are seeking to give us, the broad education. It is the man with leisure who explains the art and thought and ideals of the world. We have no leisure. Our income does not permit it. We are faced, therefore, with the necessity of such a careful collection of facts and figures, sufficient organization of life, sufficient direction of action as will extricate us from this absolutely unnecessary dilemma. The author of Laughing Boy told me of a case in New Mexico. Here was a man and family who lived in a house which they had built. They ate the food left in the garden and from the animals which they raised. The animals furnished them wool and leather which they spun and tanned. They had wide lands for work and r creation. They had a lake for bathing. They needed only to buy a few things, like coffee and sugar which they could easily get from the surplus of what they raised. They were independent and happy. And there is no reason in the world why on a larger scale that this and under the peculiar difficulties of the way in which we live, twelve million Negroes might do the same thing and be an economic _____ mass of people with a refusal to think and play and dream.

38-12-249

38-12-250

38-12-251

It is a tragic commentary on modern culture that when a man realizes the inherent beauty and longing beneath the religious belief of mankind, and seeks because of this to make religion reasonable, truthful and ethical, he is doomed to crucifixion.

John Haynes Holmes has had the vision and has made the effort. He has tried to establish a church founded on the Golden Rule and having as its creed recognized scientific truth and the best human experience and desire. He has tried to visualize this church as an integral part of modern life: of its politics and efforts toward social uplift; of its work and play; of its poverty and wealth. For this he has been pilloried as a radical; looked upon askance by the timid and respectable, and given but meagre financial support for his great effort. And yet, with all this, he is one of the chief citizens of the greatest city of the world, and his life and work mark a wide step forward from the days when words like his would have meant burning at the stake.

33-G-92

[1931]

[1932] Address given at Florence Kelley Memorial — Friends House N. Y. March 16 1932. 5 - o'Clock.

Florence Kelley

by W. E. B. Du Bois.

The death which we commemorate today brings to us no sense of that frustration or incompleteness which so often follows the end of a human life. We may well wish that all the courage and tenacity and accumulated experience of Florence Kelley were still at our disposal in the struggle of these hard days. And yet, in the rest which she has earned, comes a certain fine satisfaction. Our rightful heritage from her life is wealth enough for carrying on.

Very few American citizens, even those of education and breadth of outlook, are willing to face in the United States and in our day the problems which we inherit from the institution of Negro slavery in this land. Deliberately and repeatedly, the best class of american thinkers, writers and executives, turn their backs upon these problems, trying to ignore them and even to forget them.

If this is true of the rank and file, it is even more true of social workers. Of the greater leaders in social work in the United States during the last two decades, one may count on the fingers of one hand, those who have dared to see the plight of the American Negro as an integral part of the problem of American democracy. And one of these few was Florence Kelley.

She joined the work of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People at its first inception, was a member of our first Board of Directors in 1911, and remained an active participant until her death. She did this with a clear conception of what it cost her in prestige and sympathy. The majority of those people who were interested in her main work of the Consumers' League, were not interested in the Negro and had not the slightest desire, either to study the Negro problem or to do anything about it. Florence Kelley desired both knowledge and work. Nothing human was foreign to her interest, even thought that humanity was black. And so she was a member of our Board; she attended our meetings; she worked faithfully upon committees; and above all, she continued wanting to know the facts.

I was particularly impressed with that aspect of her activities. All Boards of Directors have numbers of people who loan their names and never attend, and that, of course, may be better than nothing, although not much better. They have, also, other persons who attend now and then or even regularly, but are there to listen and nod or to repeat, for the benefit of those present, certain choice bits of wisdom which they have picked up and embalmed and which may or may not be related to the facts in hand. But to have a board member who is eager for new facts and new lines of thought and fresh investigation, is an unusual thing. I remember, time and time again in our Board, when meetings were drawing on drowsily to conventional conclusions, Florence Kelley would burst in with a question. What was this thing? And what did it mean? And why? And what were the other and supplementary facts? And if they were not known, why were they not known, and how could they be obtained? I have seen a dead board galvanized, sometimes quite unwillingly by these new queries, this new orientation of thought, until either we had convinced Mrs. Kelley that our conclusions were right, or just as often she had convinced us that we were not ready for conclusions at all.

And then, once having grasped the situation, knowing the facts and having made up her mind, Florence Kelley stuck to the problem, reiterated it, explained it, and begged and called and insisted upon action. This is illustrated in the case in the repeated attempts which have been made by persons of the highest position in the United States, to put through Congress bills which would aid education in the common schools of the nation. They have stressed the disgraceful illiteracy which still characterizes this great republic. They have emphasized the dangers of sheer ignorance, but with all this, they have been in practically every instance not only willing but eager to allow the Southern States to expend these funds without any investigation or any power over the disgraceful discrimination now customary between white and colored children. Against this national surrender to ignorance, Florence Kelley took her stand, and by word and pen and personal complaint, she opposed every single attempt to perpetuate in new law the old discrimination against American Negroes in Federal appropriations.

47-9-133

Or again, certain immature students in Arkansas were sending out questionnaires concerning the Negro and one came to Mrs. Kelley. She declared this to be one of "a flood of fraudulent surveys based on meaningless questionnaires." And she added: "The Negro problem in the United States is an exceedingly difficult and delicate matter which should be dealt with only by people of mature years and proven and enlightened experience in the humble spirit of the searcher after truth."

On another occasion, when the City Housing Corporation planned projects for the poor at Radburn, New Jersey and Sunnyside Gardens, New York, it was Florence Kelley almost alone who forced these professional Liberals at least to face the discrimination which they were making against the most wretchedly-housed people in the community, and even though they continued to refuse to admit Negro tenants, they were forced to sin against the light.

49-6-134

Not only did Florence Kelley seek to do but up until the end of her life, she was willing to learn, which again sets her far apart from the average social worker. I can remember in the earlier days of our Association, when in the pages of THE CRISIS magazine that social equality with those of his fellows who wished it, was just as much a human right as ~~an~~ economic or political equality, Florence Kelley was aghast and for a while considered her resignation ~~to~~ from the Board. But there came a time when she acknowledged that this was a plain and temperate statement of a perfectly obvious truth. ~~She did for American Negroes great and continuing service in the correspondence which she had with students of social facts all over the country.~~

I might adduce many other instances of Mrs. Kelley's clear sight and unfaltering courage. It was not so much a question as to whether or not she was always right in her judgment but the faster moral problem of daring, unflinchingly and with open mind and willing intelligence, to face a situation not matter how difficult of understanding or how startling its implications and command. Half our muddle, indecision and cowardly dishonesty would disappear if we dared to know. If we dared to call a problem a problem and did not repeatedly seek to ignore it by burying our heads in the most popular surrounding sand.

This is the lesson of Florence Kelly's life and for the handing on of that lesson she paid--she paid in bitter dislike, in determined misunderstanding and in the loss of nearly every reward which smug respectability and calculating conformity brings to its legion of devotees. And of all Florence Kelley's sins against convention, none--not even her socialism and pacificism, her championing of sex equality and religious freedom, her fight for children and democracy--none ~~most~~ least her more fair-weather friends than her demand for the rights of 12 million Americans who are black.

Before such courage and determination, before such unswerving facing of Truth and Right as one great unified and universal problem, we stand today uncovered and with a sense of triumph in the presence of sorrow and death.

47-6-136

(1)

OF PEACE AND HAPPINESS

By W. E. B. Du Bois at Town Hall New York May 16 1932

37-6-47

World Peace and Happiness will best be promoted by insuring the contentment of the great mass of human beings the world over and the desire to hurt and harm no human thing. Here is a program so simple and clear and true that no one disputes it and yet few are willing to follow it. First of all, it is, we are often assured, quite impossible of realization. We cannot all be happy men say and we ought not to be if we could. And then growing more involved and subtle, we erect Pain and Evil into a great method of Ultimate Good and beat our breasts and shed our own blood in ecstacy of Sacrifice.

But before involving our thought in such intricacy and contradiction, let us go back and gently insist: Would it not be the best possible world if all living things could be happy and are we utterly sure that this is impossible? Let us face Evil and Sorrow and Hurt. Are they all and always necessary? The deeds and happenings of the world that sicken us are not mainly Chance and Accident and what, for want of words, we call Fate. Rather it is the Will to Evil; the careless gambling with human life; and the sorrow which effort and kindness could prevent. If we subtracted from the endless and seemingly eternal suffering of mankind, all that reason and work, forethought and kindness, fairness and the curbing utter selfishness could do—how much of Evil would be left? War would go and cruel Punishment. Most of our Sickness would disappear and all of our Poverty. The great bulk of Crime that rests on poverty, insanity and ignorance would cease to be ~~disappear~~; and with Ignorance would fall all that fantastic superstructure of Fear and Hate, of Prejudice and vague Dislike; and of that colossal selfishness which men call Patriotism, Family pride, Race superiority and consciousness of Kind.

37-6-48

(2)

37-6-49

Let us freely admit | there would be something of Suffering left— Disease which science has not yet conquered; the chance and accident beyond human control | and the tragedy of Death | if normal Death is ever tragedy. | But surely the stopping of preventible evil | would leave us in a world | which we could justly and rightly call Happy, where men | in the recurrent miracle of Spring | could rightly and in overwhelming measure | feel themselves in tune | with the abundant joy of resurrecting nature.

Why should anyone doubt the possibility of this ideal | and even go so far | as to refuse to recognize the contentment | of the great mass of men | as the true and only end of living? It is doubtless, first, because the Easy and Logical and Obvious | does not appeal to the average mind, | distorted by seeing Evil all its life | until Life seems in its essence red and wrong. And, secondly, because so many of us, (though we hate to say it), derive a curious sadistic pleasure from the suffering of others. To know that that neighbor of yours, whom you never did like, is at last "getting it in the neck" is a well-known form of through enjoyment.

37-6-50

(4)

Perhaps the greatest cost | of preventible evil | is the sense of utter helplessness. The frantic search for the Thunderbolts of some Almighty God to do the simple job that any ordinary man | could do | if he would. | We want alchemies and mystic rythyms; revelations, holy books, prophesies and Sons of God. | We want Temples and altars and sacrifices. | But we are impatient when we are asked to try meekness and forgiveness and vaccination, public baths, old age pensions and respect for brown women as well as white. We want a priest to raise himself from the dead at Easter, | but we will not provide sufficient hospitals or medical science to raise Chinamen from the miasma of flood | or Negroes from the bite of the Tsetse fly | or

37-6-51

Indians from the malarial musquito.

Beyond this is a more sinister and widely spread feeling. We do not, all of us, want other people happy. We do not always acknowledge it, but we cherish a deeply hoarded glee at the disaster and suffering of some folk. We want to play God and punish and blast in accord with our secret dislikes. We do not want to stop crime nearly as much as we want to burn a criminal alive or hang, draw and quarter him and watch him writhe. We do not want to abolish poverty. We do not think it ought to be abolished. We regard it as part of the beneficent nature of things. We would not want to live in a world where there were not people so poor that they had to dig manure and wash up after our filth or else die of well-merited starvation. We cannot imagine a world worth living in where there would be no color bar against Dagoes, Chinks, Japs and Niggers, guarded with mighty guns and poison gas; or where at least some hotels and some residential districts, some schools and some public offices would not be closed to Jews.

And just so far as we are unwilling to accept the simple and obvious duty in lieu of the miraculous Ten Commandments; just so far as our selfish dislike of most human beings is necessary to our complete satisfaction, just exactly so far is the unhappiness of most men necessary and the evil of this world inescapable and eternal.

37-6-52

On the other hand, if looking life squarely in the face with open eyes and unhindered ears, we once realize that all this paradox and contradiction, this futile waste of effort and clouding of logic is due primarily not to intricacies of Creation but to the foolishness and blindness and selfishness of men—and not of other men and men afar off in time and space, but of us ourselves here and now, then the problem of the world becomes one of stark and awful simplicity—

a deed of today, done in this city and this country, by you.

The way which you will stop war in Europe and China will be first to stop in your own hearts. The Rebellion in India will be your own rebellion against humanity in all its forms and colors. The Crime that reddens this land will first stain your hands and be washed therefrom before it leaves your neighbors clean. And the Starvation that stalks in every cornerof the world, will find its answer and solution in the over-fed and over-dressed bodies of this audience.

37-6-53

We sit in ignorance, we who presume to teach and lead, because we shut our minds and ears to the wider and deeper intelligence of the millions of the world's masses, stored in their knowledge and experience and ready, through the floodgates of a world-wide democracy, to teach all mankind. In our hands, here in America, here in New York, are the keys to Democracy and linked therewith the keys to Happiness and World Peace.

Address Delivered by Dr. W.E.B. Du Bois

Before the Twenty-third Annual Conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People - Washington, D. C., May 18,1932.

WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE N.A.A.C.P.?

The meetings of this Association have usually been those where we have taken time to criticise our white citizens in plain language, and I have tried to do my part in that direction. Now the time has come when some of the time should be devoted to self-criticism, and all the more today, because during the last year this Association has been subjected to criticism from within and from without. These are days and years of criticism when all sorts of individuals and of organizations have had to make some kind of answer and to say why they are doing these things and that; and that is particularly applicable to organizations, because organizations are born, live, and then they come to the time when they begin to show signs of age, and if they do not receive some new infusion of youth they die. Moreover, it does not make any particular difference to the individual or organization whence the criticism comes or why. After all, the thing itself is the criticism.

I have tried in the last few weeks to make various categories of the criticisms I have heard which have been levelled against this Association and every time I made the final list it was different from the last.

First of all, I think the widest spread criticism within the Negro race of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is that it is a highbrow organization; that it is an organization composed largely of the better circumstanced of the Negro race, of those who by accident and by their own efforts rank higher than the mass of their people, who have accumulated more wealth and who, consequently, feel more of the pressure of prejudice and of discrimination than the masses are supposed to feel; that, going beyond that, those people who formed the organization had very naturally met opposition and that they think of the organization as for themselves; that not only is the organization composed of these advantaged people but that the object of the organization is the advancement of this particular class of the Negro race.

42-6-211

Now, this organization was formed at a time when the phrase, "the talented tenth", meant something for the advancement of men, when we were thinking along lines of that sort. We said, "The people who are the exceptional people must of necessity be the ones who lead any group out of the wilderness.It is not a question of their advantages." And then we went further than that and quite naturally said, "This organization must also be for the advancement of this "talented tenth." After all, if the talented tenth is the judge, the tool by which we are going to raise the Negro race, then the more we ourselves are raised, the more advantages we have, the more in the long run we are going to solve this problem.

But there comes a question . "Are you thinking of the advancement of this tenth for your own sake or for the sake of the great mass of people? When it comes to the advancement of the great mass of people who is to be the judge as to what these people want and ought to have ? We are the ones who know what the masses ought to want; therefore, we are the ones who go ahead and lay down the program for these people, who manage; and while we have been going on with our program there has come actually a change in the thought of the world, a change which is tremendous and says not only is the object of the organization advancement for the masses of people but that it must be dominated by the masses of people. That change is so fast that there are large numbers of people who have not heard it at all; large numbers who do not believe it. It is going to have a hard time making its way but it is going to make its way. The world more and more is going to be organized not simply for the masses of people but by the masses of people. They are going to be the ones who will dominate.

Then there comes the question of means, as to how this is to be brought about; and it comes inside our organization. If we change our point of view as more and more we have got to change it and think of this Association as an Association which uses the talents of the talented, the advantages of those who form our advantaged class, we have got to come to the place where we more clearly realize that this organization is to be used for the advantage of the great masses of the people and that the great masses of the people are the ones who are going in the long run to have the voice. They are the ones who are going to say what is going to happen and what they think is for their advantage.

It is an extremely difficult problem that is placed before us and the peoples of the world. It resolves itself into a matter of organization. And that brings me to the second criticism which has been aimed against this Association - that this is a peculiarly centralized organization; that the Board of Directors is self-perpetuating; that the Chairman of the Board has too much power. There are times when the Chairman of the Board is the National Association. This is a meeting which comes here without power, which discusses matters but its decision has no authority. You come to no conclusions which are incumbent upon the Board of Directors to execute. The Board meeting in New York in the National Office constitute through the power which they have the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. Now, of course, there were historical reasons for that. At the time when we were organizing it was a little difficult for any body of people to stand on a platform with much less than that and be safe. We wanted to keep the platform covered and know where it was; so we put it in the hands of a small group of people in order to carry out the ideas we had.

II-A-6-213

Nevertheless, the time comes when it is necessary, for the advantage of the central body, that there be decentralization to some extent, in authority and in power. It is for the advantage of the central body because after all this problem which we call the Negro problem is growing in complexity every single day. Every man who is born with a face perceptibly brown in any degree has been a man who knew all about the Negro problem. It made no difference where he was born, he was perfectly ready to go out and lecture when white citizens wanted him to tell what the Negro wanted and what he thinks. We are supposed to know Negro music. We do not know it by intuition. In no greater degree do we know the whole Negro problem as it it presents itself to us in thousands of communities.

It is, therefore, necessary that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People have real branches; and we have not. We have organizations throughout the United States which now and then come to life and which live during the time that the Regional Secretary is there, and go to sleep and die possibly for a year or more. Moreover, those branches have a right to complain on their part. They say, "After all, we are never called to life until the central office needs money; then there come clarion calls to get together, join the Association, and send us funds." There is no doubt about the need of funds. Any organization which tries to take care of the problems of twelve millions of people needs a good deal more money than the Association has ever had. On the other hand, it is not going to get these funds until the branches of the Association become really live centers, real centers and living cells of activity and of ideals.

Now, it is easier to say that a branch, a local organization, should live and function than it is to point out just exactly the way in which it is going to do this. We have always been terribly afraid that some branch would go off on its own hook and do curious things; but I think the real fear is that the branch will not go off on any hook at all, or would not go at all. Life should come from the branches of the Association and we have been trying to do the other thing, send down the life, and we haven't enough life to send down. If we are going to have these branches as real live organizations, a thousand different centers which are studying their own problems and in that way the National Office become as it should a clearing house rather than a place where the different solutions are made, are organized and sent down; if we are going to have that kind of thing; we have got to look to our program.

The program for this Association was made when the echoes of the eighteenth century were still before us. Think of the phrase which has interpreted what we pledge to do -"free from peonage, free from ignorance, free from disfranchisement, free from insult." We ring the changes upon the word, free - the idea of freedom which originated in the eighteenth century. That was a negative program. It still is. There must be there a suppression of terms. We want freedom not for freedom itself. We want freedom for the action which is coming. The premise which was stressed is that once you get this great freedom or have a larger degree of freedom, then you are going forward and be a part of the American nation, taking such action as other Americans would take under the circumstances. That has not shown itself altogether true, chiefly because the success of our program has been a gradual success. We have gradually progressed in nearly all the lines in which we have been working. It is not often that an organization working twenty years can point to so much that is tangible. There is not so much danger of lynching and mob law. There is larger political freedom. The widespread insult on account of race is not as clear, as open, as it was before we began our work. But at the same time there are difficulties that come from a gradual widening of these principles so that more and more we are faced with the necessity of a positive program. This has been brought out tonight, it has been brought out in all of the argument as to what you and I are going to do in these days of depression. You are going to discuss an economic programand that program was put in without any particular thought that we are transgressing in a way the kind of outline we had of our work in the early days. We rather prided ourselves that it was not a question of saying what Negroes should do but what trammel should be taken away from their freedom of action. But we must go forward because we are faced with the same kind of decision that we were faced with in the matter of being a high-brow organization. It was not the difficulty of making the change in the first case. We said, "We have been accused, but after all we have been working for the masses of the colored people; so many things we have done have had their interests in mind.

47-6-215

But we are going into this economic program which is going to find in the opposition/membership of the Association and among friends of the white race who are with us. There is among us still the idea that the kind of things we have learned in our branches, the idea that after all we are going to achieve our economic freedom in the United States in the way that economic emancipation has been brought in other days. They say, "We are going to work hard, earn money, invest that money, have property, employ ourselves, and thus we will reach what used to be called economic independence." The majority of thinking colored people have something like that today in the back of their heads. That means, of course, that if it is successful we are going to build up inside of the Negro race an economic class, not quite clear as yet; we are going to have a property class, an employing class, a class with property, a class which will employ. Hitherto, we have not been able; we have no rich and poor as yet. We have some who are better off than others; but after all you cannot say that the class struggle, the economic struggle, has shown itself inside the Negro race. But that is partially hidden by the fact that we are living in a great country where most of our employment comes from the white capitalists. But if the things keeps on and our thinking keeps clear as in the past we are going to have this division, a real economic class.

How far is that a division which we ought to have? We can say frankly it is a division which is against the present trend of the world. We may go back after this depression to what appears to be the same economic condition as before; but as a matter of fact there will never be the same condition. More and more we are going to have an economic organization where the masses of the people will have a larger voice in the distribution of wealth and in the rulership of industry. In the meantime what are you and I going to be doing? There is a feeling which we have all got, that all we have to do is sit back and see the salvation of the Lord. But it does not happen that way. Mr. Harris said all we have got to do is to get the whites and blacks together. But if they do not get together, then what are we going to do? Manifestly, it is necessary that we have an economic organization, an economic program, and know exactly where the world is going and where we are going, assuming the world is going.

94-6-214

In making this program we are going to have a difficulty, a peculiarly racial difficulty and one which we have been facing for years; and every time I give voice to it I get in trouble. I am going to give voice to it again.

This Association has laid down as one of its cornerstones that we are against segregation by race. As to the validity of that I am sure, for I am faced with a paradox . In the District of Columbia you have separate schools. Separate schools are against the basic principles of this organization. This organization has its headquarters in New York. In New York we have mixed schools. That is according to the basic principles of this organization. However, I know that the colored children of the District of Columbia are getting better education. I sent my child as far from Harlem as possible to get an education. I should have been very glad to send her to the public schools of the District of Columbia. This is not against the principle laid down with which you and I agree; but manifestly we cannot go on with that double argument. Here is the situation in our institutions of higher learning. It is more difficult for a Negro student to get into Harvard, Columbia, Yale, than it used to be. The institutions of higher learning throughout the United States are crowding Negroes and some others out, as much as they can. On the other hand, here are the Negro universities. Their development in the last ten years has been one of the miracles in the world. We have made enormous advances in education. We should not have discriminations in universities, but we have got them.

We come to the District of Columbia and we come bringing principles of ant-segregation which belong in this organization. We meet in this church. This church is a product of segregation; a product not only of the system when Negroes were put by themselves to worship God but one that broke down a large number of their bonds.

We must have a statement which does not talk differently with the two sides of our mouths. An organization working for the uplift of the Negro people should not be apologetic and need not be. There are those who say that in an ideal world we ought to have no segregation by race; but, unfortunately this is not an ideal world and it does not look as if it is going to be tomorrow.

Then, there comes a third thing which must go into the new program. The United States of America has been for a long time going along with a simple sort of philosophy as to its relation to the rest of the world. This philosophy arose after the Civil War, when we got a chance to develop the enormous wealth of this country for ourselves; and we kept all other exploiters of the world out; and we made millions upon millions, so that we became a collosal example of a great, rich, exploiting country. And now we are trying to show ourselves and the rest of the world that America stands by itself - nothing to do with the League of Nations; nothing to do with the

44-6-219

The only difficulty is we have something to do with them. Once the President of the United States said it was simply confidence in ourselves which would restore conditions, but now he says it is conditions in Europe which is the cause of our trouble. Colored people have tried the same kind of thing; tried to get the National Association interested in the peoples of the world; tried to bring them back to the basic idea which gave us our name. When that name was adopted it was adopted because those people who stood behind it wanted us to remember it was not merely for the advancement of the Negro in the United States. There were numbers of people who said, "Now, haven't we trouble enough at home without going to look for trouble in Africa? This is not an African problem," they said. "After all, this is a local American problem. What we want to do is to become American citizens. After that we may take some interest in other parts of the world." The only difficulty is that this cannot be worked out. The solution of the color problem of the world is going to be worked out in Africa before it is worked out in America, and in the West Indies just as soon as it is worked out in America. You may say you have nothing to do with the upheaval and strife in other parts of the world; but you have.

We must, then, make our program wider. We have a sort of re-adopted program which has to do with our economic status; a program which has to do with a clearer recognition of our united effort; a program which has to do with the world ramifications of the color line. Every one of you will say, "That is a pretty large order.." We started out with a fairly simple program; started out to do away with discrimination in the United States. It is analagous to the way in which the Abolitionists started out to abolish slavery; and when slavery was abolished by the Thirteenth Amendment and a few other amendments, the Liberator stopped publication and the Abolitionists stopped work. It meant the work was just well begun; it meant there would be another organization; the work had to go on.

122-6-41

Now, with us we have a name that has a good many advantages yet. We have the possibility of not going again through the throes of organization. Some people speak lightly of starting national organizations. No one who has been through it really wants to start again. He wants rather to save all of that energy and reorganize and start again on a larger program. But that takes courage and it takes strength.

Now, courage and strength come from youth; and the greatest charge that has been brought against the N.A.A.C.P. is the fact that we have not used the youth. We have not invited them in; have not shown any particular thought about their problem. I often think of the way that phrase, "a man without a country," applies to certain young colored men and women. A student in Chicago not lone ago passed out a questionairre to certain young colored students asking them about certain things which you and I ought to know - the names of certain Negroes who had led insurrections; Negroes who had been prominent; and he was tremendously disgusted and surprisedthat they did not know anything about it. Why should they? Why should anybody going to the University of Chicago know anything at all about the Negro race? Why should he have any idea of what the Negroes of the United States have done? Not by anything he has heard in his classes, because they are not teaching that. Consequently, we are sending out continually young men and women who know nothing about us.

These young people have not been welcomed into this organization; particularly because we had so much to do. We have made gestures but usually our gestures were not felt. We wanted them to organize and do what we wanted them to do, but they did not want to. They wanted to say some things which were not complimentary, and that is very difficult for older people to hear.

The youth have got to come into this organization because those who are in it are not going to run it very much longer. You have got to have that trained body. After all, you get the new ideals, you get the strength to go forward, from the young people who are going forward. The matter of extending to them the benefit of your experience and wisdom is an extremely difficult and intricate one. They do not want to listen. And why should they? In some way the link between one generation and another has got to be made, and that is the task to which the N.A.A.C.P. has not given its thought.

Let me recapitulate these four things, these four criticisms of the N.A.A.C.P.:

1. It has laid itself open to the charge of being a high-brow organization, and while the work it has done has been in the main work for the masses, it must in the future recognize that the interests of the masses are the interests of this Association, and that the masses have got to voice themselves through this Association.

2. The N.A.A.C.P. has got to decentralize the power of the central office and learn that great lesson of democracy, to use the store of experience and knowledge which the masses of people possess. We must, therefore, increase the activity and power of the branches and of the Annual Conference.

3. We must have a positive program rather than mere negative attempt to avoid segregation and discrimination. We need a program of economic guidance and of united effort for the realization of racial and interracial ideals and a program which recognizes the color and race problems of the world as part of our Negro problem here in America.

4. Finally, we must get the strength and courage for this readjustment of our objects by attracting and assisting and welcoming Youth to our organization.

43-6-223

(1930) [1932]

NAACP

32-5-38

WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE N. A. A. C. P.

W. E. B. DuBois

In recent years, and particularly during the past year, the N. A. A. C. P. has been subjected to continuous and even violent criticism. This arises partly because this is an era of criticism—of criticism and suffering and disillusion—no human institution can or should escape its share. Again no organizations are eternal. They are born. They live. They die. As they grow old they must continually submit to such acid tests as will determine their right longer to exist. Finally, all of us know, whether inside or outside the N. A. A. C. P., that we merit criticism. That there are plenty of things "wrong" with us. That we are not, never were and never claimed to be a perfect organization. We can have an honest pride in our past. Considering the magnitude of our task, the limitation of our means, the opposition of a powerful part of white America and the naturally divided councils and jealousies within our own constituency, our success has been nothing short of extraordinary. On the other hand, it is equally true that the N. A. A. C. P. has not only not settled the Negro problem, it has hardly more than begun to settle it and what it has not done is far greater in extent and importance than what it has done or has tried to do.

Only then out of attention to and earnest study of the systematic and continuous criticism aimed at us, can we hope to revise and rearrange our program and strengthen our action and face an even more critical and exacting future. Nor does it make any essential difference whence the criticism comes and from what motives or how valid its assertions. So far as our arraignment is based on falsehood, we can easily answer it by re-stating and reiterating the truth.

So far as it comes from enmity and jealousy, it is just as valid if true as though it were based on high motives of helpfulness. Above all, let us never be jockeyed into a position of denying to others the right of free speech and criticism even when directed unjustly against us. I have especially in mind the criticism of Communists in the Scottsboro case. I think much of the Communists criticism of the N. A. A. C. P. is deliberately false. I, nevertheless, stand firmly and squarely for their right to voice their beliefs in regard to us, the United States and the whole capitalistic world. Truth and truth alone is criteria of the past and only reason and faith can chart the future.

37-5-39

Current criticisms of the N. A. A. C. P. fall into these main categories:

1. That we are a "high-brow" organization interested mainly in the "Talented Tenth" and in those of our own group who live by exploiting labor; and that we are not primarily interested in the great mass of laboring Negroes.
2. That our organization is autocratic and centralized in the New York office with no effective democratic control and that the expenditure of monies and the far-reaching decisions as to policies and lines of action are controlled by a small inner clique without effective consultation with branches and individuals.
3. That the proportion of our income spent in salaries and overhead is excessive.
4. That we are not covering anywhere nearly the field of work for which any definite settlement of the Negro problem calls but are simply selecting cases here and there for reasons of publicity and advertising.

5. That the N. A. A. C. P. is not attracting youth. That the young people—workers, students and graduates—are not joining the organization; are not being consulted or employed by it but that it is becoming a stronghold of conservatism dominated by the middle-aged and old.

6. That, particularly, we are failing in our program to recognize that political and social reform depends today primarily upon economic reform and that without a thorough-going and even revolutionary change in our organization of industry, there can be no frontal attack on race prejudice.

7. That the general program of the N. A. A. C. P. is outgrown and out-of-date and needs thorough-going revision in the light of present-day facts and that this applies especially to racial segregation and international efforts.

I propose to examine each of these criticisms in turn in the light of history and present fact:

1. That we are a "high-brow" organization interested mainly in the "Talented Tenth" and in those of our own group who live by exploiting labor and that we are not primarily interested in the great mass of laboring Negroes.

In 1910, the dominant philosophy among American Negroes and their friends was that the salvation of the race depended upon trained leadership; that the "Talented Tenth" were both proof and means; proof of the possibilities of the Negro race in character and accomplishment and the means by which the masses were to be lifted, pushed and led forward.

It was on this philosophy that the N. A. A. C. P. was based. When we demanded that American Negroes be "physically free from peonage, mentally free from ignorance, politically free from disfranchisement and socially free from insult," we undoubtedly had primarily in mind, as the result of this freedom, the advance of larger and larger numbers of black folk in education, wealth and prominence, and we envisaged the rise of the masses of Negroes by means of this leadership.

32-5-41

Meantime, the thought of the world has changed. It has been pointed out that aristocracies of talent may and may not serve the mass and that they are more than apt to help in the continual subjectionof the masses if they become a part of the present economic system which is based on the exploitation of hired labor. There is no doubt that there has been strong tendency, beginning with the economic philosophy of the earlier Tuskegee and coming down to the Negro business development of our own day, to see in the establishment of Negro landlords and capitalists the settlement of the problem of racial discrimination. The N. A. A. C. P. has never wholly embraced that doctrine. It has continually stressed injustice to the masses—lawlessness and lynching, serfdom and poverty—but at the same time it has not openly and clearly espoused the cause of common labor insofar as the real interests of black labor were diametrically opposed to the interests of black investors and employers as well as white exploiters. True it is that the diversity of interest between capital and labor within the black group is still small. Our capitalists are largely laborers who saved and our laborers buy houses to occupy as well as rent. We have not come to the period of "Class Struggle". Black employers give work with better pay and conditions than most employees could get elsewhere, and this has obscured the essential division of interest and the necessity of consequent action. Nevertheless, the whole world development since the Russian Revolution and the World War forces a decision upon the N. A. A. C. P. Where do we stand? With the privileged aristocracy of the world, which by its ownership and monopoly of capital is controlling the political and social development of the masses of men, or with a new industrial democracy of working people who more and more consciously propose to organize industry and direct the division of wealth in accordance with the wants and wishes of those who create it? Insofar as the N. A. A. C. P. has not faced this decision in the past, it may excuse itself by saying that there has been hitherto in the Negro race no sufficient division of economic interest to make decision necessary. But every hour now decreases the validity of this excuse and compels us to decide just where we stand between Mass and Class.

2. That our organization is autocratic and centralized in the New York office with no effective democratic control and that the expenditure of monies and the far-reaching decisions as to policies and lines of action are controlled by a small inner clique without effective consultation with branches and individuals.

When the N. A. A. C. P. was organized, it faced opposition so bitter without and within the race, that its firm establishment was a grave problem. For a year it was a "conference" without office, funds, or salaried officials. Even when it achieved a permanent location and a Secretary, it had no money and its hope of contributions and endowment from the rich was immediately recognized as a dream. The colored world regarded us with suspicion, dislike and ridicule—suspicion that our object was simply to criticize and attack those who were already working to solve our problem; dislike because of our plain speaking, and ridicule because of our impossible program. One of our colored contemporaries remarked when we were a year old: "Well, you haven't restored the Negro's vote, abolished 'Jim Crow' cars, nor stopped lynching!" It was this attitude that led us to concentrate our efforts, centralize power in the hands of the few we trusted, frown upon debate and oratory, come to quick and far-reaching decision in order to keep continuously and doggedly at our job.

32-542

The result of this policy has been at once our success and our present difficulty. Without centralized power of action and money on hand in the earlier days, we would have gone the way of the Afro-American Council and degenerated into a debating society accomplishing nothing because of divided counsels and intolerable delay. Autocracy of organization has pointed the method and way of work. But on the other hand, we suffer from the weakness of all autocracy. The King by the Grace of God does wrong, not from will but from lack of knowledge. Only by appeal to every widening democracy—to my Lords and Gentlemen and even to commoners and laborers—can he learn what the nation wants and needs. Democracy is not miraculous, it is a Reservoir of human Knowledge and experience out of which may be gleaned the world's best and widest wisdom. The baffling social problem of democracy is the method of extracting this wisdom and the technique of applying it. We Negroes are afraid of Democratic methods—because of the present disrepute of Democracy in the nation and world and because we have had less experience in democracy than most folk. Slavery means not simply physical compulsion but compulsion of thought. Our first experiments in free democratic action scared us because of our ever attentive audience who ridiculed and disparaged. Even today the mobs which try to rule our great fraternal organizations and our church conferences, increase our distrust of mass decisions. Nevertheless, we have no choice. In the long run the people will and must rule. And our only opportunity is in helping to decide what kind of people these potential rulers shall be. The failure of democracy in the United States and in the modern world is due primarily to the fact that the government has not succeeded in making the ruling people intelligent and efficient, so that democratic power is continually wielded by mass ignorance debauched by demagogues. When it comes to voluntary action within groups which are not governments and thus have but limited group control, the problem of democracy is increasingly difficult. Nevertheless, there are some compensating advantages. The group has a voice in choosing its own membership, and thus by care and teaching and study it may build a constituency whose democracy is a source of intelligent guidance, rather than of frustration.

There is no doubt that the N. A. A. C. P. has gone as far in the concentration of power as it can or ought to. It needs now the intelligent co-operation of its branches and membership, and into the hands of these branches and members some of the power hitherto exercised by the central office must be entrusted. Indeed, the Negro's problem today has no such unity as corresponds to unified central action. The condition, opportunities and needs of the varying groups of American Negroes differ tremendously in every center throughout the United States. They can only be intelligently understood by local study and local knowledge, and remedied in part only by local action. They call for the raising and expenditure of local as well as national funds. This means that in the future, if the N. A. A. C. P. is going successfully to do its job, it must become not one central office but a thousand central offices working in unison with a main office as a clearing house of activities. This annual conference, instead of being simply a place of speeches and publicity, consultation and advice, must become a real center of power with the right and duty of naming at least a part of the directorate of the National Organization and of laying down policies in general lines. There is no doubt that the changes here indicated, to be effective and successful, must be made gradually with great thought and care. But on the other hand, they must come; it is inevitable, if this organization is going to reflect, as it should, the voice and action of twelve million American Negroes.

3-5-45

3. That the proportion of our income spent in salaries and overhead is excessive.

It would be easy to present figures here which would prove that this organization, as compared with other social organizations throughout the United States, has had a modest expenditure for salaries and has done its work on a small budget. But the gravamen of the criticism here voiced lies deeper than this. It is in reality not a criticism of the earning capacity of individuals or the cost of certain sorts of work; it is the revolt of poor people who are trying to exist on an income far below that which furnishes the bare necessities of life against the favored classes who not only have enough to live upon decently and happily, but in a large number of cases, have money to waste on luxuries and even anti-social activities.

Poor people are today criticizing a world in which poverty is unchallenged regarded as natural and inevitable. And they are especially alarmed and incensed when they see this unequal division of income invading the limits of their own group.

The answer to that criticism is, that as the world is now organized, we ourselves are victims of its condition and cannot of our own initiative set prices and scales of expenditure. When the N. A. A. C. P. hires lawyers, the price which they pay is not set by the income standards of the Negro group. Nor can we stop to argue in a case of life and death as to what the right reward of a lawyer ought to be. When Negroes hire Negroes for executive work, they are not free to decide what executive work in the United States is worth, but are faced by the alternative of either paying customary salaries or discriminating against our own race. Moreover, it is not usually a question of social workers being paid too much but rather the undoubted fact that most other workers are paid too little, while certain captains of industry are paid out of all proportion to what their services are worth to the world. These are the economic contraditions in which we find ourselves, and yet there is undoubtedly some steps toward reform and reconciliation open to the colored servants of colored groups. First of all, they can and must eschew the American ideal of great wealth, of what is so often called "independence". They must definitely put before themselves the ideal of small income and moderate living expense. On the other hand, it would directly defeat the very objects for which they and the colored people are working if income were too low for them to live and rear moderate families and have food and shelter necessary to health and efficiency.

37-5-46

4. That we are not coverng anywhere nearly the field of work for which any definite settlement of the Negro problem calls but are simply selecting cases here and there for reason of publicity and advertising.

There is no doubt that we are not covering our field of work. And that is because the field is so large and intricate. With a budget ten times the size of our present budget, we could not begin to deal effectively with all cases of illegal arrests, excessive punishment, cheating in wage and property, discrimination in education, and dozens of other categories where race prejudice shows itself in the United States. For this reason, we are tempted to overemphasize publicity. We advertise the cases in which the public is interested, in order to keep an increase interest. We arrange programs for our meetings and conferences with a wary eye to the headliner whose appearance will get us on the front page of newspapers. We use propaganda and ballyhoo, and to some extent, we are compelled to do this as the sheer price of survival.

But these methods must not deceive us into thinking that Advertisement is Work or that Publicity is Accomplishment. After all, looking back upon what hasbeeen done in the last twenty years, quite outside of what has been said about it, there is a distinct improvement in race relations in the United States to which the N. A. A. C. P. has certainly contributed. This and this alone is our excuse for being; and our hope for the future is through the strengthening and broadening of branch work to be able to cover the field more thoroughly.

37-5-42

5. That the N. A. A. C. P. is not attracting youth. That the young people—workers, students and graduates--are not joining the organization; are not being consulted or employed by it but that it is becoming a stronghold of conservatism dominated by the middle-aged and old.

32-5-48

This is a serious accusation and it is true. This is not the only organization of which it is true. Nevertheless, it is peculiarly serious in our case because the need of successive increments of trained youth is so great in our case. The number of our trained young men and women has been increasing extraordinarily during the last ten years. THE CRISIS found during the collegiate year, during 1930-31, nearly nineteen thousand Negro college students and two thousand annual college graduates. If we add to this army, the numbers of those educated in other ways than by the formal methods of the schools, we must realize that we are receiving yearly a body of three or four thousand trained young people who must be used for the emancipation of the Negro face. Their use for this purpose has been unfortunately limited. Even if they step into life filled with enthusiasm, ideas and the spirit of sacrifice, the opportunities for them to work, particularly for their own people, are limited to an extent which is almost ridiculous. The N. A. A. C. P. has done almost nothing directly to guide and employ these young people, and has done very little to organize them and encourage them to membership and voluntary activity. It is one of our greatest failures, and it calls for the serious attention of this organization in its central office and in all its branches. It is not enough to train our young people. We must secure them proper employment and the opportunity to forward our ideals.

6. That particularly, we are failing in our program to recognize that political and social reform depends primarily upon economic reform and that without a thorough-going and revolutionary change in our organization of industry, there can be no frontal attack on race prejudice.

This is the accusation voiced particularly by Communists and other Radicals. They say that the legalistic and political program,— the program of social uplift and reform which the N. A. A. C. P. has been voicing and following, is a case of putting the cart before the horse; that so long as industry, wealth and income are dominated and monopolized by privileged classes, there can be no political freedom and no unhampered justice; that, therefore, our program should be turned around and that we should lay all stress upon a new industrial order which puts the control ofwealth, industry and income into the hands of the producers.

This is a fundamental criticism which I have already touched on. It will meet, so far as the American Negro is concerned, and particularly in the case of some of his best white friends and helpers, a great deal of opposition. Stung by the discrimination against him in the labor unions; doubtful of the attitude of white labor and the middle class of clerks and merchants, and encouraged by the action of rich philanthropists in providing education and other social institutions for him, the Negro has been largely persuaded that his path lies in alliance with the rich against poor, and that the economic difficulties by which the white world is plauged are not his primary concern.

I believe this attitude is a grave mistake and threatens the future of the white world as well as the black. If the white world attempts economic reform without understanding that the serfdom of colored labor is a prime cause of present difficulties; of if the black world attempts emancipation at the expense of white, continued disaster to both must ensue. European civilization can only realize the plight of black folk as black folk teach them and no economic reform of this world is possible which excludes the majority of the working class, which is colored. The danger today is that Liberals and Socialists will continue to ignore the peculiar problems which race prejudice opposes to their programs and that the darker world will continue in ignorance of the fundamental and tragid collapse of that system of world industry which they have been taught to regard as unshakeable and eternal.

33-5-50

7. That the general program of the N. A. A. C. P. is outgrown and out-of-date and needs thorough-going revision in the light of present-day facts and that this applies especially to racial segregation and international afforts.

If we join, as I know we must, in the establishment of the new industrial order, this will call for a revision of the program of the N. A. A. C. P. Let me seek to illustrate this specifically rather than in broad theory. We have long faced two problems—Segregation and Africa. Segregation, we regard as peculiarly our central and typical problem. Most American Negroes would call it the essense of the Negro problem and declare that once segregation by race ceased in this country the race problem would be at an end. On the other hand, these same Negroes would say that American Negroes have nothing to do with the color problems of Africa and the West Indies, of South America or Asia and that to mix ourselves into these problems would be a tactical error and an unfortunate mistake.

As a result of this line of reasoning, the N.A.A.C.P. and its colored constituency has landed into curious contradiction and paradox.

We lay down the postulate that there should be no segregation based merely on race; that such segregation is a denial of democracy and humanity, and a basic reason for that anarchy which we call war. But facing us and just as true is the fact that we do have war, we do have separate races and nations and we do have right here in the United States so fundamental as separation by race lines that we almost inhabit separate worlds.

And what is the result? The result is that we have no philosophy which applies to the facts but only a program of negation. The thing must not happen but it does happen. Segregation is wrong but it is true. We have no practical program for this situation. We praise the school situation in New York because there is no segregation of colored teachers and pupils but we are afraid to acknowledge that the colored children of Washington under coloredteachers are getting far and away better training than the black children of Harlem. We get eloquent over the work which colored undergraduates do at Yale or Harvard but almost apologize for the fact that better undergraduate work is being done at Atlanta and Talladega. We are trying desperately to believe that we American Negroes can entirely dissociate ourselves from the Color Line ~~of the Nation~~ that belts the world and brings its infinity of problems in Liberia and Uganda, Basutoland and Congo, India and Java, Jamaica and Brazil. I tried several years to prove to the Board of Directors of the N. A. A. C. P. that the Advancement of Colored People did not refer simply and parochially to North America but bound us to a world-wide problem of race and color just as surely as the United States is an integral part of the modern civilized world.

We must then so rearrange our program that it fits enthusiastic forward action in the segregated South as well as unremitting vigilance where the battle against segregation has been won. We have got to realize that the solution of the race problem in America is goingto lie outside of America, and that the present problems of race in Asia, Africa and the other Americas are of primary and pressing interest to the Negro race in the United States. I firmly believe that unless we recognize this, and unless we make the advancement of colored people outside the United States a main part of our N.A.A.C.P. program, we are destined to find the same paradox and contradiction that the United States itself is finding in this world depression.

3-5-51

These, then, are the seven criticisms and the seven answers. We have been high-brow and we have got to decide as to whether that attitude is going to continue. We have been autocratic and centralized and we are facing the problem of increasing the activity and power of the branches and of the Annual Conference. We have not spent too large a proportion of our income in salaries and overhead, but, nevertheless, we have got to conform to a new rule of poverty as contrasted with the American ideal of excessive wealth. It is not our fault that we have not covered our whole field. It is rather the size and intricacy of that field. But is our fault that we are not attracting and assisting yough and that fault we must correct. Finally, we must reform our program and recognize the predominant and pressing interest of economic reconstruction, and our general program must go beyond the problems of the American Negro to the problems of the colored peoples of the world.

32-52

What is Wrong with the NAACP

CRITICISM

HIGH BROW

TALENTED TENTH

METHOD - END

CHANGE { FOR MASS / BY MASS

ORGANIZATION

CENTRALIZED

BRANCHES

LIVING CELL { STUDY / ACTION / POSITIVE / IDEAL

ANNUA CONF

PROGRAM

18th CENTURY

FREEDOM { PEONAGE / IGNORANCE / DISFRANCHISEMENT / INSULT

47-S-222

NEGATIVE SUPPRESSED MAJOR EMPLOYMENT

OUR SUCCESS
ECONOMIC PROGRAM
THRIFT - SAVING
BOURGEOIS
OUR CLASS STRUGGLE

A NEGRO PROGRAM - SEGREGATION PARADOX

EDUCATION: D.C. - N.Y
HARVARD - AU

HOMES: DRUID HILL
139th St
SOUTH PARKWAY

ART + LITERATURE

INTEGRATION

PROVINCIALISM
AN AMERICAN PROGRAM
WORLD COLOR LINE PAN AFRICA

RE-ADAPTED PROGRAM INCOME - UNITED EFFORT - WORLD COOPERATION

STRENGTH - COURAGE

YOUTH.

NEGLECT WITHOUT COUNTRY WORK

NAACP

---

1. MASSES
2 - DECENTRALIZATION
3 - ECONOMICS - UNION - WORLD
4 - YOUTH.

42-S-22y

Address Delivered by Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois
at Harpers Ferry, W. Va.

John Brown

May 21, 1932

During the Twenty-third Annual Conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

37-6-96

You have heard an admirable statement of the occurrences in the John Brown raid, and you have heard how that raid affects us and our ideals. I want to say a word about something that has happened - a curious ending to what we have done and tried to do.

There is a tablet in that chair, a little thing of bronze. It was intended to be put here at Storer College. We are going to take it back with us. I am sorry. Storer College has been a beautiful memory to me. I saw it first twenty-five years ago. The Niagara Movement came here for its second meeting. It took courage for the Niagara Movement to come here. It took courage for Storer College and its President and its officials to welcome us; and Storer College then had the courage.

We proposed to put here this memorial to John Brown because we are meeting so near here and because the thing seemed so appropriate in our minds. The Secretary of the Association asked me to write an inscription for this tablet; and I wrote it - at night; or rather, it wrote itself. I did not think of any controversy. It did not occur to me that I was saying anything that anyone in the United States would disagree with. And these were the words which I wrote:

Here
John Brown
Aimed at Human Slavery
A Blow
That woke a guilty nation
With him fought
Seven slaves and sons of slaves.
Over his crucified corpse Marched 200,000 black soldiers
And 4,000,000 freedmen
Singing
"John Brown's body lies a-mouldering in the grave
"But his Soul goes marching on!"

37-6-97

Now, let me go over this again.

This is a magnificent section of the United States. Things physically center here in a peculiar way, and something centers here which has not been directly mentioned today.

In the Appalachian Mountains John Brown was born and lived his life. He knew the Appalachian Mountains. These mountains are the backbone of the eastern half of this country, and go straight down into the Great Black Way, down into the Black Belt of the Carolinas and of the southern United States; of the West Indies and of Central and South America. They extend to twenty-five million human beings of Negro descent today, and in the day of John Brown they reached four million slaves here in the United States.

It has been said that John Brown did not have a plan. He did have a plan, a great plan and a feasible plan; but it broke down. But that is of little importance. It is important to remember that here was that center for the passing of fugitive slaves through which Harriet Tubman came by night time and time again, and John Brown knew of this pass from slavery to freedom.

I have said that John Brown "aimed a blow at human slavery." I am not going into the question as to how far that blow ought to have been physical and how far it ought to have been a moral blow. I hope that in the world that is around us today we are civilized enough to do great things without physical force; but I am sure there have been times in the world when nothing but physical force would do. He "aimed a blow at human slavery"and that blow "shook the conscience of a guilty nation." There comes the first real controversy.

We have been re-writing recently the history of the United States, and the children here in Storer College and you who are larger children, and the children throughout the United States, are being taught that after all slavery was not evil; that everybody connected with it was good; that every body was trying to do the right thing; but unfortunately the wrong thing was done; so that all we have to remember is the Right that people wanted to do and not the Wrong they did.

And I was trying to aim a blow at that lie.

I know there are people here at Storer College and round about who believe in the Lost Cause; people who suffered in the Civil War just as much as those who won. Nevertheless, their cause was lost, and it ought to have been lost; and it does not make any difference what Daughters of the Confederacy say here or elsewhere, it remains eternally true that you cannot make the defense of human slavery heroic. There is no way in which you can write history so as to make it heroic.

37-6-98

I am not only willing to admit, but I know it to be perfectly true that the guilt was not wholly in the South. There were men in the North who invested in slavery and defended it. The great mass of the people of the North never aimed to abolish slavery. I did not say John Brown was fighting against the guilty South. I said he was fighting against a guilty nation, and the whole nation was indeed guilty.

I come to the second matter concerning which there is even more controversy. I have been reading again the last few days the history of Emancipation - what men said and what men did. As you know and as students in school ought to know, there has been a concerted effort to minimize the part which Negroes themselves took in the emancipation of slaves. Just as an attempt was recently made to praise the few Negroes of Harpers Ferry who did nothing, so there is a wider attempt to show that after all the slaves loved slavery. Therefore I sought to emphasize, in this inscription, the fact that slaves and persons descended from slaves, fought side by side with John Brown. There were Osborne Perry Anderson, Shields Green, Dangerfield Newby, John A. Copeland, Lewis Sherrard Leary, John Anderson, and Jeremiah Anderson. Two were fugitive slaves, three were free-born sons of slaves and two were grandsons of chattels. Four of them were killed, two of them were hanged, and one escaped; and not only that, but something like seventeen other Negroes of the neighborhood were killed at the time. Thus at least seven slaves and sons of slaves fought with John Brown.

There comes now a matter which is more or less one of sentiment. "Over his crucified corpse." I might have said "Over his corpse." Some people have the idea that crucifixion consists in the punishment of an innocent man. That is not crucifixion. The essence of crucifixion is that men are cilling a criminal, that men have got to kill him; that he has got to be a criminal; and yet that the act of crucifying him is the Salvation of the World. John Brown broke the law; he killed human beings, not only here at Harpers Ferry but in Kansas. He intended to kill human beings. That was against the law, and he deserved to have had the law executed upon him; those people who defended slavery had to execute John Brown although they knew that in killing him they were committing the greater crime. It is out of that human paradox that there comes Crucifixion.

37-6-99

Then again, continually we forget or try to forget the black soldiers of the Civil War. They do not march in our current textbooks. I doubt if they march in the textbooks used here at Storer College. But there were two hundred thousand black soldiers that marched in the War that emancipated the slaves and at least one authority says that without them that War could not have been won: and that authority was Abraham Lincoln.

And over that dead body of John Brown four million freedmen also marched, - singing.

I am sorry that Storer College and its trustees and its President did not have the courage to have this memorial left here. I am not sorry for myself. I know about John Brown. I am sorry for these students here and the students that are coming. Because after all/the it is Truth, in the long run, that makes us free.

37-6-100

These are my own thoughts; and now I want to read the official attitude of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, in which the whole matter is put somewhat more politely and carefully:

> The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People regrets that the tablet displayed here today is not to be placed on John Brown's Fort. In fairness to all parties concerned, and especially to our host today, Storer College, we take this means of making public the reasons for this:
>
> When the idea was conceived of placing a tablet here, Storer College graciously welcomed the Association and gave permission for the placing of the tablet. It was and is the desire of the Association to express through this tablet three things:
>
> 1. To pay tribute to the great martyr, John Brown.
>
> 2. That through this act we of the N.A.A.C.P. might re-dedicate ourselves to uncompromising struggle for the ideals of justice.
>
> 3. To make answer to the new copperheadism which has infiltrated into practically all of the writings of contemporary historians regarding the causes of the Civil War, the Reconstruction Period, and the Negro's part in both of these. Through this tablet the N.A.A.C.P. wished to express and only to express the convictions and opinions of the organization and of those who agree with its point of view. It was for this reason that Dr. Du Bois was asked to draft the inscription as it now appears.

Upon submission of this wording and after the order for the tablet had been placed, the trustees of Storer College expressed a desire that no controversial matter be included in the inscription and that no idea or phrase be used which might give offense to anyone. It was suggested that a tablet bearing the words, "John Brown, 1859 - His Soul Goes Marching On", would be all that the trustees would wish. The N.A.A.C.P. was unable to agree to such a wording in that it would not express what the Association wished.

As no agreement could be reached between the trustees of Storer College and the Directors of the N.A.A.C.P., it was finally decided that the meeting should be held here today and the tablet exhibited but not left permanently upon the Fort.

37-6-101

The tablet will be placed in the National Office of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People until such time as public sentiment in West Virginia will permit its being placed upon John Brown's Fort.

Conferences c1932 N.A.A.C.P. Conference Speech Copy

The Organization of Our Buying Power.

Most persons writing concerning the present depression seem to regard the Negro as utterly helpless, and even in normal times the current philosophy is that both in the United States and elsewhere are absolutely at the mercy of the surrounding economic organization. This assumption arises from the fact that we assume that no group can approach economic independence or a position of self-sustaining inter-dependence unless it is organized as a nation with law-making powers, armies and police.

37-6-23

On the other hand, if we remember that the American Negro numbers about 12,000,000 and that means that we are much larger than either Denmark, Greece, Hungary, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal or Sweden, and very nearly the size of Egypt, half the size of Spain, and one-third the size of Brazil.

This surely indicates that we must have great economic power. The American Negro must on a conservative estimate earn and spend each year in the neighborhood of a Two thousand millions of dollars. Most thinkers say, however, that the power which this represents is closely curtailed by the fact that we have no decisive economic power in production or transportation, in commerce or credit, or in government; that we sell our labor and farm produce at prices determined by a market in which we have little influence; and that we must buy what is offered to us at prices determined by others.

It is this latter point that I wish to discuss. The economic process does not begin with production. It begins with consumption. It begins with the need of the buyer, and his ability to satisfy that need. We are misled as to this basic fact because for three centuries emphasis has been put upon the production of goods and their transportation and their sale. In the next few centuries this is going to be changed and we are going to look more toward the welfare and power of the buyer. As a buyer, the Negro spends something like a thousand million dollars each year. How much exercise of judgment has he in this buying? At first it may seem that he has little. In fact, he has a great deal. He has a wide choice of stores which he will patronize. He has a wide choice of articles of food and clothing which he will choose to satisfy his needs. He has some choice in the selection of housing material. In fact, in nearly everything that he buys, either of goods or services, he has a power which today is not organized and which he does not use. Recently, we have had some intimation of what he can do. The American Negro can, to a large extent, confine his patronage to such retail stores as employ colored people and treat colored customers with honesty and courtesy. This was shown by:

37-6-24

1. The Chicago Whip campaign ~~last winter~~ and by a number of other instances throughout the United States.

2. In the matter of public service agencies, like telegraph, telephone, electric power, railroads and the like. The Negro, through his political power and his power as a consumer, can compel to some extent the employment of colored people and courtesy and consideration in the treatment of customers. This has been shown on the Southern railways where the increase of courtesy toward colored passengers has been notable in the last ten years, and it is shown in the hiring of colored telegraph messengers. Very little impress has been made on other public services but this is very largely because the Negro has not realized his power or tried to use it.

3. There is a vast field for the organization or mutual services which has been almost untouched. Negroes raise and prepare foods; they buy it and eat it. Much of the food which they buy and eat is raised and prepared by Negroes. Much more might be. Much of the raw material raised on Negro farms and prepared by Negro workers is consumed by Negro buyers. In addition to this, many services which are rendered Negroes by white people and many services which Negroes render to white people could by thought, training and organization be rendered by Negroes to Negroes, thus insuring more sympathetic service and more regular employment.

37-6-25

4. By group buying at wholesale instead of for retail, by organized and country-wide effort instead of by single stores, a great deal could be saved and a good many colored persons lucratively employed. A beginning of this is being made by the C.M.A. Stores.

5. The people who can buy, build and maintain church edifices to the value of $60,000,000 could do the same thing with regard to homes and tenements, if they were organized and trained to do it. In fine, by co-operative effort in doing their own laundry, making their own bread, preparing most of their food, making a considerable part of their clothes, doing their own repairing of all sorts, printing their own papers and books, and in hundreds of other ways, the colored people of the United States could, if they put their mind to it, and secure the proper training, spend a considerable part of this two thousand million dollars each year in hiring themselves at decent wages to perform services which the Negro group needs; and they could do this without antagonism to the white group, without any essential charter of new laws and without a national organization involving army and police. They could even do it without the help of a protective tariff because color prejudice and race loyalty furnishes a certain amount of the same kind of protection which the tariff furnishes to the country at large.

Many will say, that this is excellent theory but is practically impossible. They are wrong. The estimate of this organization of buyers and of consumers throughout the world has reached proportions today that are nothing less than astounding and the only reason that we do not know of it and are not talking of it is because the organization of the world for production in selling clothes consumers' co-operation out of the news columns and off the editorial pages. One-third of the population of England is today organized in groups of consumers who use their buying power to reduce costs and better conditions. As a result of this effort, they count five million members who have invested a capital of $40,000,000 and sell annually between four and five hundred millions of dollars in goods. On these sales they made in 1929 a net profit of over $5,000,000. These organizations of buyers own flour and food mills, bakery, butter and cheese factories, tobacco and cigar factories, canning factories, clothing factories, and shoe factories, besides 28,000 acres in farm lands upon which they are growing food and fruit and 33,000 acres of tea plantations upon which they are raising tea. This is simply the story of one country. It can be duplicated in Scotland, in Denmark, Belgium, France, Germany, Holland, India, Italy, Russia, Switzerland, Australia, and to a less extent, in the United States. The difficulties of organizations of this sort for a comparatively untrained people like ourselves are great. Our poverty and ignorance, our natural but internal bittering and jealousies, our lack of experience at team work and the large interests which many of our white fellow citizens have in keeping us from attempts of this kind. Nevertheless, here is the economic way out of our present difficulties, and if our schools and universities will proceed to a training and education of the proper sort of economic general staff and if those students scanning carefully the world and its experience will plan and guide our procedure, we can reach in the United States a plan of economic independence which will not only begin with the organization of our buying power but extend easily and naturally into production, transportation, commerce, and an increased political power which will help not only us but our fellow citizens.

37-6-26

In such economic reform the Negro has much to learn from the labor movement in Europe and in Russia but its accomplishment calls for neither war nor revolution. Consumers' co-operation is our Peace Movement toward economic reform without bloodshed. A program of violence is race suicide for us at the present time.

37-6-27

47-7-1

(1)

NEXT STEPS

DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS

The real question that I am to suggest an answer for is, "Where do we go from here?" We are looking for guide posts and we are coming to realize that we have got to choose more or less new roads. In the past we had a fairly clear program worked out: First, we assumed a reasonably stable world, going on at a uniform rate or progress, toward well defined goals. Our particular problem was to find our place and part in this world, and that seemed to be ~~human~~ primarily a matter of exertion and effort on our part, in certain clearly defined lines. We had got to demonstrate our ability to be modern men, and we had got to deserve the respect and consideration of the world.

It was a rather fine program. It called out the best aspiration in those who understood it and during fifty years there is no doubt that we have worked desperately hard. On the other hand, there is also no doubt ~~but~~ that we have failed in our main objectives. I know this statement will bring almost indignant protest on the part of many, and yet if we are going frankly to face facts, we must acknowledge that after an effort of a half century, despite what we have undoubtedly accomplished and essayed, we are not recognized as an integral part of American civilization, or of modern culture. We have found the ~~wall~~ mark wall of race prejudice impenetrable. I say this with deliberation for I am no counsellor of despair. Like the Negro who was arguing about liquor and said: "I am temperate but I ain't no fanatic." So I'm an optimist but I've got eyes.

47-7-2

(2)

We have done a great deal, without doubt; in spite of a bad and incomplete school system we have learned in large measure to read and write. Our progress in art and literature, even in business, has been notable. Our determined opening of Labor opportunities is astounding Conferences like this show vast inter-racial advance over a comparatively short period. I have known the Negro problem to be seriously discussed in America by conferences made up entirely of white people. We have all seen in many places promising meetings of minds between white and colored people. At the same time, as I have said, in our main objectives of becoming recognized American citizens judged by character and not color we have failed, and the failure is of such significant sort that it calls for careful thinking and thoughtful planning for our future, lest our failure be final and complete.

To instance but one part of our failure, there is no doubt about the native ability that has been shown by members of the Negro race in the United States. I sat ~~last~~ before last night spellbound by two voices. Had they been in white bodies you know their destiny. As it is, you know equally well. Magazine articles no longer decry or belittle Negro genius. They do not even call it an illustrative exception.

At the same time, when we come forward and ask for corresponding justice, the reply today is much more discouraging than it used to be. Formerly men could say, "You cannot vote, you cannot be admitted to civil rights, you cannot enter here and there, but after all, it is because of your lack of training. You are not ready for it." But today there are unnumbered cases to which no such answer can be given. May I cite one of a thousand cases.

Recently three young boys applied for admission to various Friends' schools. The Quakers are among the finest of Americans. Their reputation over a long series of years is something of which the nation and the world is proud. And too, these boys were from the finest of families; they had had exceptional training; and there was unusual need and reason that they have further good schooling. They were handsome, healthy, well-bred, charming. They have not been able to find in the United States a single Quaker school that would receive them, and the excuse has been simply and boldly the fact that they had Negro grandfathers. //

But our greatest failure is in ability to earn a decent living. Whatever we have lacked of accomplishment has come from the plain fact that the average income of the Negro family since emancipation has been below the standard which civilization today requires. There has been an effort to tell us in various papers (read here) that we are after all no worse off than whites in the various aspects of the depression. The very sincerity and pervasiveness of this desire to encourage us is eloquent; but this emphasis does not change our all too definite knowledge. One percent makes little difference to a statistician, but it spells hell to man on the edge of starvation. As a people we are on the narrow ridge of decent economic survival and we know it. We are the surplus laborer without security of job or certainty of public relief. (We are the professional + business man with no adequate clientele) Every time I hear the Negro farmer discussed, I get mad. I want to throw things. I know that he faces the difficulties of all farmers today but I know, too, that he faces more than that. He faces mob law, no schools, no vote, crop lien, usury and cheating. When a man discusses the Negro farmer and neglects or forgets to mention these facts I cannot believe in his sincerity. Of course, Negro farmers are stupid, slow and afraid - all the cream of swift intelligence, initiative and courage has run or crawled away or lies murdered to fertilize southern soil. We have seen wave after wave of the poor and ignorant and unskilled come into America, climb over our bent and broken backs and achieve success, honor, and wealth and thumb their noses in our faces. Look at the Irish, the Italians, the Russian and Polish Jews, the Greeks and the people from the Balkans. I am not jealous of them. I do not even blame them in the environment of race hatred in which they unwillingly come. I simply say that America will not let us succeed. We have done more/ for this land/than any of its recent immigrants./ They have succeeded./ We are still at the bottom/and the blow of this depression falls on us/with more crushing force/than any element in this nation— statistics to the contrary notwithstanding./ There is no point/in meeting this fact/ with modest self-blame./ We are human/with human faults and failures./ But no group in the modern world/has accomplished as much/with as little/and gained so limited/and grudging a reward.

(7)

This is no counsel of despair. It is a warning against the optimism of the fool.

Now, it may be said,/in the face of this,/that failure is natural to human beings/and particularly to great groups/of human beings; that we have in the United States/an exceptional situation; that it would have been nothing unusual/if the American slave/in two or three generations/had shown no appreciable advance/or recognition,/and that therefore the next steps before us/consist in renewed efforts at training our ability/and deserving the world's recognition/and that of the American nation.

(8)

There are two answers to this: one is a matter of psychology. Our nerves/are a bit frayed/with the unusual efforts/that we have put forward./ It is going to be difficult/with the present generation of young black people/ to prove to them that they ought to try/to get the good opinion/and the recognition of their white fellows./ They are asking , "After all, who are these people/who require of us/so much more than they require of others?/and whence came their right/and assumption of world ownership?/ But that is a minor matter./ The other matter,/and the matter of greatest import,/is that instead of our facing today/a stable world,/moving at a uniform rate of progress toward well-defined goals,/ we are facing Revolution.// I trust you will not be scared by this word, as you were Thursday night. I am not discussing/ a coming revolution./ I am trying to impress the fact upon you/ that you are already/ in the midst of revolution!/ you are already/ in the midst of war;/ that there has been no war of modern times/ that has taken/ so great a sacrifice of human life/ and human spirit/ as the extraordinary period/ through which we are passing today.

47-7-9 -5- (9)

Some people/ envisage revolution/ chiefly as a matter of blood and guns/ and the more visible/ methods of force. But that, after all, is merely the temporary and outward manifestation./ Real revolution is within/ that comes/ before or after the explosion,/ is a matter of long suffering and deprivation,/ the death of courage/ and the bitter triumph of despair./ This is the inevitable prelude to decisive/ and enormous change,/ and that is the thing that is on us now.

We are not called upon then to discuss/ whether we want revolution or not./ We have got it./ Our problem/ is how are we coming out of it./ I should be/ very glad indeed/ if the matter were as simple as the presiding officer of Thursday night indicated:/ that we are not on the brink of anything/ but simply preparing to mount solid steps in plain view./ I am afraid that down in the mud/ in which most of us are wallowing,/ it is not a matter of steps./ We have trees and cliffs to climb./ We have swamps to wade/ and forests to penetrate.

47-7-10 (10)

But that is all aside;/ because this matter of world depression and revolutionary changes/ in social life and industry/ is not primarily the problem of the American Negro,/ and just because it is not our problem,/ we have plain proof of the thing/ that I said before,/ namely, that we are not/ in reality/ a part of this nation./ We stand, even in its greatest crisis,/ at one side,/ only partially connected with its remedies,/ but dumb victims of its difficulties,/ and by just that token,/ because we are outside/ the main current of the country,/ we have got most carefully/ to ask ourselves/ what we are going to do/ to protect our past and to insure a future.

(11)

I was exceedingly interested the other night/ when Mr. Candy suggested a separate Negro state. / It is arresting/ to see how often this old solution drifts back again and again/ to the American Negro. I remember what the Negroes of Newport /said to the Negroes of Philadelphia/ back at the end of the 18th century,/ when the same thing had been suggested./ If we were living in the 17th century, there is no doubt/ but what Mr. Candy's suggestion/ would be the next natural step:/ that we should say to the American people,/ "We have tried to be reasonable, decent citizens,/ and to meet all of the difficult requirements /that have been put upon us,/ and we have been unable to satisfy you. / Now we are going off to be by ourselves/ and to seek to satisfy ourselves."

Today, however, the very fact/ that such a solution is suggested makes it evident/ how far many of our best minds are/ from realizing just the situation in this world. The organized industry of the world today,/ the organized finance and commerce,/ the Empire of concentrated capital,/ will not let any group of people escape. I have been studying the extraordinary developments in Liberia/ under the domination of the National City Bank and the Firestone interests. (born of slavery started without capital) Liberia tried to borrow $500,000 in 1870./ She got $100,000/ and had to pay back/ practically the whole $500,000/ with interest/ or be wiped out of existence./ She tried again in 1906 to borrow another $500,000,/ and all she got out of it/ was a small rubber forest./ She tried in our day to borrow a million dollars of the Firestone interests/ in return for this rubber forest, and other rubber land,/ and today she is paying nearly 75 per cent of her total income/ simply as service charges and whole mess salaries on this debt. She is financially ruined/ and almost politically defunct/ unless the American Negro vote can stop the power of the Firestones.

(12)

In the same way in Haiti every claim or shadow of a claim against that state has been capitalized at its peak, and the state saddled with a debt far beyond its power to pay, with the United States Army and Navy ~~stand~~ ready to enforce its demands. If the 12,000,000 Negroes in the United States should leave this country and find space where they could settle with reasonable resources for development, unless they had their own capital and skill, materials and machines, they would find themselves under the power of the banking interests of this or some other country backed by military tyranny power and unable to make any direct appeal to the sovereign rulers of any land.

(and unless the present world slavery to capital monopoly is finally overthrown)

I admit freely the difficulties of the frying pan, but I am not attracted by the fire. When that fire is out, I expect mass emigration of American Negroes unless vital change comes to America

We must then recognize the facts of the case. We are the victims of a caste system in the United States whose main lines we have been unable to break. We are at the beginning of a vast change in the organization of industry here and in the world, and the question is, What part are we going to take during this change, and how are we going to prepare for a place in the world that comes after?

47-7-14 14

It is rather curious that those very people who put special stress upon spiritual values do not usually, when it comes to practical reform, take any account of the inner spirit of man. The ~~change~~ economic change that is coming into the world has got to take account of it. Primarily what is happening, and what must be accomplished whether it takes place next year or a dozen years hence, is that we are going to stop the organization of work for private profit and substitute therefor work for public welfare. And the essential thing about this change is not new law or a facist regime, but it is a change of spirit. The average man must give up the idea that the chief end of an American is to be a millionaire. Now this is a trememdous change. Only the other day a friend of mine was talking to a young banker. The banker said, "My opinion is that now is the time when the foundations of the great fortunes of the future are going to be laid," In other words, in a day when we are suffering all the disaster that has come from this founding of great private fortunes, with its war and waste, its cheating and lying, its murder of men and women and children and death of ambition and beauty, the idea of this young man was that just as soon as we get over this crisis, we were going right back to doing the same thing again and yet again, and indeed unless we suffer a spiritual revolution by which men are going to envisage small incomes and limited resourcees and endless work for the larger goals of life, unless we have this, nothing can save civilization either for white people or black.

Now it happens that the colored people in the United States are the group that has gone least forward on this program of the exploitation of the many for the benefit of the few. It has not been our fault. Rather we have been blamed and blamed ourselves for this lack of "economic progress," as it is called. We are rather ashamed that we have not developed more millionaires and more big business. But I venture to say that at some future day this will be our greatest reason for pride; because after all, we have had the temptation and we have made terrific effort: we have tried just as far as possible to divide the American Negro into economic classes, with the professional and investing classes at the top, and the mass of partially unlettered laborers at the bottom; and it has only been the impenetrability of American prejudice that has made our advance in these lines so small,

The task that I have recently been setting myself is to blunt

off the wedge which the Communist party is driving into our group | because of their very tendencies, | and I do this, not because of any enmity or fear or essential disagreement with the Communists. | If I were in Russia, I should be an enthusiastic Communist. If the Communist party in the United States had the leadership and the knowledge which the situation here calls for, I certainly should join it; | but it is today ignorant of fact and history and the American scene | and is trying to over-emphasize the truth | that the natural leaders of the colored people, the educated and trained classes have had goals and interests different from the mass of Negroes. There is a partial truth in this, and a partial falsehood. American race prejudice has so pounded the mass of Negroes together that they have not separated into such economic classes; but on the other hand they undoubtedly have had the idealogy and if they had been free we would have had within our race the same exploiting set-up that we see around about us. Now, however, 47-7-18 in the tremendous change which sooner or later is bound to come in the world, we have a chance to be the first to make the change | and make it with the least internal catastrophe, | and our only reason for fear | is that at this crucial moment we be robbed of our intelligent leadership. 18

Before our leaders can essay this new task they have a vast lesson to learn. As has been charged here, in the most courageous address of the conference, we have been timid and conservative. | We have sought peace at any price; | we have placated philanthropy | and kow-towed humbly to the rich. | Today our turning to saner and more manly methods | does not involve throwing bricks or calling names. It does involve an inner readjustment of ideas. We must rid ourselves of the persistent idea | that the advance of mankind | consists of the scaling off of layers | who become incorporate with the world's upper and ruling classes, leaving always dead and inert below the ignorant and unenlightened mass of men. Our professional classes are not our aristocrats and our masters - they are and must be the most efficient of our servants and thinkers whose legitimate reward is the advancement of the great mass of American Negroes and with them the uplift of all men. We, even before America, must slough off the preconception of bigness, growth and eternal success. This world makes progress in little things, in contractions and failures as well as tremendous surpluses and increased prices and wild expansion.

We must face revolution calmly and sanely. No revolution destroys the past. The past must be foundation of any future failure. Our huge and intricate and marvelously ingenious industrial organization must be saved for any future reorganized state. We shall need machines and capital, engineers and captains of industry. Russia proves this. But the object, the end, the reward, the measure of success - there is the kernel and meat of the problem and the judgment of the success and failure of revolution.

I think we have all been secretly astonished at the peculiar problems suggested here. Too much coal, too much cotton, too many machines, too much land; and then as remedies less coal, less cotton, less ingenuity, less land, for people who are cold and naked, who work too hard and too long and get nothing for it. What kind of fantastic world are we visioning? Nonsense, there is no such world, it is mirage. We want more coal, more cunning machines, more cotton, more everything, but for all men and not for private monopoly profit. If this is not to be done, we are lost, white and black, in one world wide disaster.

For us then revolutionary changes calls for the following steps:

1. The no profit idea. That is the idea of carrying on business not for private profit but for service; the pay being not the surplus value which is made out of the hiring of labor or the monopoly of machines or the theft of raw material, but a reasonable and even meagre salary scale. Such change, as I said before, has got to be spiritual. Just as long as we have within the Negro race and any race, young men of education and power who believe that they ought to have the right to spend $100,000 a year, just so long we are facing toward those same seas of disaster upon which already the world has met shipwreck.

3. Our work has got to be primarily for Service. I know that this word has been overworked, but let me give a concrete example of what I mean. We have among American Negroes 1250 lawyers. On the other hand, in every state in the United States when the average Negro is arrested the chances are that he is going to be started on a criminal career simply because he has no proper legal defence. Our jails are filled with black folk who are simply monuments to miscarried justice. The NAACP has done some legal defence work; but it had to be in exceptional cases, to establish some great principle of law. We have not had, and we could not expect to have, the money necessary for carrying on complete legal defence on the scale it ought to be. Every single city, every single county in the United States where there are any number of Negroes ought to have Negro lawyers of ability working on small and regular salary, not to aid the rich to break the law, but standing ready to defend black people who need defence in simple human rights. Moreover, we have a part of the machinery to do this. We have 25,000 ministers and churches, twice as many in proportion as the whites, and the real criticism of the church which I and others have voiced from time to time is not a criticism of belief. It is not my business what anybody believes so long as it is sincere. I may not share his belief or comprehend his mentality, but I respect it. My criticism is not one of organization because some Negro churches are marvelous organizations; but it is a criticism of the effective work for which they are organized. There is no reason in the world why everyone of the 35,000 Negro churches should not furnish the salary for one lawyer to defend Negroes who need it, even if once in a while, they cannot pay the minister's salary. The same kind of socialized medicine, dentistry and nursing, could be widely and extensively used.

In the third place, we have got to take thought concerning the Negro family, for sheer physical survival of our best! As it is today, we are making no plans for the marriage of our children at the age when they ought to be married; we are not keeping in mind that the marriage of young people is as much a matter of careful planning and forethought as any other object of civilized life. We have thousands of marriageable men and marriageable women kept from mating because of a public opinion in their own group that calls for a standard of living we cannot and ought not to afford. The resulting repressions + complexes are disastrous.

But finally and above all, key to all the rest, there comes the matter of work. Here it is extraordinary how the patterns of the present set-up of business have completely captured our imagination. Practically this conference has come to the conclusion that we have got to make obeisance to Big Business and ask it please to allow us to be exploited on the same terms that good white people are; on the contrary I am firmly convinced that in the methods and objectives of big industry there is absolutely no hope for the American Negro. I don't care what the Steel Trust has done for us, or what the Food Trust may do or what the Coal Trust will do. In truth, they all are using us as tools to make fortunes which no human being has a right to possess and which works for the dmanation of his soul and the starvation of our bodies. We have no right to exist for such a purpose. The American Negro will only be admitted to organized industry as his labor returns a profit and a bigger profit than white labor does, and upon the wage thus received no civilization or culture can possibly be built. As long, therefore, as big industry is dominated by these ideas, we are facing something worse than a blank wall.

On the other hand, what can Government do for us? We are turning to Government today like babies crying for mother's milk. And yet this is not the effort of intelligent masters of democratic method bent on making an efficient instrument do its work. It is rather the despair and debacle of laissez-faire. The impasse of government today lie in the fact that it has no intelligent democracy upon which it can depend. We are turning to dictators because of the stupidity and ignorance of the average voter, white, black or yellow,

If we give Mr. Roosevelt the right to meddle with the dollar, if we give Herr Hitler the right to expel the Jew, if we give to Mussolini the right to think for Italians, we do this because we know nothing ourselves. We are as nations ignorant of the function and meaning of money, and we are looking around helplessly to see if anybody else knows. This is not, as some assume, the failure of democracy - it is the failure of education, of justice and of truth. We have lied so long about money and business, we do not know now where truth is. Democratic government without intelligence back of it simply cannot function, and therefore if we expect that the American government is going to rescue the Negro worker when he and his fellow white workers are disfranchised because of their lack of experience and intelligence, we are again hoping against hope. The present dictatorship of industry in American has killed Democracy as definitely as any dictatorship in Europe or South American.

Now, what is the alternative? The alternative, as I have said many times, and as I am going to continue to say, is to look ~~to the~~ Consumer for rescue to the intelligent. The consumer in American is made almost ham-strung because his thought is dominated by extraordinarily stupid patterns. It is assumed, for instance, that the man who does not buy every thing at the cheapest price is an idiot. I have know women to spend ten cents in wear and tear of shoes in order to save two cents on the price of cabbage. I have known Negroes to put a good colored grocer, giving two colored clerks work, out of business in order to support a chain store which wouldn't hire a colored dog, and they saved 5 cents on the week's grocery bill. When the consumer learns that buying is a bargain in which he is ~~a~~ becoming a partner ~~in~~ in industry; that it is not the matter of buying the cheapest thing, but of paying the fair price, then things begin.

Or again, we are today at the mercy of advetising and display, a plain waste of money, for which we pay with our hard earned cash. Most of our essential trade could be done in the back room of a fifth floor flat without a plate glass window or nickle plated counter. But we do not seem to think so. We have been taught differently.

Or again, we have been told here of the havoc that machines have wrought and it has seemed as though some of the speakers had no conception of any escape from that dilemna. Here comes the machine - out go 400 workers. It must happen in the name of Progress.

But why must it happen? Who gets the saving that is made from the use of the machine? Who lets him get it but the man who buys what the machine makes? We are on the threshold of a day when the ~~human~~ and must the machine be monopolized industry and the privately owned machine or the machine owned by a small cooperative group can come into its own, if we have the requisite sense. The Muscle Shoals development is going to make it possible to have village after village of people supporting themselves by house industry, supplying their own wants; buying of themselves; more + more independent of factory and trust. Professor Murchison weeps over the plight of the poor mill owner; I am unmoved. My tears are for the people who wear his dresses. There ought to be village after village of colored people at Muscle Shoals building an independent self supporting economy.

47-7-29

Again we are not at all clear as to how we are going to use the votes that we have for our economic uplift. We have used them for certain changes in law, for putting on office people who have spoken pleasantly before election and sometimes after, but we have not used our vote for certain clear things which we might accomplish and which go to the foundation and undermining of our industrial dictatorship - enforced publicity, all ownership of property, the right to criticize big and bad business without being put in jail; the right to say for instance, that one of the great and popular drinks sold all over the United States contains cocaine. The right to name the theives who loot savings banks and gamble with other's money, in fine, the right to make clear the wretched methods of so much of present business activity. We could use our vote continually to refuse to give monopolistic privileges like patents to certain kinds of business which increase the tremendous tyranny of industry.

47-7-30

All this is a part that the consumer can play and a voluntary part. And finally, he can cooperate not only in consumption, but in manufacture. I know how much this proposition is criticized, but I say again, as I have said before, twelve million people in the United States can by voluntary effort, intelligent planning + self denying ordinance, work for themselves and feed themselves, can pay themselves and organize their own industry, unless they are incurably stupid. For a great mass of people to sit up and actually starve to death in the midst of plenty is to prove not only to the world but to themselves that they are going to be of no real use in the ultimate reorganization of industry.

In other words, I propose as the next step which the American Negro can give to the world a new and unique gift. We have tried song and laughter and ~~even~~ with rare good humor, a bit condescendingly the world has received it; we have given the world work, hard, back-breaking labor and the world has let John Henry die breaking his heart to beat the machine ~~and~~ It is now our business to give the world an example of intelligent economic cooperation so that when the new industrial commonwealth comes we can go into it as experienced people and not again be left on the outside as mere beggars.

37-7-37

NEXT STEPS

DR. W. E. B. DU BOIS

The real question that I am trying to suggest an answer for is "Where do we go from here?" We are looking for guide posts and we are realizing more or less clearly that we have got to choose more or less new roads. In the past we had a fairly clear program worked out. In the first place, we assumed a reasonably stable world going on at a uniform rate or progress toward well defined goals. Our particular problem was to find our place and part in this world, and that seemed to be a matter of exertion and effort on our part in certain plain lines. We had got to demonstrate our ability to be modern men. We had got to risk the for our past and we had got to deserve the respect and consideration of the world.

It was a rather fine program. It called out the best aspiration in those of us who understood it and during almost fifty years there is no doubt that we have worked hard. On the other hand, there is also no doubt but that we have failed. I know that this statement will bring almost indignant protest on the part of many, and yet if we are going frankly to face facts, we must acknowledge that after an effort of fifty years and more, despite what we have done and tried to do, we were not and are not recognized as an integral part of American civilization, or of modern culture. We have done a great deal, without doubt; in spite of a wasteful and incomplete school system we have learned in large measure to read and write. Our progress in art and literature, even in business, has been notable. Conferences like this show vast advance over a comparatively short period. I have known the Negro problem to be seriously discussed in America by conferences made up entirely of white people. We have all seen in many respects promising meeting of minds between white and colored people. At the same time, as I have said, in our main objectives we have failed, and the failure is of such a sort that it means careful thinking and careful planning for our future, lest that failure be complete.

To instance but one part of our failure, there is no doubt about the ability that has been shown by various members of the Negro race in the United States. Magazine articles no longer decry or belittle it. They do not even call it an illustrative exception. At the same time, when we come forward and ask for justice in specific cases, the reply today is different and much more discouraging than it used to be. Formerly men could say, "You can not vote, you can not be admitted to civil rights, you can not enter here and there, but after all, it is because of your lack of training. You are not ready for it." But today there are common cases to which no such answers can be given. Recently three young boys applied for admission to some Friends' school. The Quakers are among the finest of Americans. Their reputation over a long series of years is something of which the nation and the world is proud. Two of these boys, although of Negro descent, were from the finest families; they had had exceptional training, and there was exceptional need and reason that they have good schooling. They have not been able to find in the United States a single Quaker school that would receive them, and the excuse has been simply the fact that they havehad Negro grandfathers.

37-7-38

But our greatest failure is in earning a living. Whatever we have lacked of accomplishment has come from the plain fact that the average income from the best Negro families has been below the standard which civilization today requires. Now it may be said in the face of this that failure is natural to human beings and particularly to groups of human beings. We have in the United States an exceptional situation, that is, it would have been nothing unusual if the American slave in two or three generations had shown no appreciable advance or recognition, and that therefore the next steps before us consist in renewed efforts at training our ability and deserving the world's recognition and that of the American nation. There are two answers to this: one is a matter of psychology. Our nerves are a bit frayed with the unusual efforts that we have put forward. It is going to be a little more difficult with the present generation of young people to prove to them that they ought to try to get the good opinion and the recognition of their white fellows. They are asking, "After all, who are these people who require of us so much more than they require of others?" But that is a minor matter. The other matter, and the matter of greatest import, is that instead of our facing today a stable world, moving at a uniform rate or progress toward well-defined goals, we are facing revolution. I trust you will not be scared by this word, as you were Thursday night. I am not discussing a coming revolution. I am trying to impress the fact upon you that you are already in the midst of revolution, you are already in the midst of war, that there has been no war of modern times that has taken so great a sacrifice of human life and human spirit as the extraordinary period through which we are going today. Some people envisage revolution chiefly as a matter of blood and guns and the more visible methods of force. But that, after all, is merely a temporary and outward manifestation. Real revolution that comes before or after the explosion is a matter o long suffering and deprivation and enormous change, and that is the thing that is on us now.

37-7-39

We are not called upon to discuss as to whether we want revolution or not. We have got it. Now our problem is how are we coming out of it. I should be very glad indeed i the matter were as simple as the presiding officer of Thursday night indicated: that we are not on the brink of anything but simply preparing to mount steps in plain view. I am afraid that down in the mud in which most of us are wallowing, it is not a matter of steps. We have trees and cliffs to climb. But that is all aside, because this matter of world depression and revolutionary changes in social life and industry is not primarily the problem of the American Negro, and just because it is not our problem, we have plain proof of the thing that I said before, that we are not in reality a part of this nation. We stand, even in its greatest crisis, at one side, only partially connected with its difficulties and its proposed remedies, and by just that token, because we are outside the main current of the country, we have got most carefully to ask ourselves what we are going to do to protect our past and to insure a future.

I was exceedingly interested the other night when Mr. Gandy suggested a separate Negro state. It is arresting to see how often this solution comes back again and again to the American Negro. I remember what the Negroes of Newport said to the Negroes of Philadelphia back at the end of the 18th century, when the same thing had been suggested. If we were living in the 17th century, there is no doubt but what Mr. Gandy's suggestion would be the next natural step, that we should say to the American people, "We have tried to be reasonable, decent citizens, and to meet all of the rather difficulturequirements that have beenput upon us, and we have been unable to satisfy you. Now we are going off to try to be by ourselves and to satisfy ourselves. Today, however, the very fact that such a solution is suggested makes it evident how far many of our best minds are from realizing just the situation in this world. The organized industry of the world today, the organized finance and commerce will not let any small group of people, or for that matter, any large group, migrate beyond its power. I have just been studying the extraordinary developments in Liberia under the domination of the National City Bank and the Firestone interests. Liberia tried to borrow $500,000 in 1870. She got $100,000 andhad to pay back practically the whole 500,000 with interest. She tried again in 1906 to borrow $500,000, and all she got out of it was a small rubber forest. She tried in our day to borrow a million dollars of the Firestone interests in return for this rubber forest, and other rubber land, and today she is paying nearly 75 per cent of her total income simply as service charges and salaries on this debt. She is financially ruined and politically defunct unless the American Negro vote can stop the power of the Firestones. In the same way in Haiti, every claim or shadow of a claim against that state has been capitalized at its peak, and the state has been saddled with a debt far beyond its power to pay, and the United States Army and Navy stand ready to enforce its demands. If the 12,000,000 Negroes in the United States should leave this country and find space where they could suffer and reasonably resources for development, they might find themselves under the power of the banking interests of this or some other country backed by military power and unable to make any direct appeal to the sovereign rulers of the country.

37-7-40

I admit freely the difficulties of the frying pan, but I am not attracted by the fire. We must thoroughly recognize the facts of the case. We are the victims of a caste system in the United States whose main lines we have been unable to break. We are here at the beginning of a vast change in the organization of industry here and in the world, and the question is, "What part are we going to take during this change, and how are we going to prepare for a place in the world that comes after?"

37-7-41

It is rather curious that those very people who put special stress upon spiritual values do not usually, when it comes to practical refor, take anyo account of the spirit. But the change that is coming into the world has got to take account of it. Primarily what is happening, and what must be accomplished whether it takes place next year or a dozen years hence, is that we are going to stop the organization of work for private profit and substitute work for public welfare. And the essential thing about this is going to be not a change of law or a facist regime, but a change of spirit. The average American is going to give up the idea that the chief end of man is to be a millionaire. How this is a tremendous change. Only the other day a friend o mine was talking to a young banker. The young banker said, "My opinion is that no is the time when the foundations of the great fortunes of the future are going to be laid." In other words, in a day when we are suffering all the disaster that has come from this foundation of great fortunes, the idea of this young man was that such as soon as we got over this crisis, we were going right back to doing the same thing, and unless we suffer a spiritual revolution by which men are going to envisage small incomes and limited resourcesand endless work for the larger goals of life, unless we have this, nothing is going to save civilization.

Now it happens that the colored people in the United States are the group that has gone least forward on this program of the exploitation of the many for the benefit of the few. It has not been our fault. Rather we have blamed our selves for this lack of "economic progress," as it is called. We are rather ashamed that we have not developed more millionaires and more big business. But I venture to say that this will be our greatest cause for pride in some future day, because after all, we have had the temptation and we have made terrific effort: we have tried just as far as possible, to divide the American Negro into economic classes with th professional and investing classes at the top and the mass or partially unlettered laborers at the bottom,and it has only been the impenetrability of American purchase that has made our advance in these lines so small, But today the task that I have been setting myself is to ward o f the wedges which the Communist party is driving into our group, and I do this not because of any enmity or essential disagreement with the Communists. If I were in Russia, I should be an enthusiastic Communist. If the Communist party in the United States had the leadership and the knowledge which the situation here calls for, I certainly should join with it, but they are today trying to emphasize the fact that the natural leaders of the colored people, the educated and trained classes have goals and interests which are different from the mass of Negroes. There is a partial truth in this, and a partial falsehood. American race prejudice has so pounded the mass of Negroed together that they have not separated into these economic classes, but on the other hand they undoubtedly have had the ideology and if they had been free we would havehad within our race the same exploiting set up that we see around about us. Now, however, in the tremendous change which sooner or later is bound to come in the world, we have a chance to be the first to make the change and make it with the least internal catastrophy.

37-7-42

... [illegible] ... for the following steps:

1. The no profit idea. That is the idea of carrying on business not for profit but for service, the pay being not the surplus value which is made out of the hiring of labor of the monopoly of machines, but a reasonable and even meagre salary scale. That change, as I said before, has got to be spiritual. Just as long as we have within the Negro race young men of education and power who believe that they ought to have the right to spend $100,000 a year, just so long we are facing toward those seas of disaster upon which already the world has met shipwreck.

2. Our work has got to be primarily for service. I know that this word has been overworked, but let me give a concrete example of what I mean. We have among American Negroes ____ lawyers. On the other hand, in every state in the United States when the average Negroes is arrested on a policeman's charge, the chances are that he is going to be started on a criminal career simply because he has no proper legal defence. The NAACP has done some legal defence work in exceptional cases, to establish some great principle of law. We have not had, and we could not expect to have, the money necessary for carrying on legal defence on the scale it ought to be. Every single city, every single county in the United States where there are any number of Negroes ought to have a Negro lawyer of ability working on small and regular salary, standing ready to defend these people when they need defence. Moreover, we have a part of the machinery to do this. We have an extraordinary number of ministers and churches, and the real criticism of the church which I and others have voiced from time to time is not a criticism of belief. It is not my business what anybody believes as long as it is sincere. It is not a criticism of organization because some of them are marvelous organizations, but it is a criticism of the effective work for which they are organized. There is no reason in the world why everyone of the 23,000 Negro churches should not furnish the salary for a lawyer to defend Negroes who need it, even if once in a while they cannot pay the minister's salary. The same kind of socialized medicine could be used. In the three

37-7-43

In the third place, we have got to take thought concerning the Negro family. As it is today, we are making no plans for the marriage of our children when they ought to be married: we are not keeping in mind that the marriage of young people is as much a matter of careful planning and forethought as any other object of civilized life. And finally, there comes the matter of work, and here it is extraordinary how the patterns of the present set-up of business have completely captured our imagination. Practically this conference has come to the conclusion that we have got to make abeisance to big industry and ask it please to allow us to be exploited on the same terms that white people are; on the contrary I am firmly convinced that in the methods and objectives of big industry there is absolutely no hope for the American Negro. The American Negro will only be admitted to organized industry as his labor returns a profit, a bigger profit than white labor does, and upon the wage thus received no civilization or culture can possibly be built. As long, therefore, as big industry is dominated by these ideas, we are facing something worse than a blank wall.

On the other hand what can the government do for us? The impasse of government today is the fact that it has no intelligent democracy upon which it can depend. We are turning to dictators because of the stupidity and ignorance of the average voter. If we give Mr.Roosevelt the right to meddle with the dollar, if we give Herr Hitler the right to expell the Jew if we give to Mussolini the right to tell the Italians what to think, we do this because we know nothing on the subject ourselves. We are ignorant of the function and meaning of money, and we are looking around rather cooperative group can come into its own. The Muscle Shoals development is going to make it possible to have village after village of people supporting themselves by house industry, and there ought to be village after village of colored people doing that same sort of thing.

37-7-44

Again we are not at all clear as to how we are going to use the votes and that we have, they will be large in number, for our economic uplift. We have used them for certain phrases in law, for electing to office people who have spoken pleasantly before election and sometimes after, but we havenot used our vote for certain clear things which we might accomplish - enforced publicity for business, the right to criticize business without being put in jail, the right to say that one of the great and popular drinks sold all over the United States contains cocain, the right to make clear the wretched methods of present business activity. We could use our vote continually to refuse to give monopolistic privileges to certain kinds of business so as to increase the tremendous organization of industry. All this is a part that the consumer can do. And finally, he can cooperate not only in consumption, but in manufacture. I know how much this proposition is criticized, but I say again, as I have said before, twelve million people in the United States can work for themselves and feed themselves, can pay themselves and organize their own industry unless they are incurably stupid. For a great mass of people to sit up and actually starve to death in the midst of plenty is to prove not only to the world but to themselves that they are going to be of no real use in the ultimate reorganization of industry.

In other words, I propose as the next step which the American Negro can give to the world, a new and unique gift. We have tried song and laughter; we have given the world work, and it is now our business to give the world an example of intelligent economic cooperation so that when the new industrial commonwealth comes we can go into it as experienced people and not be left on the outside as mere beggars; and the thing that finally I want to impress upon you, that new industrial commonwealth is coming. You can be scared about it if you want to, you can shudder when Russia and Communism are mentioned, but the reorganization of industry in this world is as sure to come as the sun is to rise. It may not come next year, it may not come in the next decade, but if there is any foundation to our belief in human intelligence, it has got to come.

37.7-45

-0-

37-7-46

THE FIELD AND FUNCTION OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO COLLEGE

Once upon a time some four thousand miles east of this place, I saw the functioning of what was left of a perfect system of education. It was in West Africa. There under the Yorubas and other Sudanese and Bantu tribes, the education of the child began almost before it could walk. It went about with mother and father in their daily tasks; it learned the art of sewing and reaping; it absorbed the wise-saws and folk lore; it knew the lay of land and river. Then before the age of puberty it went into the Bush and there for a season the boys were taught the secrets of sex and the methods of hunting, and the girls learned of motherhood and marriage. They came out of the Bush with a ceremony of graduation, and immediately were given and taken in marriage. Even after that their education went on. They sat in council with their elders and learned the history and science and art of the tribe and practiced all in their daily life. Thus education was completely integrated with life. There could be no uneducated people. There could be no education that was not at once for use in earning a living and for use in living a life. Nothing more perfect has been invented than this system of training youth among primitive African tribes. And one sees it in the beautiful courtesy of black children; in the modesty and frankness of womanhood, and in the dignity and courage of manhood.

If a group, a nation, or a whole world had a fairly stable culture which moved, if we could so conceive it, on one general level, here would be the ideal of our school and university. But, of course, this can never be achieved by human beings on any wide stage. Inequalities arise; inequalities of gift, of privilege, of opportunity. The functions of human beings and their relation to the state differentiates and varies. And soon we have not one education but several co-existing systems of education for different classes of men. And the higher training is conserved for the more powerful and more privileged, so that the university becomes a system of culture for the cultured. With this kind of university, we are most familiar. It reached perhaps its greatest development in England in the Victorial era. Eton and Harrow, Oxford and Cambridge, were for the education of gentlemen. Those people who inherited by contact and early training a body of manners and a knowledge of life which placed them among the well-bred, were taken up and further trained for the particular sort of life which they were to live. A life which pre-supposed a large income, travel, and activity in politics, art, and gradually in the higher lines of industrial organization. This type of university training has greatly impressed the world. It is a foundation for a legend preserved in vision and essay. And there are many people who quite instinctly turn in mind with this sort of thing when they speak of a university. And out of this ideal rose one even more exotic and apart. It conceived of culture, exquisite and fragile as a thing in itself, disimbodied from flesh and action. And this culture existed for its own sake. It was a sort of earthly heaven into which the elect of wealth and privilege, with a few ch nce neophytes from the common run of men, entered and lived above and apart. One gets from this the ideal of cloistered ease, of science and beauty, partaken of by those who sit far from the noise and fury, clamor and dust of the world as the world's artists and scholars.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

And yet the argument against such an ideal of a university is more an argument of fact than logic. For just as soon as such a system of training is established or as men seek to establish it, it dies. It dies like a plant without room, withering into fantastic forms, that bring ridicule or hate. Or it becomes so completely

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

disassociated with life that men forget it and the world passes on as though it was not for and had not been. Thus the university cut off from its roots and from its stocks from the mass of men becomes a university of the air and does not establish and does not hold the ideal of universal culture which was always in its earlier days its great guiding thought.

How is it now that failure to reach this often if not always kills the university? The reasons to me seem clear. You have in the progress of human culture not simply a development that produces different classes of men, because in that case the classes may harmonize more or less and represent the peasant, the artisan and the merchant may exist a leisured aristocracy and for this leisured class a universal culture may be built. But the difficulty goes further than this. You may have dislocations in the elements of these classes. Their relations to each other may change and break, and the foundations upon which the cultured class has been built may crumble, and in this case your system of human training becomes not only a system for the supposed benefit of the privileged few, it cannot, indeed, carry out its function even for them. And its system of learning does not apply to the mass of men more to the relations of its constituents to that mass. One can see examples of this the world over.

In Kenya, which used to be German East Africa, there are millions of black natives and a small minority of white Englishmen who have seized and monopolized the land. By physical or economic compulsion, the natives work this land. On the recent discovery of gold, the natives were dispossessed in favor of white miners. What kind of university will suit Kenya? The minority of landed aristocracy will be taught by tuitors in Africa and then go to the great English schools and universities. The middle-class of immigrant

17-7-152

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)
Indian merchants will learn to read and white and count. The great mass of the black millions will be taught something of the art of agriculture, something of the work of artisans, some ability to read and write, although whether this should be in English or the native tongues is a question. But on this cangrow in Kenya no national university of education because there are there no national ideals. And the university, if it is to be firm, must hark back to their original ideal of the Bush school. It must train the children of a nation for living and making a living. And if it does that, and insofar as it does it, it becomes the perfect expression of its desire and the center of the intellectual and cultural leadership of its age.

I have seen in my life three expressions of such an ideal; all of them imperfect and yet tending toward a vast and singularly beautiful expression of universal education. My first sight of it was here at Fisk University in the fall of 1885 when I arrived as a boy of seventeen. The buildings were few, the cost of tuition, study, residence and costs was less than $200 a year, and the college numbered about twenty-five. And yet the scheme of education as it existed in our minds, in the class room, in the teaching of professors, in the attitude of students, was a singularly perfect and enthusiastic thing. We were a small group of young men and women who were going to transform the world by giving proof of our mental ability, by teaching our less fortunate fellows, and by proclaiming to the world our belief in American democracy and a place which Negroes deserve in it. In none of these propositions did there exist in our minds any hesitation or doubt. There was no question as to improvement and perfectly proper improvement to the ends which we had in view after graduation. There was no question but that if our work was done well, we would stay to finish it. And the whole institution, beaten with a singularly unified pulse of high effort.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

I saw the same thing a few years later in Harvard University at the end of the 19th Century. Harvard had stretched its earlier ideals. It was no longer simply a place where rich and learned New England gave the accolade to its sons. It had broken its shell and stretched out to the West and to the South, to yellow and to black students, and sought to make Harvard an expression of the United States. And to do this by means of men who were unshackled in thought and custom and who were beating back the bars of ignorance and of prejudice. There was William James and Josiah Royce, Nathaniel Shaler and William Elliott Norton, and also George Santyana and President Elliott. There were at least a dozen men, rebels against convention, unorthodox in religion, poor in money, and rich in brains, who for a moment held in their hands the culture of the United States and pushed it a vast step forward. Harvard was in 1890 a perfect expression of the United States or the place where the average American would have found training for his life work. But it perhaps came nearer to high imminence than any other American institution had before or has since.

Again, I saw the University of Berlin a few years later, and it represented at once a definite and analogous ideal. It did not grow up into at once the culture of Germany. Every great professor of that land, with few exceptions, had the ambition to be called to a hair in the feverish Fredrichwilhelm's Universitaet zu Berlin. I sat beneath the voice of a man who perhaps more than any singule individual welded German youth into a great aggressive fist to preach Deutsch uper Alles. I who remember Heinrich bon Treitschke. With flying words that whispered a stuttering tongue, hammering in the young men who sat breathless beneath his voice, the doctrine of the superiority of the of the German people. And out and around that university tens of millions of people shared in that ideal. They sang their national songs and attended their national festivals with enthusiasm that brought tears to the onlooker. And it made you realize the ideal of a single united nation.

417-7-157

Now with these things in mind, let us turn back to America and to the American Negro. It has been said many times that a Negro university was nothing more and nothing less than a university. One of the great leaders of education in the United States, Abram Flexner, said something of that sort not long ago concerning Howard. As President of the Board of Trustees, he was seeking to build not a Negro university but a university. And by those words he broughtagain beofre our eyes the ideal of a great institution of learning which becomes a center of a sort of universal culture. And at the same time, we bring the doubt that I have placed before you, as to how far it is possible for a university to do this and what the grounds of that possibility are?

In the first place, we have got to remember that here in America, in the year 1933, we have a situation which cannot be ignored. There was a time when it seemed as thought we might best attack the Negro problem by ignoring its most unpleasant features. It was not and is not in good taste to speak generally about certain facts which characterize our situation in America. We are politically ham-strung. We have the greatest difficulty in getting renumerative work. Our education is more and more being confined not simply to our own schools but to our own schools with limited endowment and curtailed opportunity, and above all, and this we like least to mention, we suffer a kind of social ostracism which is so deadening and disturbing that we are compelled either to make desperate efforts to forget it or to turn to the red flag of revolution. It consists of the kind of studied and repeated and emphasized insult which during all the long history of the world have led men to kill or be killed. And in the forefront of any claim which many black men may pick out for himself stands this flaming sword of doctrine which at least will distract his effort and energy and which must lead him to spiritual suicide.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Now manifestly with all that can be said, pro and con, and in extenuation, and by way of excuse and hope, this is the situation and we know it. And there is no human way by which these facts can be ignored. We can sing a song of write a book or carry on a university and act as though these things were not. If this is true, then no matter how much we may dislike the statement, the Negro problem is the center of the Negro university. It has got to be. You are teaching Negroes. There is no use pretending that you are teaching Chinese or that you are teaching white Americans or that you are teaching South Africans. You are teaching American Negroes in 1933, and they are the members of a caste system in the Republic of the United States of America and their life problem is this problem of caste. Upon these foundations, therefore, your university must start and build. Nor is the thing entirely unusual or unheard of. A Spanish university is not simply a university. It is a Spanish university. It is a university located in Spain. It uses the Spanish language. It starts with Spanish history and makes conditions in Spain the foundation of its beginning. Its education is for Spaniards. Not as their university shall be or going to be, but as they are with their present problems and disadvantages and opportunities. In other words, the Spanish university is founded and grounded in Spain, just as surely as a French university is French. There are some people who have difficulty in apprehending this very clear truth. They assume that the French university is universal and is based on a comprehension and inclusion of all mankind and of their problems. But it is not. A French University is founded in France; usesthe French language and assumes a knowledge of French history. The problems of the French people are its major problem and it becomes universal only so far as other peoples of the world comprehend and are as one with France in its mighty and beautiful history. In the same way, a Negro university in the United States ofaAmerica begins with Negroes. It uses that variety of the English language which they understand, and above all, it is founded or it should be founded in a knowledge of their history in the United States and their present condition without white-washing or translating wish into fact. It begins with that, and then it asks how shall these young men and women be trained to earn a living and live a life under the circumstances in which they find themselves or with such changing of those circumstances as time and work will permit.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Is this statement of the field of a Negro university a denial of aspiration or a change from older ideals? I do not think it is, although I admit in my own mind some change of thought and modification of method. Usually the system of learning which bases its appf upon the actual condition of certain classes and groups of human beings starts out with the proposal that the knowledge given and the methods pursued in the institutions of learning shall be for the definite object of perpectualing present conditions or of leaving their amelioration in the hands of other forces and other folk. This was the great criticism that those who studied for higher education thirty years ago brought against the industrial school. The industrial school founded itself in the actual situation of American Negroes and said:

"What can be done to change this situation?" And its answer was: "Training in technique and method such as would incorporate the disadvantaged group in the industrial organization of the country, and then with the rise of the white laborer would come the rise of the black laborer. And it still seemed to many simple minds in those days as though the problem of labor in its relation to capital was by way of solution. In opposition to that, the proponents of college training in those earlier years said: "What black men need is the broader and most universal training so that they can apply the general principles of knowledge to the particular circumstances of their condition."

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

As I said a few years ago at Howard University, both these positions had something of truth and right. Because of the peculiar economic situation in our country the program of the industrial school came to grief first, and has practically been given up. Starting even though we may with the actual condition of the Negro peasant and artisan, we cannot ameliorate his condition simply by learning the transient technique of a passing era. More vision and knowledge is needed than that. But on the other hand, while the Negro college of a generation ago set down a defensible and true program and unfortunately did not carry it out, and it did not carry it out because the one thing that the industrial philosophy gave to education the Negro college did not take and that was the university of black men in the United States must be grounded in the condition and words of those black men.

On the other hand, it would be of course idiotic to say as the former industrial school almost said: "That so far as black men are concerned education must stop there." No, facing the conditions and using the facts and the knowledge of the present situation of American Negroes, the Negro university expands toward the possession and the conquests of all knowledge. It seeks from a beginning of the history of the Negro in America and in Africa to interpret all history from a beginning of social development among Negro slave and freedmen in America and Negro tribes and kingdoms in Africa, to interpret and understand the social development of all mankind in all ages. It seeks to reach modern science of matter and life from the surroundings and and appitudes of American Negroes and thus lead up to understanding of life and matter in the world. And this is a different program than a similar function would be in a white university or in a Russian university of in an African university. It is a matter of beginnings and integrations which sweeps indistinctive knowledge and inheritance and current reactions into a world of science, sociology and art. In no other way can the American Negro function in his widest human environment. Why was it that the Renaissance of literature which began among Negroes ten years ago has never taken real root? It was because it was a transplanted and exotic thing. It was a literature written for the benefit of white people and at the behest of white readers. It never had a real Negro constituency and it did not grow out of the heart and experinences of Negroes, and on such an artificial basis no real Negro literature can grow.

191-7-47

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

On the other hand, if starting in a great Negro university you have knowledge, beginning with the particular, and going out to universal comprehension and unhampered expression, you are going to begin to realize for the American Negro the full life which is denied him now. And then after that, a part of this universal culture must again come down and apply itself to the individual life and individual conditions of living Negroes. The university must become not simply a center of knowledge but a guide of action. And this is all the more necessary now since we easily see that planned action and especially economic life, growing to be the watchword of civilization. And this planning is not for us unless we do it. Unless the American Negro today, led by trained university men of broad vision, sits down to work out by economics and mathematics, by physics and chemistry, exactly how and where he is to earn a decent living and how he is to make a reasonable life business in the United States or elsewhere. Unless this is done, the university has missed its field and function and the American Negro is doomed to be a suppressed and inferior caste in the United States for incalcuable time.

Here, then, is a job for the American Negro university. It cannot be successfully ignored or dogged without the growing menane of disaster. I lay the problem before you as one which you must not ignore. It carries out of this plan, two things and only two things are necessary. Teachers and students, buildings and endowments may help, but they are not necessary. It is necessary first to have teachers to comprehend this program and know how to make it live among their students. This is calling for a good deal because it asks that teachers teach that which they have learned in no American school and which they never will learn until we have a Negro university of the sort that I am visioning. No teacher, black or white, who comes to a university like Fisk filled simply with general ideas of human culture or general knowledge of disimbodied science, is going to make a university of this school. Because a university is made of human beings, learning of the things that concern themselves and especially those things in their lives. And secondly, we must have students and they must be chosen for ability. There is always the temptation to assume that the children of privileged classes, the rich, the noble, the white, are those who can best take education. One has but to express this to realize its utter futility. But perhaps the most dangerous thing among us is for us to assume that we can choose students at Fisk because of the amount of money which their parents have happened to get hold of. That basis of selection is going to give us an extraordinary aggregation of fools. We want by the nicest methods possible to seek out the talented and the gifted among our constituency, quite regardless of their wealth or position, and to fill this university and similar institutions with persons who have got brains to take advantage of what the university offers. There is no other way. With teachers who know what they are teaching and whom they are teaching, and the life that surrounds both the knowledge and the knower, and with students who have the capacity and the will to absorb this knowledge, we can build the sort of Negro university which will emancipate not simply the black folk of the United States, but those white folk who in their effort to suppress Negroes have killed democracy and art and religion.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Du Bois

THE FIELD AND FUNCTION OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO COLLEGE

Once upon a time some four thousand miles east of this place, I saw the functioning of a perfect system of education. It was in West Africa beside a broad river, and beneath the palms bronze girls were dancing before the President of Liberia and the native chiefs to celebrate the end of the Bush and their arrival at marriageable age. There under the Yorubas and other Sudanese and Bantu tribes, the education of the child began almost before it could walk. It went about with mother and father in their daily tasks; it learned the art of sowing and reaping and hunting; it absorbed the wisdom and folk lore of the tribe; it knew the lay of land and river. Then at the age of puberty it went into the Bush and there for a season the boys were taught the secrets of sex and the girls in another school learned of motherhood and marriage. They came out of the Bush with a ceremony of graduation, and immediately were given and taken in marriage.

Even after that their education went on. They sat in council with their elders and learned the history and science and art of the tribe and practiced all in their daily life. Thus education was completely integrated with life. There could be no uneducated people. There could be no education that was not at once for use in earning a living and for use in living a life. Out of this education and out of the life it typified came as perfect expressions song and dance and saga ethics and religion.

Nothing more perfect has been invented than this system of training youth among primitive African tribes. And one sees it in the beautiful courtesy of black children; in the modesty and frankness of womanhood, and in the dignity and courage of manhood, and in the dignity and courage of manhood; and too, in African music and art with its world-wide influence.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

If a group has a stable culture which moves, if we could so conceive it, on one general level, here would be the ideal of our school and university. But, of course, this can never be achieved by human beings on any wide stage.

First and most disconcerting, men progress which means that they change their home, their work, their division of wealth, their philosophy. And how shall men teach children that which they themselves do not know or transmit a philosophy or religion that is already partly disbelieved and partly untrue. This is a primal and baffling problem of education and we have never wholly solved it. Or in other words, education of youth in a changing world is a puzzling problem with every temptation for lying and propaganda. But this is but the beginning of trouble. Within the group and nation significant differentiations and dislocations appear so that education of youth becomes a preparation not for one common national life but for the life of a particular class or group; and yet the tendency is to regard as real national education only the training for this group which assumes to represent the nation because of its power and privilege and despite the fact that it is usually a small numerical minority in the nation. Manifestly in such case if a member of one of the suppressed groups receives the national education in such a land, he must become a member of the privileged aristocracy or be educated for a life which he cannot follow and compelled to live a life which he does not know or which he deeply dispises.

This is the problem of education with which the world is most familiar and it tends to two ends: It makes the mass of men dissatisfied with life and it makes the university a system of culture for the cultured.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

With this kind of university, we are most familiar. It reached perhaps its greatest development in England in the Victorian era. Eton and Harrow, Oxford and Cambridge, were for the education of gentlemen,--those people who inherited wealth and who by contact and early training acquired a body of manners and a knowledge of life and even an accent of English which placed them among the well-bred; these were taken up and further trained for the particular sort of life which they were to life; a life which pre-supposed a large income, travel, cultivated society; and activity in politics, art, and the higher lines of industrial organization.

~~With~~ This type of university training has deeply impressed the world. It is foundation for a tenacious legend preserved in fiction, poetry and essay. There are still many people who quite instinctly turn in mind with this sort of thing when they speak of a university. An out of this ideal rose one even more exotic and apart. Instead of the universitygrowingdown and seeking to comprehend in its curriculum the life and experience, the thought and expression of lower classes; it almost invariably to grow up and narrow itself to a sublimated elite of mankind.

It conceived of culture, exquisite and fragile, as a thing in itself, disimbodied from flesh and action; and this culture as existing for its own sake. It was a sort of earthly heaven into which the elect of wealth and privilege and courtly address, with a few chance neophytes from the common run of men, entered and lived in a region above and apart. One gets from this that ideal of cloistered ease, for Science and Beauty, partaken of by those who sit far from the noise and fury, clamor and dust of the world, as the world's aristocrats, artists and scholars.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

scholars.

And yet the argument against such an ideal of a university is more an argument of fact than logic. For just as soon as such a system of training is established or as men seek to establish it, it dies. It dies like a plant without room, withering into fantastic forms, that bring ridicule or hate. Or it becomes so completely disassociated with the main currents of real life that men forget it and the world passes on as though it was not for it and had not been. Thus the university cut off from its national roots and from the mass of men becomes a university of the air and does not establish and does not hold the ideal of universal cultu e which it sought in its earlier days to make its great guiding thought.

How is it now that failure to reach this often if not always kills the university? The reasons to me seem clear. Human culture in its broadest and finest sense can never bewholly the product of the few. There is no natural aristocracy of man, either within a nation or among the races of the world, which unless fed copiously from without can build up and maintain and diversify a broad human culture. A system, therefore, of natu al education which tries to confine its benefits to preparing the few for the life of the few, dies of starvation. And this every aristocracy which the world has ever seen can prove a thousand times. There are two ways in which this can be remedied: The aristocracy may be recruited from the masses still leaving the aim of education as the preparation of men for the life of this priv leged class. This has been the desperate effort of England and in this way English aristocracy has kept its privilege and its wealth more successfully than any modern or ancient land. But even here the method fails because the life of the English aristocrat is after all not the broadest and fullest life. It is

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

It is only, therefore, as the university lives up to its name and reaches down to the mass of universal men and makes the life of normal men the object of its training, it is only in this way that the marvelous talent and diversity and emotion of mankind pours up through this method of human training and establishes a national culture and a national art.

Thus in the progress of human culture you have not simply a development that produces different classes of men, because classes may harmonize more or less and above the peasant, the artisan and the merchant may exist a leisured aristocracy and on this leisured class a class culture may be built which may flourish long and wide. But the difficulty goes further than the narrowness and sterility of this plan. Dislocations come within these classes. Their relations to each other may change and break and the foundations upon which the cultured class have been built may crumble. In this case your system of human training becomes not only a system for the supposed benefit of the privileged few, but cannot, indeed, carry out its function even for them. Its system of learning does not fit the mass of men nor the relations of its constituents to that mass.

One can see examples of this the world over. In Kenya, which used to be German East Africa, there are millions of black natives and a small minority of white Englishmen who have seized and monopolized the best land, leaving the natives scarcely enough poor land for subsistence. By physical slavery, economic compulsion or legal sanction, the natives work the land of the whites. On the recent discovery of gold, the natives were dispossessed of their own land in favor of white miners.

What kind of university will suit Kenya? The minority of landed aristocracy will be taught by tutors in Africa and then go to the great English schools and universities. The middle-class of immigrant Indian merchants will learn to read and write and count at home or in elementary schools. The great mass of the black millions will be taught something of the art of agriculture, something of the work of artisans, perhaps some ability to read and write, although whether this should be in English or merely in the native tongue is a question. But on this foundation there can grow in Kenya no national university of education because there are there no national ideals. No culture, either African or European, can be built on any such economic foundation. Education in Kenya is a misnomer.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Thus the university, if it is to be first, must hark back to the original ideal of the Bush school. It must train the children of a nation for Life and for making a living. And if it does that, and insofar as it does it, it becomes the perfect expression of the desire and the center of the intellectual and cultural expression of its age.

I have seen in my life three expressions of such an ideal; all of them imperfect, all of them partial, and yet each tending toward a broad and singularly beautiful expression of universal education. My first sight of it was here at Fisk University in the fall of 1885 when I arrived as a boy of seventeen. The buildings were few, the cost of tuition, board, room and clothes were less than $200 a year; and the college numbered less than twenty-five. And yet the scheme of education as it existed in our minds, in the class room, in the teaching of professors, in the attitude of students, was a thing of breadth and enthusiasm with an unusuality of aim. We were a small group of young men and women who were going to transform the world by giving proof of our own mental ability, by teaching our less fortunate fellows so that they could follow the same by proclaiming to the world

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)
our belief in American democracy and in the place which Negroes would surely take in it. In one of these propositions did there exist in our minds any hesitation or doubt. There was no question as to employment and perfectly proper employment for graduates for the ends which we had in view. There was no question of our remaining in school for no good or earnest student ever left.

Above all, to our unblinking gaze, the gates of the World would open--were opening. We never for a moment contemplated the possibility that seven millions of Americans who proved their physical and mental worth could be excluded from the national democracy of a common American culture. We came already bringing gifts. The song we sang was fresh from the lips that threw it round the world. We saw and heard the voices that charmed an emperor and a queen. We believed in the supreme power of the ballot in the hands of the masses to transform the world. Already the North was breaking the Color Line and for the South we were willing to wait.

I saw the same thing a few years later in Harvard University at the end of the 19th Century. Harvard had broadened its earlier ideals. It was no longer simply a place where rich and learned New England gave the accolade to social élite. It had broken its shell and stretched out to the West and to the South, to yellow students and to black. I had for the mere asking been granted a fellowship of $300--a sum so vast to my experiences that I was surprised when it did not pay my first year's expenses. Men sought to make Harvard an expression of the United States, and to do this by means of leaders unshackled in thought and custom who were beating back bars of ignorance and particularism and prejudice. There were William James and Josiah Royce; Nathaniel Shaler and William Elliott Norton; George Santyana and President Eliott himself. There were at least a dozen men,— rebels against convention, unorthodox in religion, poor in money, who for a moment held in their hands the culture of the United States, typified it, expressed it, and pushed it a vast step forward. Harvard was not in 1890 a perfect expression of the American soul or the place where the average American would have found training for his life work. But perhaps it came nearer that high emminence than any other American institution had before or has since.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Again a few years later, I saw the University of Berlin. It represented in 1892 a definite and unified ideal. It did not comprehend at once the culture of all Germany, but I do not believe that ever in modern days and certainly not either at Fisk or Harvard did a great university come so near expressing a national ideal. It was as though I had beeen stepping up from a little group college with a national vision to a provincial university with a universal outlook to a national institution which came near gathering to itself the thought and culture of forty million human beings. Every great professor of Germany, with few exceptions, had the life ambition to be called to a Chair in the Friedrich Wilhelm Universitaet zu Berlin. I sat beneath the voice of a man who perhaps more than any single individual embodied the German ideal and welded German youth into that great aggressive fist which put Deutschland ueber Alles! I remember Heinrich von Treitschke. With swift flying words that had a painfully stuttering tongue, he hammered into the young men who sat motionless and breathless beneath his voice, the doctrine of the unborn superiority of the German race. He told us few foreigners to our faces that we felt and acknowledged our inferiority. And out and around that university for thousands of miles, millions of people shared in its ideal teaching, and did this inspite of cast by birth and poverty, jostling wealth because they believed in any ultimate unity which

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)
Bismarkian state socialism promised. They sang their national songs and joined in national festivals with enthusiasm that brought tears to the onlooker. And it made you realize the ideal of a single united nation. It was expressed in matchless poetry, daring science and undying music. Yet in each of these cases, the ultimate ideal of a national much less a universal university was a vision never wholly attained, and in the very nature of the case it could not be. Fisk had to be a Negro university because it was teaching and they were a class with their own history and problems. Harvard was still a New England provincial institution and Berlin was sharply and determinely German. Their common characteristic was that starting where they did and must they aimed and moved toward universal culture.

Now with these things in mind, let us turn back to America and to the American Negro. It has been said many times that a Negro university was nothing more and nothing less than a university. Quite recently one of the great leaders of education in the United States, Abraham Flexner, said something of that sort concerning Howard. As President of the Board of Trustees, he said he was seeking to build not a Negro university but a University. And by those words he brought again before our eyes the ideal of a great institution of learning which becomes a center of universal culture.

It is the object of this paper to insist that there can be no college for Negroes which is not a Negro college and that while a American Negro university, just like a German or a Swiss university may rightly aspire to a universal culture unpampered by limitationsof race and culture, yet they must start on the earth where they sit and not in the skies whither they aspire. May I develop this thought.

In the first place, we have got to remember that here in America, in the year 1933, we have a situation which cannot be ignored. There

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

There was a time when it seemed as thought we might best attack the Negro problem by ignoring its most unpleasant features. It was not and is not in good taste to speak generally about certain facts which characterize our situation in America. We are politically hamstrung. We have the greatest difficulty in getting remunerative work. Our educaton is more and more not only being confined to our own schools but to a segregated public school system far below the average of the nation with one-third of our children continually out of school, and above all, and this we like least to mention, we suffer a social ostracism which is so deadening and discouraging that we are compelled either to lie about it or to turn our faces toward the red flag of revolution. It consists of the kind of studied and repeated and emphasized public insult of the sort which during all the long history of the world have led men to kill or be killed. And in the full face of any effort which any black men may make to escape this ostracism for himself, stands this flaming sword of doctrine which will distract his effort and energy if it does not lead him to spiritual suicide.

We boast and have right to boast of our accomplishment between the days that I studied here and this 45th Anniversayy. It is a claim appreciation of fact to say that the history of modern civilization cannot surpass if it can parallel the advance of American Negroes and in every essential line of culture. And yet when we have said this we must have the common courage honestly to admit that every step we have made forward has been greeted by two steps backward on the part of the American public in caste intoleration, mob law and racial hatred.

I need but remind you that when I graduated from Fisk there was no "Jim Crow Car" in Tennessee and I saw C. O. Hunter once push a brakeman aside at the Union Station and escort a crowd of students into first-class seats. There was no disfranchisement and a black Fiskite sat in the Legislature , and while the Chancellor of Vanderbilt University had annually to be re-introduced to the President of Fisk, yet Vanderbilt never presumed to plan the internal social life of this institution.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Now manifestly with all that can be said, pro and con, and in extenuation, and by way of excuse and hope, this is the situation and we know it. And there is no human way by which these facts can be ignored. We cannot sing a song or write a book or carry on a university and act as though these things were not.

If this is true, then no matter how much we may dislike the statement, the American Negro problem is and must be the center of the Negro American university. It has got to be. You are teaching Negroes. There is no use pretending that you are teaching Chinese or that you are teaching white Americans or that you are teaching South Africans. You are teaching American Negroes in 1933, and they are the members of a caste system in the Republic of the United States of America and their life problem is primarily this problem of caste.

Upon these foundations, therefore, your university must start and build. Nor is the thing so entirely unusual or unheard of as it sounds. A university in Spain is not simply a university. It is a Spanish university. It is a university located in Spain. It uses the Spanish language. It starts with Spanish history and makes conditions in Spain the starting point of its teaching. Its education is for Spaniards,—not for them as they may be or ought to be, but as they are with their present problems and disadvantages and opportunities.

In other words, the Spanish university is founded and grounded in Spain, just as surely as a French university is French. There are some people who have difficulty in apprehending this very clear truth. They assume, for instance, that the French university is in a singular universal, and is based on a comprehension and inclusion of all mankind and of their problems. But it is not, and the assumption that it is arises simply because so much of French culture has been built into university civilization. A French university is founded in France; it uses the French language and assumes a knowledge of French history. The present problems of the French people are its major problem and it becomes universal only so far as other peoples of the world comprehend and are at one with France in its mighty and beautiful history.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Inthe same way, a Negro university in the United States of America begins with Negroes. It uses that variety of the English language which they understand; and above all, it is founded or it should be founded on a knowledge of the history of their people in Africa and in the United States, and their present condition; without white-washing or translating wish into fact. It begins with that, and then it asks how shall these young men and women be trained to earn a living and live a life under the circumstances in which they find themselves or with such changing of those circumstances as time and work will permit.

Is this statement of the field of a Negro university a denial of aspiration or a change from older ideals? I do not think it is, although I admit in my own mind some change of thought and modification of method. Usually the system of learning which bases itself upon the actual condition of certain classes and groups of human beings, suppresses a minor promise of fatal menace. It proposes that the knowledge given and the methods pursued in such institutions of learning shall be for the definite object of perpetuating present conditions or of leaving their amelioration in the hands of and at the initiative of other forces and other folk. This was the great criticism that those of us who fought for higher education of Negroes thirty years ago, brought against the industrial school.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

The industrial school founded itself and rightly upon the actual situation of American Negroes and said: "What can be done to change this situation?" And its answer was: "A training in technique and method such as would incorporate the disadvantaged group into the industrial organization of the country, and in that organization the leaders of Negro industrialhad perfect . Since that day the industrial machine has cracked and groaned. Its technique has changed faster than any school could teach; the relations of capital and labor have increased in complication and it has become so clear that Negro poverty is not primarily caused by ignorance of technical knowledge, that the industrial school has almost surrendered its program.

In opposition to that, the proponents of college training in those earlier years said: "What black men need is the broader and more universal training so that they can apply the general principles of knowledge to the particular circumstances of their condition."

Here again was indubitable truth but incomplete truth. The cultural problem lay in the method of reaching this broader and more universal truth and here just as in the united program, we must start where we are and not where we wish to be.

As I said a few years ago at Howard University both these positions had something of truth and right. Because of the peculiar economic situation in our country the program of the industrial school came to grief first and has practically been given up. Starting even though we may with the actual condition of the Negro peasant and artisan, we cannot ameliorate his condition simply by learning the transient technique of a passing era. More vision and knowledge is needed than that. But on the other hand, while the Negro college of a generation ago set down a defensible and true program of applying knowledge and facts, it unfortunately could not completely carry out, and it did not carry it out, because the one thing that the industrial philosophy gave to education, the Negro college did not take and that was that the university education of black men in the United States must be grounded in the condition and work of those black men.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

On the other hand, it would be of course idiotic to say as the former industrial philosophy almost said that so far as most black men are concerned education must stop with work. No, starting with present conditions and using the facts and the knowledge of the present situation of American Negroes, the Negro university expands toward the possession and the conquest of all knowledge. It seeks from a beginning of the history of the Negro in America and in Africa to interpret all history from a beginning of social development among Negro slave and freedmen in America and Negro tribes and kingdoms in Africa, to interpret and understand the social development of all mankind in all ages. It seeks to reach modern science of matter and life from the surroundings and habits and aptitudes of American Negroes and thus lead up to understanding of life and matter in the universe. And this is a different program than a similar function would be in a white university or in a Russian university or in an African university. It is a matter of beginnings and integrations which sweep instinctive knowledge and inheritance and current reactions into a world of science, sociology and art. In no other way can the American Negro function in his widest human environment.

Why was it that the Renaissance of literature which began among Negroes ten years ago has never taken real root? It was because it was a transplanted and exotic thing. It was a literature written for the benefit of white people and at the behest of white readers, and readers, and starting out humanly from the white pint of view. It never had a real Negro constituency and it did not grow out of the heart and experienceof Negroes, and on such an artificial basis no real Negro literature can grow.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

On the other hand, if starting in a great Negro university you have knowledge, beginning with the particular, and going out to universal comprehension and unhampered expression, you are going to begin to realize for the American Negro the full life which is denied him now. And then after that comes a realization of the older object of our college—to bring this universal culture down and apply it to the individual life and individual conditions of living Negroes. The university must become not simply a center of knowledge but a guide of action. And this is all the more necessary now since we easily see that planned action and especially economic life, growing to be the watchword of civilization.

We are on the threshold of a new era. Let us not deceive ourselves with outworn ideals of wealth and servants and luxuries, reared on a foundation of ignorance, starvation and want. Instinctly, we have absorbed these ideals from our twisted white American environment. This new economic planning is not for us unless we do it. Unless the American Negro today, led by trained university men of broad vision, sits down to work out by economics and mathematics, by physics and chemistry, by history and sociology, exactly how and where he is to earn a living and how he is to establish a reasonable Life in the United States or elsewhere—unless this is done, the university has missed its field and function and the American Negro is doomed to be a suppressed and inferior caste in the United States for incalculable time.

Here, then, is a job for the American Negro university. It cannot be successfully ignored or dodged without the growing menace of disaster. I lay the problem before you as one which you must not ignore.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

To carry out this plan, two things and only two things are necessary,--teachers and students. Buildings and endowments may help, but they are not necessary. It is necessary first to have teachers who comprehend this program and know how to make it live among their students. This is calling for a good deal, because it asks that teachers teach that which they have learned in no American school and which they never will learn until we have a Negro university of the sort that I am visioning. No teacher, black or white, who comes to a university like Fisk filled simply with general ideas of human culture or general knowledge of disimbodied science, is going to make a university of this school. Because a university is made of human beings, learning of the things they do not know from things they know in their own lives. And secondly, we must have students. They must be chosen for ability to learn. There is always the temptation to assume that the children of privileged classes, the rich, the noble, the white, are those who can best take education. One has but to express this to realize its utter futility. But perhaps the most dangerous thing among us is for us without thought to imitate our white world and assume that we can choose students at Fisk because of the amount of money which their parents have happened to get hold of. That basis of selection is going to give us an extraordinary aggregation of fools. We want by the nicest methods possible to seek out the talented and the gifted among our constituency, quite regardless of their wealth or position, and to fill this university and similar institutions with persons who have got brains enough to take fullest advantage of what the university offers. There is no other way. With teachers who know what they are teaching and with whom they are

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)
teaching, and the life that surrounds both the knowledge and the knower, and with students who have the capacity and the will to absorb this knowledge, we can build the sort of Negro university which will emancipate not simply the black folk of the United States, but those white folk who in their effort to suppress Negroes have killed democracy and art and religion.

Men who in their desperate effort to replace equality with caste and to build inordinate wealth on a foundation of abject poverty have succeeded in killing democracy, art and religion.

Only a universal system of learning, rooted in the will and condition of the masses and blossoming from that manure up toward the stars is worth the name. Once builded it can only grow as it brings down sunlight and star and impregnates the mud.

The chief obstacle in this rich land endowed with every national resource and with the abilities of one hundred different peoples, the chief and only obstacle to the coming of that kingdom of economic equality which is the only logical end of work, is the determination of the white world to keep the black world poor and themselves rich. But the disaster which this selfish and short-sighted policy has brought lies at the bottom of this present depression, and too, its cure lies beside it. Your clear vision of a world without wealth, of capital without profit, of income based on work alone, is the path out not only for you but for all men.

The Negro College

by

W. E. B. Du Bois

W. E. B. Du Bois

This is part of an address on the "The Field and Function of a Negro College", delivered at the annual alumni reunion during Commencement week at Fisk University last June. The complete address will be issued in pamphlet form later.

37-7-106

It has been said many times that a Negro

THE FIELD AND FUNCTION OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO COLLEGE

Once upon a time some four thousand miles east of this place, I saw the functioning of a perfect system of education. It was in West Africa, beside a broad river, and beneath the palms, bronze girls were dancing before the President of Liberia and the native chiefs, to celebrate the end of the Bush, and their arrival at marriageable age. There under the Yorubas and other Sudanese and Bantu tribes, the education of the child began almost before it could walk. It went about with mother and father in their daily tasks; it learned the art of sowing and reaping and hunting; it absorbed the wisdom and folk lore of the tribe; it knew the lay of land and river. Then at the age of puberty it went into the Bush and there for a season the boys were taught the secrets of sex and the girls in another school learned of motherhood and marriage. They came out of the Bush with a ceremony of graduation, and immediately were given and taken in marriage.

37-7-140

Even after that, their education went on. They sat in council with their elders and learned the history and science and art of the tribe and practiced all in their daily life. Thus education was completely integrated with life. There could be no uneducated people. There could be no education that was not at once for use in earning a living and for use in living a life. Out of this education and out of the life it typified, came, as perfect expressions, song and dance and saga, ethics and religion.

37-7-141

Nothing more perfect has been invented than this system of training youth, among primitive African tribes. And one sees it in the beautiful courtesy of black children; in the modesty and frankness of womanhood, ~~and in the dignity and courage of manhood~~, and in the dignity and courage of manhood; and too, in African music and art with its world-wide influence.

(3)

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

37-7-142

If a group has a stable culture which moves, if we could so conceive it, on one general level, here would be the ideal of our school and university. But, of course, this can never be achieved by human beings on any wide stage.

First and most disconcerting, men progress, which means that they change their home, their work, their division of wealth, their philosophy. And how shall men teach children that which they themselves do not know or transmit a philosophy or religion that is already partly disbelieved and partly untrue? This is a primal and baffling problem of education and we have never wholly solved it. Or in other words, education of youth in a changing world is a puzzling problem with every temptation for lying and propaganda. But this is but the beginning of trouble. Within the group and nation significant differentiations and dislocations appear, so that education of youth becomes a preparation not for one common national life but for the life of a particular class or group; and yet the tendency is to regard as real national education only the training for this group which assumes to represent the nation because of its power and privilege, and despite the fact that it is usually a small numerical minority in the nation. Manifestly in such case if a member of one of the suppressed groups receives the national education in such a land, he must become a member of the privileged aristocracy or be educated for a life which he cannot follow and be compelled to live a life which he does not like or which he deeply dispises.

(4)

37-7-143

This is the problem of education with which the world is most familiar and it tends to two ends: It makes the mass of men dissatisfied with life and it makes the university a system of culture for the cultured.

(5)

37-7-144

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

With this kind of university, we are most familiar. It reached in our day perhaps its greatest development in England in the Victorian era. Eton and Harrow, Oxford and Cambridge, were for the education of gentlemen,--those people who inherited wealth and who by contact and early training acquired a body of manners and a knowledge of life and even an accent of English which placed them among the well-bred; these were taken up and further trained for the particular sort of life which they were to live; a life which pre-supposed a large income, travel, cultivated society; and activity in politics, art, and ~~the higher lines of industrial organization.~~ imperial Industry

This type of university training has deeply impressed the world. It is foundation for a tenacious legend preserved in fiction, poetry and essay. There are still many people who quite instinctively turn ~~in mind with~~ to this sort of thing when they speak of a university.

(6)

An out of this ideal rose one even more exotic and apart. Instead of the university growing down and seeking to comprehend in its curriculum the life and experience, the thought and expression of lower classes; it almost invariably tended to grow up and narrow itself to a sublimated élite of mankind.

37-7-145

It conceived of culture, exquisite and fragile, as a thing in itself, disembodied from flesh and action; and this culture as existing for its own sake. It was a sort of earthly heaven into which the elect of wealth and privilege and courtly address, with a few chance neophytes from the common run of men, entered and lived in a region above and apart. One gets from this that ideal of cloistered ease, for Science and Beauty, partaken of by those who sit far from the noise and fury, clamor and dust of the world, as the world's aristocrats, artists and scholars.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

37-7-146

scholars.

And yet, the argument against such an ideal of a university is more an argument of fact than logic. For just as soon as such a system of training is established or as men seek to establish it, it dies. It dies like a plant without room, withering into fantastic forms, that bring ridicule or hate. Or it becomes so completely disassociated with the main currents of real life that men forget it and the world passes on as though it was not, for it had not been. Thus the university cut off from its national roots and from the mass of men becomes a university of the air and does not establish and does not hold the ideal of universal culture which it sought, in its earlier days, to make its great guiding thought. End

How is it now that failure to reach this, often if not always, kills the university? The reasons to me seem clear. Human culture in its broadest and finest sense can never be wholly the product of the few. There is no natural aristocracy of man, either within a nation or among the races of the world, which unless fed copiously from without, can build up and maintain and diversify a broad human culture. A system, therefore, of national education which tries to confine its benefits to preparing the few for the life of the few, dies of starvation. And this every aristocracy which the world has ever seen can prove a thousand times. There are two ways in which this can be remedied: The aristocracy may be recruited from the masses, still leaving the aim of education as the preparation of men for the life of this privileged class. This has been the desperate effort of England and in this way English aristocracy has kept its privilege and its wealth more successfully than any modern or ancient land. But even here the method fails because the life of the English aristocrat is after all not the broadest and fullest life.

37-7-147

~~(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)~~

(9)

It is only, therefore, as the university lives up to its name and reaches down to the mass of universal men and makes the life of normal men the object of its training, it is only in this way that the marvelous talent and diversity and emotion of all mankind pours up through this method of human training and establishes a national culture and a national art. Herein lies the eternal logic of Democracy.

37-7-148

Thus in the progress of human culture you have not simply a development that produces different classes of men, because classes may harmonize more or less and above the peasant, the artisan and the merchant, may exist a leisured aristocracy and on this leisured class a class culture may be built which may flourish long and wide. But the difficulty goes further than the narrowness and ultimate sterility of this plan. Dislocations come within these classes. Their relations to each other may change and break and the foundations upon which the cultured class has been built, may crumble. In this case your system of human training becomes not only a system for the supposed benefit of the privileged few, but cannot, indeed, carry out its function even for them. Its system of learning does not fit the mass of men nor the relations of its constituents to that mass.

(10)

One can see examples of this the world over. In Kenya, which used to be German East Africa, there are millions of black natives and a ~~small minority~~ few thousand of white Englishmen who have seized and monopolized the best land, leaving the natives scarcely enough poor land for subsistence. By physical slavery, economic compulsion or legal sanction, the natives work the land of the whites. On the recent discovery of gold, the natives were dispossessed of their own land in favor of white miners.

37-7-149

What kind of ~~university~~ education will suit Kenya? The minority of landed

(6. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

aristocracy will be taught by tutors in Africa, and then go to the great English schools and universities. The middle-class of immigrant Indian merchants will learn to read and write and count at home or in elementary schools. The great mass of the black millions will be taught something of the art of agriculture, something of the work of artisans, perhaps some ability to read and write, (although whether this should be in English or merely in the native tongue is a question.) But on this foundation there can grow in Kenya no national university of education, because there are there no national ideals. No culture, either African or European, can be built on any such economic foundation. Education in Kenya is a misnomer.

Thus the university, if it is to be firm, must hark back to the original ideal of the Bush school. It must train the children of a nation for Life and for making a living. And if it does that, and insofar as it does it, it becomes the perfect expression of the ~~desire~~ life and the center of the intellectual and cultural expression of its age.

I have seen in my life three expressions of such an ideal; all of them imperfect, all of them partial, and yet each tending toward a broad and singularly beautiful expression of universal education. My first sight of it was here at Fisk University in the fall of 1885 when I arrived as a boy of seventeen. The buildings were few, the cost of tuition, board, room and clothes ~~was~~ less than $200 a year; and the college numbered less than twenty-five. And yet the scheme of education as it existed in our minds, in the class room, in the teaching of professors, in the attitude of students, was a thing of breadth and enthusiasm with an unusual unity of aim. We were a small group of young men and women who were going to transform the world by giving proof of our own ~~mental~~ ability, by teaching our less fortunate fellows so that they could follow the same path, by proclaiming to the world

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

(13)

our belief in American democracy, and the place which Negroes would surely take in it. In none of these propositions did there exist in our minds any hesitation or doubt. There was no question as to employment and perfectly proper employment for graduates, for the ends which we had in view. There was no question of our remaining in school for no good or earnest student ever left.

37-7-152

Above all, to our unblinking gaze, the gates of the World would open—were opening. We never for a moment contemplated the possibility that seven millions of Americans who proved their physical and mental worth could be excluded from the national democracy of a common American culture. We came already bringing gifts. The song we sang was fresh from the lips that threw it round the world. We saw and heard the voices that charmed an emperor and a queen. We believed in the supreme power of the ballot in the hands of the masses to transform the world. Already the North was breaking the Color Line and for the South we were willing to wait.

(14)

I saw the same thing a few years later in Harvard University at the end of the 19th Century. Harvard had broadened its earlier ideals. It was no longer simply a place where rich and learned New England gave the accolade to the social elite. It had broken its shell and stretched out to the West and to the South, to yellow students and to black. I had for the mere asking, been granted a fellowship of $300—a sum so vast to my experience that I was surprised when it did not pay my first year's expenses. Men sought to make Harvard an expression of the United States, and to do this by means of leaders unshackled in thought and custom who were beating back bars of ignorance and particularism and prejudice. There were William James and Josiah Royce; Nathaniel Shaler and Charles Eliot Norton; George Santayana, A.B. Hart, and President Eliot himself. There were at least a dozen men,—

37-7-153

(Cont. ~~The Field and Function of the American Negro College.~~) (15)

37-7-154

rebels against convention, unorthodox in religion, poor in money, who for a moment held in their hands the culture of the United States, typified it, expressed it, and pushed it a vast step forward. Harvard was not in ~~1800~~ 1888 a perfect expression of the American soul, or the place where the average American would have found adequate training for his life work. But perhaps it came nearer that high emminence than any other American institution had before or has since.

Again a few years later, I saw the University of Berlin. It represented in 1892 a definite and unified ideal. It did not comprehend at once the culture of all Germany, but I do not believe that ever in modern days and certainly not ~~either~~ at Fisk or Harvard did a great university come so near expressing a national ideal. It was as though I had beeen stepping up from a little group college with a national vision to a provincial university with a more than national outlook to a national institution which came near gathering to itself the thought and culture of forty million human beings. (16) Every great professor of Germany, with few exceptions, had the life ambition to be called to a Chair in the Friedrich Wilhelms Universitaet zu Berlin. I sat beneath the voice of a man who perhaps more than any single individual embodied the German ideal and welded German youth into that great aggressive fist which intensely put Deutschland ~~e~~ Ueber Alles! I remember well Heinrich von Treitschke. With swift flying words that hid a painfully stuttering tongue, he hammered into the young men who sat motionless and breathless beneath his voice, the doctrine of the inborn superiority of the German race. He told us few foreigners to our faces, that we felt and acknowledged our inferiority. And out and around that university for a thousands of miles, millions of people shared in its ideal teaching, and did this inspite of caste of birth and poverty, josling wealth because they believed in an ultimate unity which

37-7-155

(17)

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

Bismarkian state socialism promised. They sang their national songs and joined in national festivals with enthusiasm that brought tears to the onlooker. And it made you realize the ideal of a single united nation, ~~It was~~ expressed in matchless poetry, daring science and undying music. Yet in each of these cases, the ultimate ideal of a national much less a universal university was a vision never wholly attained, and in the very nature of the case it could not be. Fisk had to be a Negro university because it was teaching Negroes, and they were a ~~class~~ caste with their own history and problems. Harvard was still a New England provincial institution and Berlin was sharply and determinedly German. Their common characteristic was that starting where they did and must, they aimed and moved toward universal culture.

Now with these things in mind, let us turn back to America and to the American Negro. It has been said many times that a Negro university ~~was~~ is nothing more and nothing less than a university. Quite recently one of the great leaders of education in the United States, Abraham Flexner, said something of that sort concerning Howard. As President of the Board of Trustees, he said he was seeking to build not a Negro university but a University. And by those words he brought again before our eyes the ideal of a great institution of learning which becomes a center of universal culture. With all good will toward them that say such words - It is the object of this paper to insist that there can be no college for Negroes which is not a Negro college and that while an American Negro university, just like a German or a Swiss university may rightly aspire to a universal culture unhampered by limitations of race and culture, yet ~~they~~ it must start on the earth where ~~they~~ we sit and not in the skies whither ~~they~~ we aspire. May I develop this thought.

(18)

In the first place, we have got to remember that here in America, in the year 1933, we have a situation which cannot be ignored. ~~There~~

~~(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College)~~

19

There was a time when it seemed as though we might best attack the Negro problem by ignoring its most unpleasant features. It was not and is not yet in good taste to speak generally about certain facts which characterize our situation in America. We are politically hamstrung. We have the greatest difficulty in getting suitable remunerative work. Our educaton is more and more not only being confined to our own schools but to a segregated public school system far below the average of the nation with one-third of our children continually cruelly out of school. And above all, and this we like least to mention, we suffer a social ostracism which is so deadening and discouraging that we are compelled either to lie about it or to turn our faces toward the red flag of revolution. It consists of the kind of studied and repeated and emphasized public insult of the sort which during all the long history of the world has led men to kill or be killed. And in the full face of any effort which any black men may make to escape this ostracism for himself, stands this flaming sword of racial doctrine which will distract his effort and energy if it does not lead him to spiritual suicide.

20

We boast and have right to boast of our accomplishment between the days that I studied here and this 45th Anniversary of my graduation. It is a calm ~~appreciation~~ raised of fact to say that the history of modern civilization cannot surpass if it can parallel the advance of American Negroes in every essential line of culture in these years. And yet when we have said this we must have the common courage honestly to admit that every step we have made forward has been greeted by a two steps backward on the part of the American public in caste intolerance, mob law and racial hatred.

I need but remind you that when I graduated from Fisk there was no "Jim Crow" car in Tennessee and I saw ~~G. W.~~ Hunter in 1889 once ~~push a~~ wrench a brakeman aside at the Union Station and escort a crowd of Fisk students

37-7-108

37-7-109

i

(21)

(Cont. ~~The Field and Functions of the American Negro College.~~)

into the first-class seats for white Southerners and Northerners. There was no legal disfranchisement and a black Fiskite sat in the Legislature; and while the Chancellor of Vanderbilt University had annually to be re-introduced to the President of Fisk, yet no white Southern group presumed to dictate the internal social life of this institution.

37-7-110

Manifestly with all that can be said, pro and con, and in extenuation, and by way of excuse and hope, this is the situation and we know it. ~~and~~ there is no human way by which these facts can be ignored. We cannot do our daily work sing a song or write a book or carry on a university and act as though these things were not.

If this is true, then no matter how much we may dislike the statement, the American Negro problem is and must be the center of the Negro American university. It has got to be. You are teaching Negroes. There is no use pretending that you are teaching Chinese or that you are teaching white Americans or that you are teaching ~~South Africans~~. You are teaching American Negroes in 1933, and they are the outcasts of a caste system in the Republic of the United States of America and their life problem is primarily this problem of caste.

(22)

citizens of the world

37-7-111

Upon these foundations, therefore, your university must start and build. Nor is the thing so entirely unusual or unheard of as it sounds. A university in Spain is not simply a university. It is a Spanish university. It is a university located in Spain. It uses the Spanish language. It starts with Spanish history and makes conditions in Spain the starting point of its teaching. Its education is for Spaniards,—not for them as they may be or ought to be, but as they are with their present problems and disadvantages and opportunities.

In other words, the Spanish university is founded and grounded in Spain, just as surely as a French university is French. There are some people who have difficulty in apprehending this very clear truth. They assume, for instance, that the French university is in a singular sense universal, and is based on a comprehension and inclusion of all mankind and of their problems. But it is not, and the assumption that it is, arises simply because so much of French culture has been built into universal civilization. A French university is founded in France; it uses the French language and assumes a knowledge of French history. The present problems of the French people are its major problems and it becomes universal only so far as other peoples of the world comprehend and are at one with France in its mighty and beautiful history.

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

37-7-112

Inthe same way, a Negro university in the United States of America begins with Negroes. It uses that variety of the English ~~language~~ idiom which they understand; and above all, it is founded or it should be founded on a knowledge of the history of their people in Africa and in the United States, and their present conditions. Without white-washing or translating wish into fact, it begins with that; and then it asks how shall these young men and women be trained to earn a living and live a life under the circumstances in which they find themselves or with such changing of those circumstances as time and work will permit.

Is this statement of the field of a Negro university a denial of aspiration or a change from older ideals? I do not think it is, although I admit in my own mind some change of thought and modification of method. ~~Usually~~ The system of learning which bases itself upon the actual condition of certain classes and groups of human beings, suppressed or compelled a minor promise of fatal menace. It proposes that the knowledge given and the methods pursued in such institutions of learning shall be for the definite object of perpetuating present conditions or of leaving their amelioration in the hands of and at the initiative of other forces and other folk. This was the great criticism that those of us who fought for higher education of Negroes thirty years ago, brought against the industrial school.

37-7-113

25

(Continue The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

The industrial school founded itself and rightly upon the actual situation of American Negroes and said: "What can be done to change this situation?" And its answer was: "A training in technique and method such as would incorporate the disadvantaged group into the industrial organization of the country, and in that organization the leaders of the Negro ~~industrial~~ had perfect faith. Since that day the industrial machine has cracked and groaned. Its technique has changed faster than any school could teach; the relations of capital and labor have increased in complication and it has become so clear that Negro poverty is not primarily caused by ignorance of technical knowledge, that the industrial school has almost surrendered its program.

37-7-114

In opposition to that, the proponents of college training in those earlier years said: "What black men need is the broader and more universal training so that they can apply the general principles of knowledge to the particular circumstances of their condition."

26

Here again was indubitable truth but incomplete truth. The ~~cultural~~ technical problem lay in the method of teaching this broader and more universal truth and here just as in the ~~united~~ industrial program, we must start where we are and not where we wish to be.

37-7-115

As I said a few years ago at Howard University both these positions had something of truth and right. Because of the peculiar economic situation in our country the program of the industrial school came to grief first and has practically been given up. Starting even though we may with the actual condition of the Negro peasant and artisan, we cannot ameliorate his condition simply by learning ~~this~~ a trade which is like transient technique of a passing era. More vision and knowledge is needed than that. But on the other hand, while the Negro college of a generation

(25)

37-7-116

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

ago set down a defensible and true program of applying knowledge to and facts, it unfortunately could not completely carry it out, and it did not carry it out, because the one thing that the industrial philosophy gave to education, the Negro college did not take and that was that the university education of black men in the United States must be grounded in the condition and work of those black men.

On the other hand, it would be of course idiotic to say, as the former industrial philosophy almost said, that so far as most black men are concerned education must stop with this work. No, starting with present conditions and using the facts and the knowledge of the present situation of American Negroes, the Negro university expands toward the possession and the conquest of all knowledge. It seeks from a beginning of the history of the Negro in America and in Africa to interpret all history; from a beginning of social development among Negro slaves and freedmen in America and Negro tribes and kingdoms in Africa, to interpret and understand the social development of all mankind in all ages. It seeks to reach modern science of matter and life from the surroundings and habits and aptitudes of American Negroes and thus lead up to understanding of life and matter in the universe. And this is a different program than a similar function would be in a white university or in a Russian university or in an English university, because it stands from a different point, of one ground

(26)

37-7-117

It is a matter of beginnings and integrations which sweep instinctive knowledge and inheritance and current reactions into a universal world of science, sociology and art. In no other way can the American Negro College function. ~~in his wider human environment~~ It cannot begin with history & Negro Biology. It cannot start with Sociology & end with Negro Sociology

Why was it that the Renaissance of literature which began among Negroes ten years ago has never taken real and lasting root? It was because it was a transplanted and exotic thing. It was a literature written for the benefit of white people and at the behest of white readers, and re[illegible], and starting out humanly from the white point of view. It never had a real Negro constituency and it did not grow out of the inmost heart and frank experience of Negroes; [illegible] on such an artificial basis no real [illegible] literature can grow.

On the other hand, if starting in a great Negro university you have knowledge, beginning with the particular, and going out to universal comprehension and unhampered expression, you are going to begin to realize for the American Negro the full life which is denied him now. And then after that comes a realization of the older object of our college—to bring this universal culture down and apply it to the individual life and individual conditions of living Negroes. The university must become not simply a center of knowledge but a center of applied knowledge + a guide of action. And this is all the more necessary now since we easily see that planned action and especially in economic life, is going to be the watchword of civilization.

811-7-13

37-7-119

If the college does not thus root itself in the group life and afterward apply its knowledge and culture to actual living, other social organs must replace the college in this function. A strong, intelligent family life may adjust the student to higher culture; and too a social class may receive the graduate and induct him into life. This has happened & is happening among a minority of knowledge people. But it costs Society a fatal price.

It tends to hinder progress & hamper change — it makes Education, propaganda for things as they are. It leaves the mass of those without family name & without social standing — misfits and rebels who despise their education [i.e. uneducated in its meaning and application. The only college which stands for the progress of all — mass as well as aristocracy] functions in root and blossom [as well as in the overshadowing and heaven-filling tree

37-7-120

No system of learning — no university can be universal before it is German — French — Negro.
Grounded in inexorable fact and condition, in Poland, Italy, or elsewhere, it may seek the Universal & haply it may find it — and finding it bring it down to earth and us

37-7-121

37-7-122

We have imbibed from the surrounding white world a childish idea of Progress. Progress means bigger + better vessels always and forever. But there is no such rule of life. 9m 6000 years of human culture, the losses and retrogressions have been enormous. We have no assurance that 20th century civilization will survive. We do not know that American Negroes will survive. There are sinister signs about us, antecedent to + unconnected with the Great Depression.

The organized might of industry North & South is relegating the Negro & the edge of unrest and easy, him a labor reservoir on starvation wage. No decent professional class, no science, literature nor art comes on such a sub-soil. It is an insistent beseech-throated cry for rescue, guidance & organized advance that greets the black leader & day & the college that trains him has got to let him know at least as much about the great Black Miners strike in Alabama as about the Age of Pericles

37-7-123

37-7-137

By singular accident — almost by compelling fate, & drove by | as I came here yesterday | — the region where I taught a country school over 40 years ago. There is no Progress there. There is only space, loneliness & death | beside the same eternal hills. | There where first I heard the Sirens Songs are the graves of men & women and children who had the making of a fine intelligent upstanding Germany. There remains but the half starved farmer the casual laborer, the unpaid servant. Why | in a land rich with wealth, arms & colleges?

To the New Englander of wealth and family Harvard and Yale are halls & only halls of a broad training within the New England home begins and a Stile Sheet or Wall Street business ends. How fine & yet how fatal! Here lies root and reason for the [illegible] World War & Great Depression. To the American Negro / culture must adjust itself to a different family history & apply itself to a new system of Social caste & in this adjustment comes new opportunity / of making education and progress possible & not antagonistic

We are on the threshold of a new era. Let us not deceive ourselves with outworn ideals of wealth and servants and luxuries, reared on a foundation of ignorance, starvation and want. Instinctly, we have absorbed these ideals from our twisted white American environment. This new economic planning is not for us unless we do it. Unless the American Negro today, led by trained university men of broad vision, sits down to work out by economics and mathematics, by physics and chemistry, by history and sociology, exactly how and where he is to earn a living and how he is to establish a reasonable Life in the United States or elsewhere—unless this is done, the university has missed its field and function and the American Negro is doomed to be a suppressed and inferior caste in the United States for incalculable time.

37-7-124

Here, then, is a job for the American Negro university. It cannot

36

(Cont. The Field and Function of the American Negro College.)

be successfully ignored or dodged without the growing menace of disaster. I lay the problem before you as one which you must not ignore.

To carry out this plan, two things and only two things are necessary,—teachers and students. Buildings and endowments may help, but they are not indispensable necessary. It is necessary first to have teachers who comprehend this program and know how to make it live among their students. This is calling for a good deal, because it asks that teachers teach that which they have learned in no American school and which they never will learn until we have a Negro university of the sort that I am visioning. No teacher, black or white, who comes to a university like Fisk, filled simply with general ideas of human culture or general knowledge of disembodied science, is going to make a university of this school. Because a university is made of human beings, learning of the things they do not know from things they do know in their own lives. And secondly, we must have students. They must be chosen for ability to learn. There is always the temptation to assume that the children of privileged classes, the rich, the noble, the white, are those who can best take education. One has but to express this to realize its utter futility. But perhaps the most dangerous thing among us is for us, without thought to imitate our the white world and assume that we can choose students at Fisk because of the amount of money which their parents have happened to get hold of. That basis of selection is going to give us an extraordinary aggregation of fools. We want, by the nicest methods possible, to seek out the talented and the gifted among our constituency, quite regardless of their wealth or position, and to fill this university and similar institutions with persons who have got brains enough to take fullest advantage of what the university offers. There is no other way. With teachers who know what they are teaching and whom they are

37-7-125

37

37-7-126

38

(Cont. ~~The Field and Function of the American Negro College.~~)

teaching, and the life that surrounds both the knowledge and the knower, and with students who have the capacity and the will to absorb this knowledge, we can build the sort of Negro university which will emancipate not simply the black folk of the United States, but those white folk who in their effort to suppress Negroes have killed ~~democracy and art and religion.~~ their own culture —

37-7-127

~~Men~~ who in their desperate effort to replace equality with caste and to build inordinate wealth on a foundation of abject poverty have succeeded in killing democracy, art and religion.

Only a universal system of learning, rooted in the will and condition of the masses and blossoming from that manure up toward the stars is worth the name. Once builded it can only grow as it brings down sunlight and star shine and impregnates the mud.

The chief obstacle in this rich land endowed with every national resource and with the abilities of ~~one~~ a hundred different peoples, —

39

the chief and only obstacle to the coming of that kingdom of economic equality which is the only logical end of work, is the determination of the white world to keep the black world poor and make themselves rich. ~~And~~ The disaster which this selfish and short-sighted policy has brought, lies at the bottom of this present depression, and too, its cure lies beside it. Your clear vision of a world without wealth, of capital without profit, of income based on work alone, is the path out not only for you but for all men.

37-7-128

37-7-129

Is not this a program of segregation, emphasis of race and particularism as against national unity and universal humanity? It is and it is not by choice but by force; you do not get humanity by wishing it nor do you become American citizens simply because you want to. A Negro university from its high ground of unfaltering facing of the Truth, from its unblinking stare at hard facts does not advocate segregation by race, it simply accepts the bald fact that we are segregated, apart, hammered into a separate unity by spiritual intolerance and legal sanction backed by mob law, and that this separation is growing in strength and fixation; that it is worse today than a half century ago and that no character, address, culture or desert is going to change it in our day or for centuries to come. Recognizing this brute fact, groups of cultured, trained and devoted men gathering in great institutions of learning proceed to ask: What are we going to do about it? It is silly to ignore and gloss the truth; it is idiotic to proceed as though we were white or yellow, English or Russian. Here we stand. We are American Negroes. It is beside the point to ask whether we form a real race. Biologically we are mingled of all conceivable elements, but race is psychology, not biology; and psychologically we are a unified race with one history, one red memory and one revolt. It is not ours to argue whether we will be segregated or whether we ought to be a caste. We are segregated; we are a caste. This is our given and at present unalterable fact. Our problem is: How far and in what way can we consciously and scientifically guide our future so as to insure our physical survival, our spiritual freedom and our social growth? Either we do this or we die. There is no alternative. If America proposes the murder of this group, its moral descent into imbecility and crime and its utter loss of manhood, self-assertion and courage, the sooner we realize this the better. By that great line of McKay:

37-7-130

"If we must die, let it not be like hogs"

But the alternative of not dying like hogs is not that of dying or killing like snarling dogs. It is rather conquering this world by thought and brain and plan; by expression and organized cultural ideals. Therefore

37-7-131

43

~~"If we must die, let it not be like hogs."~~

37-7-132

~~Neither~~ not let us beat our futile wings in impotent frenzy, but carefully plan and guide our segregated life, organize in industry and politics to protect it and expand it and above all to give it unhampered spiritual expression in art and literature. It is the council of fear and cowardice to say ~~it~~ this cannot be done. What must be can ~~should~~ be and it is only a question of Science and Sacrifice to bring the great consumation. What that will be, none knows. It may be a great physical segregation of the world along the Color Line; it may be an economic rebirth which ensures spiritual and group integrity amid physical diversity. It may be utter annihilation of class and race and color barriers in one ultimate mankind, differentiated by talent, susceptibility and gift—but any of these ends are matters of long centuries and not years. We live in years, swift flying, transient years;. We hold the possible future in our hands but not by wish and will, only by thought, plan, knowledge and organization. If the college can pour into the coming age an American Negro who knows himself and his plight and how to protect himself and fight race prejudice, then the world of our dream will come and not otherwise.

43

37-7-133

The golden days are gone. Why do we wait
So long upon the marble steps, blood
Falling from our open wounds? and why
Do our black faces search the empty sky?
Is there something we have forgotten? some precious thing
We have lost, wandering in strange lands?

O still green water in a stagnant pool!
Love abandoned you and me alike.
There was a day you held a rich full moon
Upon your heart and listened to the words
Of men now dead and saw the angels fly.

37-7-138

What we have lost is the Courage of Independent Self assertion. We have had as our goal — American full citizenship, nationally recognized. This has failed — flatly & decisively failed. Very well. We're not dead yet We are not going to die. If we use our brains and strength there is no way to stop our ultimate triumph as creators of Modern Culture — if we use our strength & brains

And what may stop us — but our dumb Caution — our fear — our very sanity. Let us then be insane with courage.

37-7-139

Like a mad man's dream, there came
One fair, swift flash to me
Of distances, of sheets aflame,
With joy and agony
And further yet, a moon-lit sea
Foaming across its bars
And further yet, the infinity
Of wheeling suns and stars

Alaska — balance sent Miss Burton for cataloging

ALS, DS

37-7-134

[REVISION OF PAGES 40 ff OF THE NEGRO COLLEGE]

Is not this a program of segregation, emphasis of race and particularism as against national unity and universal humanity? It is and it is not by choice but by force you do not get humanity by wishing it nor do you become American citizens simply because you want to. A Negro university from its high ground of unfaltering facing of the truth, from its unblinking stare at hard facts does not advocate segregation by race, it simply accepts the bald fact that we are segregated, apart, hammered into a separate unity by spiritual intolerance and legal sanction backed by mob law and that this separation is growing in strength and fixation; that it is worse today than a half century ago and that no character, address, culture or desert is going to change it, in our day or for centuries to come. Recognizing this brute fact groups of cultured, trained and devoted men gathering in great institutions of learning proceed to ask: What are we going to do about it? It is silly to ignore and gloss the truth; it is idiotic to proceed as though we were white or yellow, English or Russian. Here we stand. We are American Negroes. It is beside the point to ask whether we form a real race. Biologically we are mingled of all conceivable elements, but race is psychology, not biology and psychologically we are a unified race with one history, one red memory and one revolt. It is not ours to argue whether we will be segregated or whether we ought to be a caste. We are segregated; we are a caste. This is our given and at present unalterable fact. Our problem is: How far and in what way can we consciously and scientifically guide our future so as to insure our physical survival, our spiritual freedom and our social growth? Either we do this or we die. There is no alternative. If America proposes the murder of this group, its moral descent into inbecility and crime and its utter loss of manhood, self-assertion and courage, the sooner we realize this the better. By that great line of McKay:

"If we must die, let it not be like hogs."

Neither let us beat our futile wings in impotent frenzy but carefully plan and guide our segregated life, organize in industry and politics to protect it and expand it and above all to give it unhampered spiritual expression in art and literature. It is the council of fear and cowardice to say it cannot be done. What must be should be and it is only a question of Science and Sacrifice to bring the great consumation. What that will be none knows. It may be a great physical segregation of the world along the Color Line; it may be an economic rebirth which ensures spiritual and group integrity amid physical diversity. It may be utter annihilation of class and race and color barriers in one ultimate mankind differentiated by talent, susceptibility and gift—but any of these ends are matters of long centuries and not years. We live in years, swift flying, transcient years;. We hold the possible future in our hands but not by wish and will, only by thought, plan, knowledge and organization. If the college can pour into the coming age an American Negro who knows himself and his plight and how to protect himself and fight race prejudice, then the world of our dream will come and not otherwise.

The golden days are gone. Why do we wait
So long upon the marble steps, blood
Falling from our open wounds? and why
Do our black faces search the empty sky?
Is there something we have forgotten? some precious thing
We have lost, wandering in strange lands?

O still green water in a stagnant pool!
Love abandoned you and me alike.
There was a day you held a rich full moon
Upon your heart and listened to the words
Of men now dead and saw the angels fly.

Tallahassee
1934

THE NEGRO COLLEGE AND THE NEGRO VOTER

At Howard University, sometime ago, I tried to speak of the general relation between Education and Work, especially with regard to the American Negro. At Fisk University, last commencement, I spoke of the Scope and Function of the Negro university. My address, today, is the third in this series, and I am seeking to begin a survey of the relation of the Negro college to the community.

I am speaking, therefore, on "The Negro College and the Negro Voter".

First, a word as to our current political thought. I note that more and more, not only in America, but in Europe, we are assuming a certain fatalistic attitude toward the future, and openly saying that, for salvation, modern governments must embrace either Fascismo or Communism. In this choice, we are apparently not thinking so much of the ultimate objects of these system of government, but rather of the method by which any object of government must be attained. And we are asserting, in effect, that either to a dictator or the rule of the mob, the world must look for guidance.

37-8-2

It seems to me that we are forgetting here the basic object which any change of government must have. Today, that basic object has got to be greater economic justice for mankind, a more reasoned plan of production and distribution of income. The attainment of such an object is so difficult, and meets and will meet such organized and determined opposition, that we assume that only extraordinary methods of government will bring it about.

I am not disputing the truth of this assumption, but I am saying that if this change is brought about, and whether it's brought about by a single despot or the dictatorship of the proletariat, back of it, ultimately, must stand the last court of ultimate appeal; the will of the people. From this ultimate authority, we can never escape. It is true that it may be difficult, on account of ignorance or force, to know this will, or to have it intelligently expressed. But, nevertheless, so far as it can gain free expression, it must be the ultimate source of authority; and this is the inescapable and eternal argument for democracy.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

We have gone through many arguments and phases of argument as to the possibility of obtaining effective expression of public opinion. The New England town meeting put great stress on direct experience and personal knowledge, on learning by doing. I have seen the pure democracy of a New England village function, and obtain an expression of the public will, which usually, and in the long run, was forceful and effective. It was not free from the domination of property, and it was backed by a public school system with compulsory attendance. For a long time, we stressed popular education for the whole country, saying that whatever shortcomings democracy might have, and how difficult the public will found self expression, nevertheless, universal education would, in the long run, correct that.

37-8-3

Lately, we have either changed our minds, or education does not appeal to us as really efficacious. We do not place today the dependence upon universal education which we used to, and we do not do this chiefly because the experiment of the universal training of the people in intelligence has not been as sincerely or widely tried in this land as we used to plan. The thing that astonishes us today is the crass stupidity of the mass of people, even in culture lands.

Recognizing this, we have in our day begun some experiments in the education of adults, realizing that the few years which lie between teaching children to read, write and count; and sending them into active life, is not enough to give them a sufficient acquaintance with the world; and that their education must go on through life if they are to be intelligent citizens, who can comprehend the great body of knowledge which the world is inaugurating.

I saw, recently, in Des Moines, Iowa, what is probably the finest experiment in adult education that this country knows; where one-third of the population of a city had been reached by actual and intelligent tutelage. But this is hardly a drop in the bucket. It is but one experiment, with one group of a 100,000 out of 120,000,000 of people.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Back of all this, and more or less confidently, we have been depending upon the colleges to guide public opinion by injecting in to our citizenship, continual doses of liberally educated men. The effect of this has been felt, but here again not as widely as we had hoped. Because the broad culture program of the colleges has been narrowed by the demandsof vocational training, particularly in its professional branches; and because the college has been so dominated by property interests and class ideals, that its objects have often become the building of an aristocracy of intelligence or wealth, whose aims and ideals are not in accord with and have not the best interests of the great masses of men.

37-8-4

All this, then; democracy by experience, universal public school education, adult education and college training, has left a wide gap, which as nations, like America, have grown in responsibilities and intricacies of their social problems, have had recourse to what we have grown to call "propaganda".

We mean by propaganda, an artificial stirring up of public opinion, in rapid tempo, for the accomplishment of certain specific ends, for bringing sudden and overwhelming decisions. The great example of this, the use of it which still leaves us cold with astonishment, was the propaganda which put the United States into the World War, just at the time when with wide enthusiasm, we had elected a man President, because he had "kept us out of war."!

The reason that a thing like this disturbs us, is because we recognize that whoever is, at any particular time, master of the instruments of propaganda, may be master of the nation, and this, of course, may be either for good or for evil. It has in our day raised to power simultaneously Stalin and Mussilini; Hitler and Franklin Roosevelt; MacDonald and Dumergue.

The instruments of propaganda, especially in a great country, are today tremendous and costly, and involve a control of capital and power which is impossiblefor small groups, for new thinkers, for essential minorities. The great newspapers, the radio, the moving picture, the telegraph and cable system, all make it practically impossible that the unknown prophet with a new thought and a great idea can obtain hearing; nor can the ordinary minority become a majority unless the nation practically commits suicide.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Turning, now, more specifically to the United States. This is a country, more than any in the world, that based its very existence on democracy; on the theory that the governed must have voice in their own government. I think we have almost forgotten how radical and even dangerous an experiment that was, and how little faith even leading Americans had in the possibility of its accomplishment. Nor did we fail to say, even in earlier times, that mere political democracy was not enough. We held, what I have called, the great American Assumption; namely, that every American who was willing to work, and had the sacrifice to save, could achieve a sufficient income to satisfy his legitimate wants and possible ambitions. This American Assumption was curiously justified by the facts in the case of thousands, and even millions of native-born Americans and of immigrants, and its truth made the guardian dictatorship of wealth seem natural and justifiable. But it was crassly contradicted by the plight of the black slave; and perhaps we have not stressed enough the cold logic that was back of abolition, which possibly in the long run had more weight than either sentiment or politics.

Certainly, we do not realize just what, in economic phrase, the emancipation and enfranchisement of the Negro meant. It has often been called a revolution, but an unsuccessful revolution; and the very fact that it was called unsuccessful, means that people are speaking mainly of its political and sentimental aspects, and not of its economic truth.

What we did in nine years, from 1867-1876, was to seek to put in power in the South, a dictatorship of labor, and mainly of black labor, and to enable that labor, with a backing of military force, to start an economic revolution in the South, with regard to land, with regard to education, with regard to civil and social uplift. It was an extraordinary undertaking; and its racial aspects were only important as they affected the economic struggle, and enabled this struggle to be obscured behind theories of biology.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

The result of this attempt was a large success in public education; some little success in the distribution of land, and less success in social uplift. It ended in a counter-attack of property, which overthrew the dictatorship of labor, and made dominate in the South after the war, as before the war, the interests of Property. Only, because of war, the holders of property began to change from the planters to former poor whites; and property gained new objectives and new methods through alliance with Northern capitalism.

37-8-6

All this, as I have said, was obscured by a frantic racial propaganda, so that the poor whites saw social and economic salvation in cutting themselves off from the labor dictatorship, helping to destroy their own voting power, and allying themselves with the new capitalism.

It was just at this point, and in the year 1895, there came to distinct expression of a new position in the relation of the American Negro to the American government. It was voiced by Booker T. Washington at Atlanta, but it had been preparing for nearly twenty years; and it was in effect, that American Negroes should give up all attempts to gain their desires through voting; while on the other hand, Northern and Southern capital should guarantee them employment, according to their ability and training, in the new industrial organization. It was a proposal which demanded deep and conscientious examination. Here was a mass of folk, but a generation removed from slavery, with little technical skill, without social organization, and bowed under widespread ignorance. Yet, they lived in a country whose unexampled industrial advance was foreshadowed by a post-war development which has been the astonishment of the world.

In this new organization, Negroes were promised a secure economic foothold, on condition that they should not attempt to use their political power in order to govern the land or any part of it. With this proposal went a less explicit but just as important treaty with white labor, in which the field of labor, particularly in the South, was divided in white and colored areas; there were wide fields of over-lapping, and competition; nevertheless, in general, the Negro was to be the common and semi-skilled laborer, and the white man, the skilled laborer, and white-collar worker. Competition between races in the field of skilled labor would grow, but the advantage would go, theoretically, to the better skilled man, and practically, to the man who could work for lower wages.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

This situation and this general theory, with increased protests on the part of Negroes, continued up into the time of the world war, when unusual demand for labor, and unusual demand for soldiers, opened the way for a great influx of black labor into the North and a new alignment. There ensued the Great Depression, when the bargain of 1895 was broken, and had to be broken. Not only could there be no guarantee of employment for Negroes, but none for white men. Not only could there be no division of work into white men's and colored men's jobs, but all along the line there began a life and death struggle for any job at any wage.

37-8-7

Through all this change and turmoil, what has been the attitude of the Negro college? Certainly, it has assumed no leadership. In the earlier years, from 1895 down through the first decade of the 20th Century, the attitude was "Hands off!" The Negro colleges, officially, and in their courses of study, simply did not touch the political problem. They taught, in effect, so far as they taught anything on the subject, that Reconstruction had been a failure; and that politics was not a career for educated Negroes. A generation of educated colored men grew up, therefore, who not only knew nothing practically about government and voting, but who taught tens of thousands of their pupils that no knowledge and participation in politics was necessary for success.

Since that time, and in our own day, what is the Negro college doing to guide the Negro voter, and what should it do?

For the purposes of this paper, I have sent out a very short questionnaire to twenty of the Negro colleges. Wilberforce and Hampton, after a repeated request, have declined to answer. Of the other eighteen colleges, not a single one had a course entirely devoted to Negro citizenship and enfranchisement.

Most of the colleges touched the matter, more or less incidentally.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, says: "The subject is fully treated in the course on race relations." It could not be fully treated in a course on race relations, unless the course touched on very little else.

Fisk University has a one-term course on the Negro in America, and another course on government. These give incidental treatment.

Morgan College has a course in Negro History every alternate year, "including special aspects of the franchise." It also has a course on American Government.

37-8-8

Talladega treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in Social Science.

West Virginia State, in three courses, places "much emphasis on the rights and duties of Negroes in politics."

Knoxville College treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in American Government.

Shaw University gives incidental treatment in the courses in American Government and American History.

Howard University, in courses on Political Science, Government and Political Parties, seeks "to relate the peculiar problems effecting the Negro to the broad problemsof government."

Livingston College has courses on Political Science, Social Science, and American Race Problems, which treat the ballot incidentally.

Virginia State College has an introductory course in American Gowernment, which places "considerable emphasis on Negro citizenship and voting."

Johnson C. Smith University, in el ven courses in Government, History, Psychology and Literature, treats the Negro vote incidentally.

Straight College has three courses in History and Government, with incidental treatment.

Virginia Union University has three courses in Political Science and Sociology and Negro History, with incidental treatment.

Wiley College has incidental treatment in several courses, although her professor on Political Science is on study leave for the year.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Spelman College has incidental treatment in the courses in government and Negro History.

Tuskegee, in the course on American Government and Politics, lays "a great deal of stress upon citizenship and voting, and the necessity of the Negroes exercising the franchise." There is incidental treatment in other courses, and in the elementary school, a model village with a charter, and elected officials designed for training in citizenship.

In Bishop College, there is incidental treatment in two courses.

Morehouse College puts specific stress on citizenship and voting in a course in Negro History. Incidental treatment comes in three other courses.

37-8-9

In general, we may say, that in the Negro colleges of the United States, not a single college has a specific course on Negro citizenship and voting, including, as such a course should, the history of the Negro citizen and the franchise in early colonial days; the treatment of the matter of citizenship and civil rights by the state and Federal Courts; the history of the Reconstruction Acts of 1867, and the adoption of the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments; the history of the Negro's participation in government during Reconstruction times; the theory and practice of disfranchisement; the present requirements for voting, and the extent and duty of voting.

Manifestly, here is material enough for a year's regular course in any college. To treat it in a single semester, would be a large accomplishment; and to try to treat it with anything like clarity and fullness, as the incidental work of a course in Negro History or in American Government, would be simply impossible.

The reason for this attitude, is, naturally, clear. It is a hang-over from the past. It is the remains of the idea that politics is disgraceful business, at any rate, for Negroes; and that idea has been industriously spread by those who do not believe in democracy in America for either white people or colored.

And then, of course, there has come the tremendous propaganda since 1895,

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

which has made many educated Negroes ashamed of even wanting to vote. The time has come when this must all be changed. If the government of America, and the governments of the world, are to be reconstructed after the Depression on a new basis, there is only one guarantee that the new government is going to envisage the rights and needs of all classes; and that guarantee is the insuring that all classes have the opportunity intelligently to express themselves. With the present state of the public schools in America, not to mention the Negro public schools, such chance for intelligent expression on the part of the mass, is very small. We are, therefore, thrown back upon learning government by actually participating in it, upon adult education, and upon the colleges.

37-8-10

The insistent duty before the Negro college is to see to it that no man is graduated who does not have a clear idea of the fundamental doctrine of democratic government. In addition to this, he should know how this government is carried on; and not simply how the national government is carriedon, or what the political theory is of the state and local governments. He should know the actual condition of state, county, city and township government in the Southern states, and particularly in the state where the college is situated. No such knowledge is today available in the average Southern college, white or black. The plight of local government, and the ignorance about it, is astonishing. It can never be reformed or be made reasonably decent, until there is a concerted attempt to know its actual condition.

And finally, college-bred men, who know the facts concerning Negro citizenship, and the right to vote, must be put in charge, and put themselves in charge of that propaganda which is directing the part that Negroes take in American government. Nothing is more important than this. That intelligent leadership can not be surrendered to enthusiastic young Communists, who do not know and cannot know, the history and plight of the American Negro. They may be, and they often are, honest, enthusiastic, and well-meaning people. But they have got to listen to the wisdom and experience of American Negroes before they can attack the Negro's problem.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Out problem is not the classic set-up of the European laboring class; it is not analogous to the Jewish problem in Russia; it has no remote resemblance to labor problemsin France, and it differs by a world from Asia and Africa.

On the other hand, those trained Negroes who propose to solve this problem, cannot settle back into reaction under leadship dominated by capitalistic ideals. They have got to get it through their heads that the present organization of industry is not only going to be changed,—that it is already changing; that there is no automatic way by which the Negro is going to find and take a part in this change; that this change is not a matter outside of government—that it is in the very core of the new governmental organization; that economic and social emancipation is bound up with government, and government depends upon the will of the people.

37-8-11

There is no denial of that ultimate authority, when the people will that their desires be executed by a single man. There is no denial of democracy, when they delegate their power to a group or even a class. But there is denial of democracy when these elected representatives of a people do what that people do not want done.

It has been our mistake in the theory of government in the past, to suppose with the thinkers of a simpler age, that anybody can do anything; that any chance fool can be elected Senator, Governor or President, and accomplish well the work of those most difficult offices. More and more in the future, we are going to choose the trained executive, not for his hand-shaking power, and friendly smile, but for his ability and knowledge; and in this new method and object of government, if the Negro, through the college, is not trained to take an important and decisive part, then the Negro college is missing one of its greatest opportunities, and one of its most important functions.

1934

THE NEGRO COLLEGE AND THE NEGRO VOTER

At Howard University, sometime ago, I tried to speak of the general relation between Education and Work, especially with regard to the American Negro. At Fisk University, last commencement, I spoke of the Scope and Function of the Negro university. My address, today, is the third in this series, and I am seeking to begin a survey of the relation of the Negro college to the community.

I am speaking, therefore, on "The Negro College and the Negro Voter", which is a more specific phrasing of the general subject --"America and the Negro citizen".

First, a word as to our current political thought. I note that more and more, not only in America, but in Europe, we are assuming a certain fatalistic attitude toward the future; and openly saying that, for salvation, modern governments must embrace either Fascismo or Cummunism. In this choice, we are apparently not thinking so much of the ultimate objects of these systems of government, but rather of the method by which any object of government must be attained. And we are asserting, in effect, that either to a dictator or the rule of the mob, the world must look for guidance.

47-8-53

It seems to me that we are forgetting here that the kernel of the matter here is the basic object of change and not the method. Today, that basic object has got to be, greater economic justice for mankind; a more reasoned plan of production and distribution of income. The attainment of such an object is so difficult, and meets and will meet such organized traditional and determined opposition, that we therefore assume that only extraordinary methods of government will bring it about.

I am not disputing the truth of this assumption, but I am saying that if this change is brought about, and whether its' brought about by a single despot or the dictatorship of the proletariat, back of it, ultimately, must stand the last court of ultimate appeal; the will of the people. From this ultimate authority, we can never escape. It is true that it may be difficult, on account of ignorance or force, to know this will; or to have it intelligently expressed. But, nevertheless, its expression, must be the ultimate source of authority; and this is the inescapable and eternal argument for democracy.

We have gone through many arguments and phases of argument as to the possibility of obtaining effective expression of intelligent public opinion. The New England town meeting put great stress on direct experience and personal knowledge, on learning by doing. I have seen the pure democracy of a New England village function, and obtain an expression of the public will, which usually, and in the long run, was forceful and effective. It was not free from the domination of property, but it was backed by a public school system with compulsory attendance. For a long time, we saw here ultimate solution and we stressed popular education for the whole country, saying that whatever shortcomings democracy might have, and however difficult the public will found expression, nevertheless, universal education would, in the long run, correct all that.

47-8-25

Lately, we have either changed our minds, or education does not appeal to us as really efficacious. We do not place today the dependence upon universal education which we used to, and we do not do this cheifly because the experiment of the universal training of the people in intelligence has not been as sincerely or widely tried in this land as we used to plan. The thing that astonishes us today is the crass stupidity of the mass of people, even in culture lands.

Recognizing this, we have in our day begun some experiments in the education of adults, realizing that the few years which lie between children to read, write and count; and sending them into active life, are not enough to give them a sufficient acquaintance with the world; and that their education must go on through life, if they are to be intelligent citizens, who can comprehend the great body of knowledge which the world is accumulating.

I saw, recently, in Des Moines, Iowa, what is probably the finest experiment in adult education that this country knows; where one-third of the population of a city had been reached by actual and intelligent tutelage. But this is hardly a drop in the bucket. It is but one experiment, with one group of a 100,000 out of 120,000,000 of people.

Back of all this, and more or less confidently, we have been depending upon the colleges to guide public opinion by injecting into our citizenship, continual doses of liberally educated men. The effect of this has been felt, but here again not as widely as we had hoped, because the broad culture program of the colleges has been narrowed by the demands of vocational training, particularly in its professional branches; and because the college has been so dominated by property interests and class ideals, that its objects have often become the building of an aristocracy of intelligence or wealth, whose aims and ideals are not in accord with and have not the best interests of the great masses of men.

47-8-67

All this, then; democracy by experience, universal public school education, adult education and college training, have left a wide gap, which, as nations, have grown in responsibilities and intricacies of their social problems, have induced us to have recourse to what we call "propaganda".

We mean by propaganda, an artificial stirring up of public opinion, in rapid tempo, for the accomplishment of certain specific ends, for bringing sudden and overwhelming decisions. The great example of this, the use of it which still leaves us cold with astonishment, was the propaganda which put the United States into the World War, just at the time when, with wide enthusiasm, we had elected a man President, specifically because he had "kept us out of war!"

An experience like this disturbs us, becuase we recognize that whoever is, at any particular time, master of the instruments of propaganda, may be master of the nation, and this, of course, may be either for good or for evil. It has in our day raised to power simultaneously Stalin and Mussolini; Hitler, Franklin Roosevelt; and MacDonald.

The instruments of propaganda, especially in a great country, are today tremendous and costly, and involve a control of capital and power which is impossible for small groups, for new thinkers, for essential minorities. The great newspapers, the special correspondents, the radio, the moving picture, the telegraph and cable system, all make it practically impossible that the unknown prophet with a new thought and a great idea can obtain hearing; nor can the ordinary minority become a majority unless the nation practically commits suicide.

Turning, now, more specifically to the United States. This is a country, more than any in the world, that based its very existence on democracy; on the theory that the governed must have voice in their own governemtn. I think we have almost forgotten how radical and even dangerous an experiment this was in the 18th century and how little faith even certain leading Americans had in the possibility of its accomplishment.

47-8-58

Yet we did not fail to say, even in earlier times, that mere political democracy choosing officials and settling broad objectives now and then was enough. We held, beyond this, what I have called, the great American Assumption; namely, that every American who was willing to work, and had the sacrifice to save, could achieve a sufficient income to satisfy his legitimate wants and possible ambitions. Thus anarchical but anatomatically beneficient economic forces were to complete and fulfill democracy. This American Assumption was curiously justified by the facts in the case of thousands, and even millions of native-born Americans and of immigrants before the Civil War, and its truth made the evident guardian dictatorship of wealth in politics seem natural and justifiable since all free Americans might become rich. But it was crassly contradicted by the plight of the black slave; and perhaps we have not stressed enough hitherto the cold logic that was back of abolition, which possibly in the long run had more weight than either sentiment or politics.

The Negro must be free in order to justify and prove American Democracy. If with freedom and the vote, he nevertheless sank to the bottom, this was at once proof of the perfection of our political system and demonstrative of the inferiority of the Negro.

The suppressed minor premise here was that the American Assumption of possible wealth for thrifty labor would apply automatically to the freed slave and also that it applied to the white worker after the Civil War.

Emancipation and enfranchisement of the Negro have frequently been called a political revolution which was unsuccessful; but in the same breath it has been viewed as a successful economic revolution, just as though these two realms were mutually exclusive and separate. They were in truth aspects of the same vast social change and no economic triumph could result from complete political failure, any more than the new methods of government could succeed without new methods of work and dividion of income.

47-8-59

Certainly, we do not realize just what, in economic phrase, the emancipation and enfranchisement of the Negro meant. It has often been called a revolution, but an unsuccessful revolution; and the very fact that it was called unsuccessful, means that people are speaking mainly of its political and sentimental aspects, and not of its economic truth.

What we did in nine years, from 1867-1876, was to put in power in the South, a dictatorship of labor, and mainly of black labor, and to enable that labor, with a backing of military force, to start an economic revolution in the South, with regard to land, with regard to education, with regard to civil and social uplift. It was an extraordinary undertaking; and its racial aspects were only important as they affected the economic struggle, and enabled this struggle to be obscured and widely misapprehended behind theories of biology.

The result of this attempt was a large success in public education; some success in the distribution of land, and less success in social uplift. It ended in a counter-attack of property, which overthrew the dictatorship of labor, and made dominant in the South after the war, as before the war, the interests of Property without the traditional American corrective of political democracy and free opportunity for thrift. Also, because of war, the holders of property began to change from the planters to former poor whites; and property gained new objectives and new methods through alliance with triumphant Northern capitalism.

All this, as I have said, was obscured by a frantic racial propaganda, so that the porr whites saw social and economic salvation in cutting themselves off from the interests of the labor class and helping to destroy its voting power; and by allying themselves with the new capitalism as its serfs and voting tools.

47-8-20

This new situation had to be brought into apparent and legal agreement with American democracy and American economic life. This transformation took the form of disfranchisement and not simply, as Americans assume and colleges teach, the disfranchisement of Negroes but of the laboring class in America and the establishment in the nation of a dictatorship of corporate wealth, so vast and complete that its power from 1880 to our day has never been successfully challenged. The revolution now on us is an attempt to see if this rule of property can be dislodged in America.

The methods of establishing the Dictatorship of Wealth in the north has been studied under the subjects of trusts and monopolies, consolidation of corporations, the growing role of banking and finance, international trade and international capital; and, coincident with this, the growth of poverty, the labor movement, unions and strikes, charity and relief.

But the part of this same movement as it affects the Negro has been artificially isolated and treated as a peculiar "race problem." In truth, the history of the Negro from the time he was driven from the polls by force in 1876, and the speech of Booker T. Washington in Atlanta twenty years later, was the careful building of a situation by which black labor in America was compelled by law, custom and prejudice, to choose between any attempt to exercize political rights, and a chance to earn a living by either under-bidding white labor or at least keeping American labor from violently raising its wage.

White labor cut off its own nose by refusing to let black labor raise its wage to normal standards through unionzation. While black labor consented first through force and brank and then by voluntary treaty, to giving up its own political power and placing it in the hands of Southern capital and land monopoly. But Southern capital was dominated by Northern capital and thus the rule of wealth in the nation was made unassailable by the 131 electoral votes of the Solid South.

4/7-8-01

The first open acceptance of this new alignment came in the year 1895, in a distinct expression of a new position in the relation of the American Negro to the American government. It was voiced by Booker T. Washington at Atlanta, but it had been preparing for twenty years; and it was in effect, that American Negroes should give up all attempts to gain their desires through voting; while on the other hand, Capital should guarantee them employment, according to their ability and training, in the new industrial organization. It was a proposal which demanded deep and conscientious examination. Here was a mass of folk, but a generation removed from slavery, with little technical skill, without social organization, and bowed under widespread ignorance.

Yet, they lived in a country whose unexampled industrial advance was foreshadowed by a post-war development which has been the astonishment of the world.

In this new organization, Negroes were promised a secure economic foothold, on condition that they should not attempt to use their political power in order to govern the land or any part of it. With this proposal went a less explicit but just as important treaty with white labor, in which the field of labor, particularly in the South, was divided in white and colored areas; there were wide fields of over-lapping, and competition; nevertheless, in general, the Negro was to be the common and semi-skilled laborer, and the white man, the skilled laborer, and white-collar worker. Competitition between races in the field of skilled labor would grow, but the advantage would go, theoretically, to the better skilled man, and practically, to the man who could work for lower wages.

This situation and this general theory, with increased protests on the part of Negroes, continued up into the time of the world war, when unusual demand for labor, and unusual demand for soldiers, opened the way for a great influx of black labor into the North, and a sudden challenge to the compromise of 1895. In the North the Negro began to vote, but with no clear objectives or obvious reasons, being just as muddled and unguided as white labor. Organised white skilled labor stuck to capital and voted with it and with it exploited common labor white and black, until radical revolt began the present undermining and re-allignment of the labor movements.

While in the South there continued the suppression of the Negro vote, the nullification of the white labor vote and the solid bloc of 131 electoral votes at the disposal of capital came now the Great Depression, when the bargain of 1895 was broken, and had to be broken. Not only could there be no guarantee of employment for Negroes, but none for white men. Not only could there be no division of work into white men's and colored men's jobs, but all along the line there began a life and death struggle for any job at any wage.

47-8-92

Through all this change and turmoil, what has been the attitude of the Negro college? Certainly, it has assumed no leadership. In the earlier years, from 1895, down through the first decade of the 20th Century, the attitude was "Hands off!" The Negro colleges, officially, and in their courses of study, simply did not touch the political problem nor the essential labor problem. They taught, in effect, so far as they taught anything on the subject, that Reconstruction had been a complete failure; that politics was not a career for educated and honest Negroes. A generation of cultured colored leaders grew up, therefore, who not only knew nothing practically about government and voting, but who taught tens of thousands of their pupils that no knowledge and participation in politics was necessary for success or affected economic development.

Since that time, and in our own day, what is the Negro college doing to guide the Negro voter, and what should it do?

47-8-63

For the purposes of this paper, I have sent out a very short questionnaire to twenty of the Negro colleges. Wilberforece and Hampton, after repeated request, have declined to answer. Of the other eighteen colleges, not a single one had a course of an entire semester devoted to Negro citizenship and enfranchisement.

Most of the colleges touched the matter, more or less incidentally.

Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, says: "The subject is fully treated in the course on race relations." It could not be fully treated in a course on race relations, unless the course touched on very little else.

Fisk University has a one-term course on the Negro in America, and another course on government. These give incidental treatment.

Morgan College has a course in Negro History every alternate year, "including special aspects of the franchise." It also has a course on American Government.

Talladega treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in Social Science.

West Virginia State, in three courses, places "much emphasis on the rights and duties of Negroes in politics."

Knoxville College, treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in American Government.

Shaw University gives incidental treatment in the courses in American Government and American History.

Howard University, in courses on Political Science, Government and Political Parties, seeks "to relate the peculiar problems effecting the Negro to the broad problems of government."

Livingston College has courses on Political Science, Social Science, and American Race Problems, which treat the ballot incidentally.

Virginia State College has an introductory course in American Government, which places "considerable emphasis on Negro citizenship and voting."

Johnson C. Smith University, in several courses in Government, History, Psychology and Literature, treats the Negro vote incidentally.

Straight College has three courses in History and Government, with incidental treatment.

Virginia Union University has three courses in Political Science and Sociology and Negro History, with incidental treatment.

Wiley College has incidental treatmant in several courses, although her professor of Political Science is on study-leave for the year.

At Spelman, Morehouse, Morris Brown and Clark, in the course of Negro History, one week is devoted to a discussion of the political disabilities from which Negroes suffer, particularly in the South, and what remedies may be adopted in order to gain for them fuller participation in voting.

47-80-64

Tuskegee, in the course on American Government and Politics, lays "a great deal of stress upon citizenship and voting, and the necessity of the Negroes exercising the franchise." There is incidental treatmant in other courses, and in the elementary school, a model village with a charter, and elected officials designed for training in citizenship.

In Bishop College, there is incidental treatment in two courses.

In general, we may say, that in the Negro colleges of the United States, not a single college has a specific course on Negro citizenship and voting.

To prove this, let us consider what a course of this sort should cover; and outlining this course I am giving a specific instance of what I mean by Negro education as contrasted with white American education; of the function of a Negro University as differing from that of an American university.

A course on the "Negro citizen and Voter" should begin with the legal status of the Negro in America in the 15th century, stressing the fact that all Negroes were not slaves and all slaves were not Negroes and that black freemen were recognized as freement in every country of the New World and every colony among the 13 which formed the United States.

Secondly, in colonial history during the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries the civil voting rights of Negroes in each colony and in the British West Indies and in English law should be traced, together with a glance at French and Spanish and Dutch law as it affected the United States. The exercise of the right to vote in all the colonies should be stressed, the ownership of property and the conditions of black labor.

Thirdly, the abolition and free soil controversy should be traced through the activities of black citizens and voters and the white labor vote.

Fourthly, voting and citizenship of Negroes during the civil war should be followed.

Fifthly, above all the current distortions and falsifications of known facts during Reconstruction deserve a whole semester of work. In every single slave state there should be a study of the conventions and constitutions and the new legislation, 1865-1870; the Negro voters and leaders, the Social and economic changes; in the Border states this matter is equally interesting and forgotten; in the North the Negro vote and officials, the state and national conventions, the great Negro labor movement, the civil rights and suffrage laws, the history of the 13th, 14th, and 15th amendments - all should occupy a considerable space of time.

47-8-65

Lastly, from 1876 to 1914 should come a study of disfranchisement by states and of legal and practical efforts to maintain the right of Negroes to vote and of the duty to vote not simply as Negroes but as saviors of Democracy in America.

Manifestly here is no"incidental" work. No single week nor single semester of study will cover it. Of course much here outlined is treated more or less fully in courses in History, Government, Economics and Sociology. But enough of this matter ought to be segregated by every Negro college in a course of two semesters concentrating and emphasizing Negro citizenship and the right to vote as a fundamental problem of democracy.

Here is material enough for a year's regular course in any college. To treat it in a single semester, would be a large accomplishment; and to try to treat it with anything like clarity and fullness, as the incidently work of a course in Negro History or in American Government, would be simply impossible.

The past reasons for this attitude of neglect are, naturally, clear. It is a hang-over from the past. It is the remains of the idea that politics is disgraceful business, at any rate, for Negroes; and that idea has been industriously spread by those who do not believe in democracy in America for either white people or colored.

And then, of course, there has come the tremendous propaganda since 1895, which has made many educated Negroes ashamed of even wanting to vote. The time has come when this must all be changed. If the government of America, and the governments of the world, are to be reconstructed after the Depression on a new basis, there is only one guarantee that the new government is going to envisage the rights and needs of all classes; and that guarantee is the insuring that all classes have the opportunity intelligently to express themselves and evaluate their needs. With the present state of public schools in America, not to mention the Negro public schools, such chance for intelligent knowledge and expression on the part of the mass, is very small. We are, therefore, thrown back upon learning government by actually participating in it, upon adult education, and upon the colleges.

47-8-46

The insistent duty before the Negro college is to see to it that no man is graduated who does not have a clear idea of the fundamental doctrine of democratic government. In addition to this, he should know howthis government is carried on; and not simply how the national government is carried on, or what the political theory is of the state and local governments. He should know the actual condition of state, county, city and township government in the Southern states, and particularly in the state where the college is situated. No such knowledge is today available in the average Southern college, white or black. The plight of local government, and the ignorance about it, is astonishing. It can never be reformed or be made reasonably decent, until there is a concerted attempt to know its actual condition.

4-7-8-47

And finally, college-bred men, who know the facts concerning Negro citizenship, and the right to vote, must be put in charge, and put themselves in charge of that propaganda which is directing the part that Negroes take in American government. Nothing is more important than this. That intelligent leadership can not be surrendered to enthusiastic young Communists, who do not know and cannot know, the history and plight of the American Negro. They may,be, and they often are, honest, enthusiastic, and well-meaning people. But they have got to listen to the wisdom and experience of American Negroes before they can attack the Negro's problem.

Our problem is not the classic set-up of the European laboring class; it is not analagous to the Jewish problem in Russia and the Balkans; it has only remote resemblances to labor problems in France and England, and it differs by a world from Asia and Africa.

On the other hand, those trained Negroes who propose to solve this problem, cannot settle back into reaction under leadership dominated by capitalistic ideals. They have got to get it through their heads that the present organization of industry is not only going to be changed, - that it is already changing; that there is no automatic way by which the Negro is going to find and take a part in this change; that this change is not a matter outside of government - that it is in the very essence and care of the new governmental organization; that economic and social emancipation is bound up with government, and that government ultimately depends upon the will of the people.

There is no denial of that ultimate authority, when the people will, that their desires shall be executed by a single man. There is no denial of democracy when they delegate their power to a group or even a class. But there is a denial of democracy when elected representatives of a people do what that people do not want done and do not need.

It has been our mistake in the theory of government in the past, to suppose with the thinkers of a simpler age, that anybody can do anything; that any chance fool can be elected Senator, Governor or President, and accomplish well the work of those most difficult offices. More and more in the future, we are going to choose the trained executive, not for his hand-shaking power, and friendly smile, but for his ability and knowledge; and in this new method and object of government, if the Negro, through the college, is not trained to take an important and decisive part, then the Negro college is missing one of its greatest opportunities, and one of its most important functions.

Finally, there is one obvious criticism of this paper and that is where are the available text books upon which the course of study which I advocate may be based? The answer is obvious: there are none. The course must be taught at first from prepared manuscript material and library research and assignments

Interchange of matter between colored colleges and a modest standard collection of books, together with a few cheap reprints would easily furnish forth a good college course. Much of the space in our various college periodicals now devoted to stuff of doubtful value, could be used for printing necessary leaflets and even text books.

This is what I mean by Negro education in Negro colleges; I admit it may easily go the way of all the earth and flounder in the morass of cheap self glorification and lies to keep our courage up -- but with the example of the world before us, surely we have terrible and sufficient warning.

47-8-69

Talladega Speech 1934 Du Bois

37-8-89

THE NEGRO COLLEGE AND THE NEGRO VOTER

At Howard University, sometime ago, I tried to speak of the general relation between Education and Work, especially with regard to the American Negro. At Fisk University, last commencement, I spoke of the Scope and Function of the Negro university. My address, today, is the third in this series, and I am seeking to begin a survey of the relation of the Negro college to the community.

I am speaking, therefore, on "The Negro College and the Negro Voter", which is a more specific phrasing of the general subject - America & the Negro citizen

First, a word as to our current political thought. I note that more and more, not only in America, but in Europe, we are assuming a certain fatalistic attitude toward the future; and openly saying that, for salvation, modern governments must embrace either Fascismo or Communism. In this choice, we are apparently not thinking so much of the ultimate objects of these system of government, but rather of the method by which any object of government must be attained. And we are asserting, in effect, that either to a dictator or the rule of the mob, the world must look for guidance.

It seems to me that we are forgetting here, the basic object ~~which any~~ (that the kernel of the matter here is) of change must the method ~~of government must have~~. Today, that basic object has got to be, greater economic justice for mankind; a more reasoned plan of production and distribution of income. The attainment of such an object is so difficult, and meets and will meet such traditional organized and determined opposition, that we therefore assume that only extraordinary methods of government will bring it about.

I am not disputing the truth of this assumption, but I am saying that if this change is brought about, and whether it's brought about by a single despot or the dictatorship of the proletariat, back of it, ultimately, must stand the last court of ultimate appeal; the will of the people. From this ultimate authority, we can never escape. It is true that it may be difficult, on account of ignorance or force, to know this will; or to have it intelligently expressed. But, nevertheless, ~~so far as it can gain free~~ its expression, must be the ultimate source of authority; and this is the inescapable and eternal argument for democracy.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

We have gone through many arguments and phases of argument as to the possibility of obtaining effective expression of intelligent public opinion. The New England town meeting put great stress on direct experience and personal knowledge, on learning by doing. I have seen the pure democracy of a New England village function and obtain an expression of the public will, which usually, and in the long run, was forceful and effective. It was not free from the domination of property, and but it was backed by a public school system with compulsory attendance. For a long time, (saw here ultimate solution + we) we stressed popular education for the whole country, saying that whatever shortcomings democracy might have, and how difficult the public will found self expression, nevertheless, universal education would, in the long run, correct all that.

Lately, we have either changed our minds, or education does not appeal to us as really efficacious. We do not place today the dependence upon universal education which we used to, and we do not do this chiefly because the experiment of the universal training of the people in intelligence has not been as sincerely or widely tried in this land as we used to plan. The thing that astonishes us today is the crass stupidity of the mass of people, even in culture lands.

Recognizing this, we have in our day begun some experiments in the education of adults, realizing that the few years which lie between teaching children to read, write and count; and sending them into active life, are not enough to give them a sufficient acquaintance with the world; and that their education must go on through life, if they are to be intelligent citizens, who can comprehend the great body of knowledge which the world is ~~inaugurating~~ accumulating.

I saw, recently, in Des Moines, Iowa, what is probably the finest experiment in adult education that this country knows; where one-third of the population of a city had been reached by actual and intelligent tutelage. But this is hardly a drop in the bucket. It is but one experiment, with one group of a 100,000 out of 120,000,000 of people.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Back of all this, and more or less confidently, we have been depending upon the colleges to guide public opinion by injecting in to our citizenship, continual doses of liberally educated men. The effect of this has been felt, but here again not as widely as we had hoped, because the broad culture program of the colleges has been narrowed by the demands of vocational training, particularly in its professional branches; and because the college has been so dominated by property interests and class ideals, that its objects have often become the building of an aristocracy of intelligence or wealth, whose aims and ideals are not in accord with and have not the best interests of the great masses of men.

All this, then; democracy by experience, universal public school education, adult education and college training, ~~has~~ have left a wide gap, which as nations, ~~like America,~~ have grown in responsibilities and intricacies of their social problems, have, induced us to have recourse to what we ~~have grown to~~ call "propaganda".

We mean by propaganda, an artificial stirring up of public opinion, in rapid tempo, for the accomplishment of certain specific ends, for bringing sudden and overwhelming decisions. The great example of this, the use of it which still leaves us cold with astonishment, was the propaganda which put the United States into the World War, just at the time when, with wide enthusiasm, we had elected a man President, specifically because he had "kept us out of war."!

~~The reason that a thing~~ An experience like this disturbs us, because we recognize that whoever is, at any particular time, master of the instruments of propaganda, may be master of the nation, and this, of course, may be either for good or for evil. It has in our day raised to power simultaneously Stalin and Mussolini; Hitler, and Franklin Roosevelt; and MacDonald ~~and Dumergue.~~

The instruments of propaganda, especially in a great country, are today tremendous and costly, and involve a control of capital and power which is impossible for small groups, for new thinkers, for essential minorities. The great newspapers, the special correspondents, the radio, the moving picture, the telegraph and cable system, all make it practically impossible that the unknown prophet with a new thought and a great idea can obtain hearing; nor can the ordinary minority become a majority unless the nation practically commits suicide.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

37-1-92

Turning, now, more specifically to the United States. This is a country, more than any in the world, that based its very existence on democracy; on the theory that the governed must have voice in their own government. I think we have almost forgotten how radical and even dangerous an experiment this (with 18th century) was, and how little faith certain leading Americans had in the possibility of its accomplishment. Yet we did not fail to say, even in earlier times, that mere political democracy (choosing officials + settling broad objectives now & then) was not enough. We held, what I have called, the great American Assumption; namely, (beyond this) that every American who was willing to work, and had the sacrifice to save, could achieve a sufficient income to satisfy his legitimate wants and possible ambitions. Thus anarchical but automatically beneficent economic forces were to complete + fulfil democracy. This American Assumption was curiously justified by the facts in the case of thousands, and even millions of native-born Americans and of immigrants, (before the Civil War) and its truth made the evident guardian dictatorship of wealth (to politics) seem natural and justifiable, (since all free Americans might become rich.) But it was crassly contradicted by the plight of the black slave; and perhaps we have not stressed enough (fully) the cold logic that was back of abolition, which possibly in the long run had more weight than either sentiment or politics.

2

The Negro must be free in order to justify and prove American Democracy. If such freedom and the vote, he forever thereon sank to the bottom, this was at once proof of the perfection of our political system + and demonstration of the inferiority of the Negro.

The suppressed minor premise here was that the American Assumption of possible wealth for thrifty labor would apply automatically to the freed slave and also that it applied to the white worker after the Civil war

4½

Emancipation & enfranchisement of the Negro have frequently been called a political revolution which was unsuccessful; but in the same breath it has been viewed as a successful economic revolution, just as though these two realms were mutually exclusive and separate. They were in truth aspects of the same vast social change and no economic triumph could result from complete political failure, any more than the new methods of government could succeed without new methods of work and income.

37-83

Certainly, we do not realize just what, in economic phrase, the emancipation and enfranchisement of the Negro meant. It has often been called a revolution, but an unsuccessful revolution; and the very fact that it was called unsuccessful, means that people are speaking mainly of its political and sentimental aspects, and not of its economic truth.

What we did in nine years, from 1867-1876, was to put in power in the South, a dictatorship of labor, and mainly of black labor, and to enable that labor, with a backing of military force, to start an economic revolution in the South, with regard to land, with regard to education, with regard to civil and social uplift. It was an extfaordinary undertaking; and its racial aspects were only important as they affected the economic struggle, and enabled this struggle to be obscured behind theories of biology.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

The result of this attempt was a large success in public education; some ~~little~~ success in the distribution of land, and less success in social uplift. It ended in a counter-attack of property, which overthrew the dictatorship of labor, and made dominate in the South after the war, as before the war, the interests of Property, ~~Only~~ Also, because of war, the holders of property began to change from the planters to former poor whites; and property gained new objectives and new methods through alliance with Northern capitalism.

All this, as I have said, was obscured by a frantic racial propaganda, so that the poor whites saw social and economic salvation in cutting themselves off from the interests of the labor class and ~~dictatorship~~, helping to destroy ~~their own~~ its voting power, and by allying themselves with the new capitalism as its serfs & ruling tools.

This new situation had to be brought into apparent and legal agreement with American democracy & American economic life. This transformation took the form of disfranchisement & not simply, as Americans assume & colleges teach, the disfranchisement of Negroes and of the laboring class in America & the establishment in the nation of a dictatorship of Corporate Wealth, so vast & complete that its power from 1880 to our day has never been successfully challenged. The revolution now on us is an attempt to see if this rule of property can be dislodged in America.

The methods of establishing the Dictatorship of Wealth in the United has been studied under the subjects of Trusts and monopolies, Consolidation of Corporations, the growing

46-8-27 Without the traditional American Conception of political democracy & free opportunity for things role of banking and finance, international trade & international capital; & concurrent with this, the growth of poverty, the labor movement, unions & strikes, charity & relief

37-8-95

But this part of this same movement as it affects the Negro has been artificially isolated and treated as a peculiar "race problem." In fact, the history of the Negro from the time he was driven from the polls by force in 1876, & the speech of Booker T. Washington in Atlanta twenty years later, was the careful shaping of a situation by which Black labor in America was compelled by law, custom & prejudice, to choose between any attempt to exercise political rights, & a chance to earn a living by either under-bidding white labor or at least keeping American labor from violently raising its wage while labor cut off its own nose by refusing to let Black labor raise its wage & normal standards through unionization. While Black labor conceded first this force & fraud & then by voluntary treaty, & gave up its own political power & placed it in the hands of Southern Capital & land monopoly. But Southern Capital was dominated by Northern Capital & thus the rule of wealth in the nation was made unassailable by the 131 electoral votes of the Solid South.

The first open acceptance of this new alignment came

It ~~was just at this point, and~~ in the year 1895, ~~there came to~~ a distinct expression of a new position in the relation of the American Negro to the American government. It was voiced by Booker T. Washington at Atlanta, but it had been preparing for ~~nearly~~ twenty years; and it was in effect, that American Negroes should give up all attempts to gain their desires through voting; while on the other hand, ~~Northern and Southern~~ Capital should guarantee them employment, according to their ability and training, in the new industrial organization. It was a proposal which demanded deep and conscientious examination. Here was a mass of folk, but a generation removed from slavery, with little technical skill, without social organization, and bowed under widespread ignorance. Yet, they lived in a country whose unexampled industrial advance was foreshadowed by a post-war development which has been the astonishment of the world.

37-8-96

In this new organization, Negroes were promised a secure economic foothold, on condition that they should not attempt to use their political power in order to govern the land or any part of it. With this proposal went a less explicit but just as important treaty with white labor, in which the field of labor, particularly in the South, was divided in white and colored areas; there were wide fields of over-lapping, and competition; nevertheless, in general, the Negro was to be the common and semi-skilled laborer, and the white man, the skilled laborer, and white-collar worker. Competition between races in the field of skilled labor would grow, but the advantage would go, theoretically, to the better skilled man, and practically, to the man who could work for lower wages.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

37-8-97

This situation and this general theory, with increased protests on the part of Negroes, continued up into the time of the world war, when unusual demand for labor, and unusual demand for soldiers, opened the way for a great influx of black labor into the North and ~~a new alignment~~.

a sudden challenge & the compromise of 1895. & in the North the Negro began to vote, but with no clear objectives or obvious reasons, being just as unskilled & unguided as white labor. Organized white skilled labor struck & Capital and voted with it and with it exploited common labor white and black, until radical revolt began the present undermining & re-alignment of the Labor movement. & while in the South there continued the suppression of the Negro vote, the multiplication of the white labor vote and the solid bloc of 131 electoral votes at the disposal of Capital

Come now.

There ensued the Great Depression, when the bargain of 1895 was broken, and had to be broken. Not only could there be no guarantee of employment for Negroes, but none for white men. Not only could there be no division of work into white men's and colored men's jobs, but all along the line there began a life and death struggle for any job at any wage.

Through all this change and turmoil, what has been the attitude of the Negro college? Certainly, it has assumed no leadership. In the earlier years, from 1895, down through the first decade of the 20th Century, the attitude was "Hands off!" The Negro colleges, officially, and in their courses of study, simply did not touch the political problem, nor the essential labor problem. They taught, in effect, so far as they taught anything on the subject, that Reconstruction had been a complete failure; and that politics was not a career for honest educated Negroes. A generation of educated colored cultured leaders grew up, therefore, who not only knew nothing practically about government and voting, but who taught tens of thousands of their pupils that no knowledge and participation in politics was necessary for success or effective economic development.

37-8-98

Since that time, and in our own day, what is the Negro college doing to guide the Negro voter, and what should it do?

For the purposes of this paper, I have sent out a very short questionnaire to twenty of the Negro colleges. Wilberforce and Hampton, after a repeated request, have declined to answer. Of the other eighteen colleges, not a single one had a course of an entire semester entirely devoted to Negro citizenship and enfranchisement.

Most of the colleges touched the matter, more or less incidentally.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Lincoln University, Pennsylvania, says: "The subject is fully treated in the course on race relations." It could not be fully treated in a course on race relations, unless the course touched on very little else.

37-8-99

Fisk University has a one-term course on the Negro in America, and another course on government. These give incidental treatment.

Morgan College has a course in Negro History every alternate year, "including special aspects of the franchise." It also has a course on American Government.

Talladega treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in Social Science.

West Virginia State, in three courses, places "much emphasis on the rights and duties of Negroes in politics."

Knoxville College treats the matter incidentally in two history courses, and one course in American Government.

Shaw University gives incidental treatment in the courses in American Government and American History.

Howard University, in courses on Political Science, Government and Political Parties, seeks "to relate the peculiar problems effecting the Negro to the broad problems of government."

Livingston College has courses on Political Science, Social Science, and American Race Problems, which treat the ballot incidentally.

Virginia State College has an introductory course in American Gowernment, which places "considerable emphasis on Negro citizenship and voting."

Johnson C. Smith University, in ~~eleven~~ several courses in Government, History, Psychology and Literature, treats the Negro vote incidentally.

Straight College has three courses in History and Government, with incidental treatment.

Virginia Union University has three courses in Political Science and Sociology and Negro History, with incidental treatment.

Wiley College has incidental treatment in several courses, although her professor of Political Science is on study-leave for the year.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

At Spelman, Morehouse, Morris Brown and Clark, in the course of Negro History, one week is devoted to a discussion of the political disabilities from which Negroes suffer, particularly in the South, and what remedies may be adopted in order to gain for them fuller participation in voting. ~~Bewinson's "Race, Class and Party" will be ready by~~

37-8-100

Tuskegee, in the course on American Government and Politics, lays "a great deal of stress upon citizenship and voting, and the necessity of the Negroes exercising the franchise." There is incidental treatment in other courses, and in the elementary school, a model village with a charter, and elected officials designed for training in citizenship.

In Bishop College, there is incidental treatment in two courses.

~~Morehouse College~~ puts specific stress on citizenship and voting in a course in ~~Negro History. Incidental treatment~~ comes in three other courses.

In general, we may say, that in the Negro colleges of the United States, not a single college has a specific course on Negro citizenship and voting, [illegible]

To know this, let us consider what a course of this sort should cover; and in outlining this course I am giving a specific instance of what I mean by Negro education as contrasted with White American education; of the function of a Negro university as differing from that of an American university.

A course on the Negro citizen & voter should begin with the legal status of the Negro in America in the 15th century, showing the fact that all Negroes were not slaves & all slaves were not Negroes & that black freemen were recogused as freemen in every country of the New World & every colony among the 13 which formed the U.S.

32-8-101

Secondly in colonial history during the 16th, 17th & 18th centuries the civil & voting rights of Negroes in each colony & in the British West Indies & the English laws should be traced, together with a glance at French & Spanish & Dutch laws as it affected the United States. The exercise of the right & vote in all the colonies should be shewn, the ownership of property & the condition of black labor

Thirdly The abolition & free soil controversy should be traced through the activities of black citizens, voters & ~~labor~~ the whole labor vote

Fourthly voting and ~~labor~~ citizenship of Negroes during the civil wars should be followed

Fifthly above all the current distortions & falsifications of known facts during Reconstruction deserve a whole semester of work. In every single slave state there should be a study (1865-1870) of the conventions & constitutions, the new legislation, the Negro voters & leaders, the social & economic changes; in the Border states, this matter is equally interesting & forgotten; in the

37-8-102

World the Negro vote & offices, the state & national conventions, the great Negro Labor movement, the Civil rights & suffrage laws, the treaties of the 13th 14th & 15th amendments — all showed occupying a considerable share of time

Lastly from 1876 to 1914 came a slowly, & disfranchisement by states and of legal and practical efforts to maintain the right of Negroes to vote and of the duty & vote not simply as Negroes but as saviors of Democracy in America

Unfortunately there is also incidental work. No single research nor single remedy will cover it. Of course much here outlined is treated more or less fully in books on History, Government & Economics & Sociology. But enough of this smaller angle & be segregated by every Negro college in a course of 2 semesters Concentrated & emphatic on Negro citizenship & the right & vote as a fundamental problem of democracy

~~The reason this has not been done~~

~~Manifestly,~~ here is material enough for a year's regular course in any college. To treat it in a single semester, would be a large accomplishment; and to try to treat it with anything like clarity and fullness, as the incidental work of a course in Negro History or in American Government, would be simply impossible.

37-8-103

The past reasons for neglect are, ~~The reason for~~ this attitude, naturally, clear. It is a hang-over from the past. It is the remains of the idea that politics is disgraceful business, at any rate, for Negroes; and that idea has been industriously spread by those who do not believe in democracy in America for either white people or colored.

And then, of course, there has come the tremendous propaganda since 1895,

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

which has made many educated Negroes ashamed of even wanting to vote. The time has come when this must all be changed. If the government of America, and the governments of the world, are to be reconstructed after the Depression on a new basis, there is only one guarantee that the new government is going to envisage the rights and needs of all classes; and that guarantee is the insuring that all classes have the opportunity intelligently to express themselves. With the present state of the public schools in America, not to mention the Negro public schools, such chance for intelligent expression on the part of the mass, is very small. We are, therefore, thrown back upon learning government by actually participating in it, upon adult education, and upon the colleges.

The insistent duty before the Negro college is to see to it that no man is graduated who does not have a clear idea of the fundamental doctrine of democratic government. In addition to this, he should know how this government is carried on; and not simply how the national government is carriedon, or what the political theory is of the state and local governments. He should know the actual condition of state, county, city and township government in the Southern states, and particularly in the state where the college is situated. No such knowledge is today available in the average Southern college, white or black. The plight of local government, and the ignorance about it, is astonishing. It can never be reformed or be made reasonably decent, until there is a concerted attempt to know its actual condition.

And finally, college-bred men, who know the facts concerning Negro citizenship, and the right to vote, must be put in charge, and put themselves in charge of that propaganda which is directing the part that Negroes take in American government. Nothing is more important than this. That intelligent leadership can not be surrendered to enthusiastic young Communists, who do not know and cannot know, the history and plight of the American Negro. They may be, and they often are, honest, enthusiastic, and well-meaning people. But they have got to listen to the wisdom and experience of American Negroes before they can attack the Negro's problem.

(Cont. The Negro College and the Negro Voter.)

Our problem is not the classic set-up of the European laboring class; it is not analogous to the Jewish problem in Russia; it has no remote resemblance to labor problems in France, and it differs by a world from Asia and Africa.

On the other hand, those trained Negroes who propose to solve this problem, cannot settle back into reaction under leadship dominated by capitalistic ideals. They have got to get it through their heads that the present organization of industry is not only going to be changed,—that it is already changing; that there is no automatic way by which the Negro is going to find and take a part in this change; that this change is not a matter outside of government—that it is in the very core of the new governmental organization; that economic and social emancipation is bound up with government, and government depends upon the will of the people.

There is no denial of that ultimate authority, when the people will, that their desires be executed by a single man. There is no denial of democracy, when they delegate their power to a group or even a class. But there is denial of democracy when the elected representatives of a people do what that people do not want done.

It has been our mistake in the theory of government in the past, to suppose with the thinkers of a simpler age, that anybody can do anything; that any chance fool can be elected Senator, Governor or President, and accomplish well the work of those most difficult offices. More and more in the future, we are going to choose the trained executive, not for his hand-shaking power, and friendly smile, but for his ability and knowledge; and in this new method and object of government, if the Negro, through the college, is not trained to take an important and decisive part, then the Negro college is missing one of its greatest opportunities, and one of its most important functions.

Finally, there is one obvious criticism of this paper and that is where are the available text books upon which the course of study which I advocate may be based? The answer is obvious: there are none. The course must be taught at first from mimeographed material & library research and assignment // & interchange of matter between colored colleges and a modest standard collection of books, together with a few cheap reprints would easily furnish forth a good college course. Much of the space in our various college periodicals now devoted to stuff of doubtful value, could be used for printing necessary leaflets & even text books. This is what I mean by Negro education in Negro colleges. I admit it may easily go the way of all the earth and flounder in the morass of cheap self glorification & lies & keep our corner in — but with the example of the world before us, surely we have terrible & sufficient warning

37-8-106

Delivered: May 20 1935
Washington D.C.

SOCIAL PLANNING FOR THE NEGRO, PAST AND PRESENT.

From the day of the Negro's landing in the United States down to the present, there have been 4 well-defined plans of emancipation and social uplift. The first plan was naturally that of violence; the individual and organized resistance to slavery. The extent of this is usually misapprehended in the United States because the plan began in Africa and the West Indies and only its last efforts were extended to the mainland. Henry M. Stanley estimates that in the African slave raids for every slave captured at least 4 persons were left dead in the villages; and where the cause of Negro slavery was inter-tribal war, the toll of death was even greater. On the middle passage to America there were repeated efforts at mutiny in the 18th and 19th Centuries, down to the celebrated cases of the "Amistad" and the "Creole".

The Negroes once landed in the Western world were for many years a cause of turmoil. Ovando solicited that no Negro slaves be sent to Haiti for they "fled among the Indians and taught them bad customs and could never be captured." The story of the fugitive Maroons in South America and Jamaica is one of the sagas of modern history. They fought the English government for a hundred years; they resisted the Spanish and Portuguese and they achieved freedom which continues to our day in Haiti and Guiana.

The fear of slave violence on the American mainland is sufficiently proven by the legislation. The laws of South Carolina in 1712 were defended as necessary "to restrain the disorders, rapines and inhumanity to which they are naturally prone and inclined." The law of 1740 declared that "many late, horrible and barbarous massacres have actually been committed and many more designed on the white inhabitants of this province by Negro slaves." Harsh and pitiless legislation based on these premises continued during slavery and especially was revived and increased after the attempts of Vesey and Nat Turner.

We must not forget that the last effective act of violence which the slaves used was their mass movement during the Civil War which aided 200,000 soldiers and even larger numbers of servants and laborers to the Union Army. It was this actual adherence of slaves to the Union cause and the threat that it would be extended indefinitely that made the Civil War hopeless for the South and led to its sudden cessation.

15-91-64

The third plan which acted as the safety valve for slavery was that of the fugitive slave; it was by far the most successful attack on slavery and began a real social re-organization for the Negro. In a comparatively empty country, the individual slave who could not and would not endure the system would not have to wait until he got the assent and support of a large number of his fellows. He could steal away to the swamps of Florida and Virginia and along the Appalachian Mountains and the Mississippi Valley into the North. This running away of slaves was first an individual enterprise; then it became organized and systematized under Negro leaders and finally gained the co-operation and active help of whites during the era of the Underground Railroad.

The Underground Railroad led to the Civil War. It meant that the capital invested in slaves was continually suffering losses and the slave owners demanded more and more perempterily the enactment of severe fugitive slave laws. The last one which they secured on the eve of the Civil War, not only interfered with individual rights, but state rights. It led to retaliatory nullification in the North, intensified the bitterness between the sections and eventually resulted in Civil War.

It is difficult to say how many slaves escaped, but the black population of the North increased from 130,000 in 1820 to 345,000 in 1860; this is a considerably larger increase than that of the total Negro population and if we remember that this Northern group was composed of poor emigrants with broken family life and insecure economic basis suddenly transferred from city to town, it seems certain that at least 100,000 of them were fugitives from slavery and represented a loss of at least $25,000,000 in invested capital and perhaps much more than that. It was this economic loss that spurred secession.

Meantime there were especial centers of runaway slaves. There were the fugitive slaves at the time of the Revolutionary War who not only took part in the hostilities, but caused infinite difficulties in peace negotiations. There were the 1,000 Negroes, who in 1815 manned a former British port in Georgia and resisted the power of the United States and finally there were the so-called Seminole wars which were simply slave raids for runaway property.

E5-91-64

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

Beside these efforts, there were more far-reaching efforts to settle the Negro problem by mass migration. A proposal to leave this country for Africa seemed logical in the 18th Century when so many Negroes were newly come to the country. This plan was not simply a plan of white folk. Paul Cuffe was actually the first person who successfully transported emigrants, taking 38 Negroes to Africa at his own expense. Later, came the American Colonization Society, but their plan for wholesale migration was spoiled by the effort of the radical South to turn this migration into an attempt to bolster slavery by getting rid of free Negroes. Nevertheless, out of that effort, together with the attempt to enforce the slave trade laws, came the settlement at Liberia.

Among the free Negroes of the North, plans for social amelioration began about 1830 when the Nat Turner insurrection in the South and the new foreign immigration to the North, made the economic situation of the free Negroes difficult. Riots and discriminatory laws in Ohio and Pennsylvania led to the Conventions of 1830 and 1831 and to a well thought-out plan of migration. The British Government was approached and offered asylum, at first in Canada and later, after the West Indian emancipation, in the West Indies. The Canadian migration was financed by Negroes themselves and large numbers went to Ontario where they built up successful settlements. Their influence on American Negroes has been great. They were headquarters of the Underground Railroad. It was here than John Brown went to perfect his plans for the Harper Ferry raids; and it was here that Richard B. Harrison was born.

49-16-53

Between 1830 and 1860, the situation of American Negroes became increasingly difficult because of the spread of the abolition centroversy and the rise of the cotton kingdom. An increasing number of Negroes in the 50's began to consider that wholesale migration was the only escape. They saw no chance of emancipation in the United States. Even Frederick Douglass placed his whole hope on war and bleed, but, nevertheless, steadfastly opposed migration.

In 1854, a remarkable convention met in Cleveland, Ohio. They made 3 proposals: Martin R. Delaney proposed migration to the Niger Valley of Africa, James M. Whitfield proposed to go to Central America and Theodore Holly to Haiti. They not only made these propositions, but they actually made the necessary investigation and at the next colonization convention in Canada in 1856, Holly made a report which resulted, eventually, in 2,000 Negro emigrants going to Haiti. Delaney concluded 8 treaties with African kings and brought evidences of land concessions and welcome. Whitfield did not actually get to Central America before the Civil War broke out.

The war stopped migration schemes, until black fugitives began to pour into the Union armies. For a while, Lincoln did not realize the significance of this tremendous secession of power to the North and withdrawal of labor force from the South. The first problem and an irri ating problem it was, was what as going to be done to get rid of the Negroes? If some plan of mass migration could be devised there was the possibility not simply of withdrawing these slaves from work in the South, but of inducing the Border States to give up slavery. Lincoln had long been an advocate of colonization. He said frankly that he could not conceive Negroes and white people living together in the United States as equals. He, therefore, secured in 1861 an appropriation of $100,000 from Congress and a further appropriation of $500,000 in 1862. He consulted delegations of Negroes and made contacts with foreign countries, but before he went further, he suddenly saw just what the significance of Negro soldiers and laborers was.

He saw that without their help, the war against the South could not be won, while with their help and the threat of increased secessions from the slaves, the opposition in the South was doomed. Moreover, he became convinced that mass migration of the Negroes could not be carried on with their consent nor at a price which the United States was willing to pay. His one venture with 500 Negro settlers on a little island near Haiti was a disastrous failure and nearly half the victims died of disease and were cheated outrageously by their white manager.

Then came the era of Reconstruction and with the thrill of political power in the minds of the Negro and his friends, social Reconstruction by migration was practically given up, except that Negroes moved in considerable groups from place to place in the South in order to find free land and better working conditions. When, however, the revolution of 1876 came and the Negro by force and fraud was disfranchised, a great migration movement to the West was conceived by Henry Adams in Louisiana and

49-16-54

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

Benjamin Singleton in Tennessee. Some 50,000 Negroes actually migrated to Kansas and the West and it took conciliation and violence in the South to stop the stream. Its more effectual stoppage, however, was due to poverty and cold welcome in the West. Nevertheless, Negro population was planted in Kansas and its descendants remain there. Later, Bishop Turner and Congressman Morgan of Alabama, tried to revive the project of migration to Africa, but its only result was 1 shiplead of 200 Negroes in 1885.

On the other hand, the migration of Negroes from South to North has gone on continuously since the Civil War. Between 1880 and 1900, some 10,000 to 20,000 a year went into the North, while from 1910 to 1930, between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 moved in one of the great mass movements of the history of migration.

Meantime, the fourth great plan for the social emancipation of Negroes began with the Reconstruction efforts in the Civil War. From 1867-1876, the Negroes placed their whole hope of full emancipation and economic security upon their vote and this forms one of the most interesting episodes in American history. It was not simply the enfranchisement of black folk, it was the attempt to reconstruct the basis of American democracy and to put the political power in the hands of the lowest working group. The bottom economic rail was put on top. If this group had had leadership and a greater chance for industrial development, there might have ensued in the South a dictatorship of the proletariat which might have led the modern world. But, of course, no such rapid transition from feudal slavery to industrial democracy could be expected. These laborers were themselves under the direction and ideology of a capitalistic form of industry. Their idea of emancipation was the rise of an exploiting class of black capitalists. Nevertheless, their realistic grasp of the situation led them to preliminary efforts not to exploit labor but to make the situation of the emancipated workers as advantageous as possible. They tried co-operative farming in Louisiana and state division of large plantations in South Carolina. They advocated and made actual free public school education in every Southern state. They gave opportunity for the poor man, not only to vote, but to represent his class in the legislature and the greatest charge against Reconstruction that the legislature was filled by people who did not pay taxes, was really its greatest glory. The non-tax-paying laborer was the man who for a long time dominated the legislature with both white and black representatives.

55-91-64

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

There were, however, 2 unconquerable centers of opposition: one was the white landholder, who despite the fortunes of war, was unabled to continue his monopoly of the land through the determination of Andrew Johnson. It was one of the ironies of fate that the poor white who was the author of the legislation which distributed free land to the peasants of Europe and the North, was also the man who succeeded in keeping the emancipated Negroes of the South as landless serfs.

The second unconquerable center of opposition was the new capitalism of the North which was rising to tremendous and ruthless power. This new capitalism looked upon the South not as a center of a new democracy, but as a center of exploitation. So long as the Southern land monopolist threatened the power and career of the Northern industrialists, he was perfectly willing to let black and white labor have its way in the South. But when Southern labor began to increase its demands and power, and on the other hand, the Southern landholder showed himself willing to unite with the Northern capitalists in new exploitation, the bargain of 1876 was made and the laborers, white and black, were disfranchised. What ensued in the South after emancipation was not at all the classical bourgeois revolution but something far more complicated and reactionary.

However, the plan for Negro emancipation by political means did not end in 1876. The Negro held on to vestiges of his political power, first, by black congressmen, up until the beginning of the 20th Century, by a few members of Southern legislatures and especially by their power inside the Republican Party. This latter power was gradually undermined by the fact that it had back of it less and less of real democratic control and, therefore, could more easily be seduced by bribery and manipulation.

Appointments of Negroes to Federal office also became less in number, as Reconstruction receded. Nevertheless there were certain compensations in the North. Negroes appeared in the legislature of 11 or 12 Northern states and sometimes played a conspicuous part. They were elevated to the judicial bench in the District of Columbia and 3 other states, and in cities, particularly like Chicago and New York, they occupied from time to time positions of real power.

The result of this political influence can be shown in many ways. Between 1884 and 1897, 25 civil rights laws, in addition to the national civil rights law, were passed in 16 Northern states. Many of them, including the national law, were emasculated by judicial interpretation, but others, like the Massachusetts and New York laws, are effective today. Federal appropriations for Negro education in the case of Howard University and the land grant colleges have been secured. On the other hand, further discriminatory legislation has been held up. Jim-Crow cars have been kept out of Delaware, West Virginia and Missouri and partially out of Maryland. A flood of anti-racial inter-marriage laws introduced in 1913 in Congress and 12 different states were defeated in every instance but one.

49-16-56

On the other hand, in the South, "Jim-Crow" legislation and disfranchisement laws between 1881 and 1910 swept through with little opposition.

It became clearer and clearer as the plan of political power to emancipate the American Negro was followed, that something was lacking; that the poverty and inexperience of the Negro made it impossible for him to exercise his political power in full and that as a minority, even then he could not succeed unless he could make some alliance with the majority. There ensued, therefore, two plans which both explain and supplement the plan of political power from 1867-1930.

One of these movements came in 1896-1920 and it sought firmly to integrate the American Negro into American industry as a farmer, laborer, skilled artisan and capitalist. The other movement, sought by agitation and legal defense, to clear away race discrimination and allow untrammeled advancement of black folk according to ability. These 2 latter movements fell into bitter controversy. The economic movement ended with the World War and the anti-discrimination movement declined with the depression.

The plan of social Reconstruction advocated by Booker T. Washington was not simply a plan for the uplift of labor as is so often assumed; and it can be only understood as we consider its immediate background. The late William H. Baldwin, President of the Long Island Railroad and slated to be President of the Pennsylvania, was a young man trained in Southern industry and he was one of the first to conceive of the training of black laborers who should share work with white laborers and at the same time keep the white labor movement from too strong and insistent demands in its fight with capital.

40-16-52

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

This idea began in the day when the "one big union" of the Knights of Labor had changed to the craft unionism of the American Federation of Labor. The strength of the labor movement was growing but almost without exception it excluded black skilled labor. However, black skilled labor was valuable and could be trained in the South. It was the idea of Mr. Baldwin and gradually of many others that you would not only do a service to and open opportunity for black folk, but you would in this same way serve capital and hold white labor in check.

About this time, Booker T. Washington took charge of Tuskegee in Alabama. He was an opportunist with high ideals. He believed in political rights for people who could exercise them, but in the case of Southern Negroes, he knew that they could not exercise them without the consent of the white South. He took the position, therefore, that the Negro must gain an economic status before he could use his political rights and in this he was undoubtedly right; but on the other hand, his idea of the economic status which Negroes must gain was based unquestionably on the capitalistic organization of the United States.

Mr. Washington's program included a temporary acquiescence in giving up Negro political rights and agitation for civil rights and insistence upon training young Negroes for farming and industry up from a thrifty solid class of black landlords and artisans, Washington expected a class of Negro capitalists to arise and employ Negro workers. The plan was launched by the Atlanta Speech in 1896 and was triumphant from that date until about 1910. It included alliance with white capital and was rewarded by large contributions toward Negro education, especially such schools as conformed to the Hampton-Tuskegee type.

As a first step toward this new Negro capitalism, Mr. Washington especially stressed landholding, widespread peasant proprietorship and even large farms among Negroes; and then a training of Negro laborers and artisans for use in industry at a wage if necessary less than that demanded by union labor. The result of this compromise was new understanding between leading elements, North and South, with regard to the Negro. The Negro college, while not entirely discouraged, was looked upon with some suspicion and positions for Negro college graduates became difficult. To some extent, appointments and opportunities for young Negroes were carefully censored and referred for approval to Tuskegee over a very wide extent of country. Negro newspapers were brought in line by judicious advertising and other means of control. This was really regarded as clever and far-sighted compromise, which if it did not solve would at least peacefully postpone the solution of a baffling, intricate problem of race contact until more favorable times. Between 1900-1910, Mr. Washington became one of the most popular men in America, in constant demand North and South as a speaker, adviser and referee.

49-16-52

As the current opinion of the land became unified, Mr. Washington's program began to become increasingly suspicious in the eyes of Negroes. A wave of Jim-Crow legislation and disfranchising bills swept over the South and the Border States. Already separation of the races in travel had been made compulsory in 8 Southern states before 1891, but had paused. Now a new wave of legislation began in 1898 and covered South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland and Oklahoma. Determined and repeated efforts were made in Missouri, West Virginia and Delaware. Disfranchising laws swept over the South and Border States, from 1890-1910, at the very time when Negro political power and agitation had been lulled to its lowest by the Washington compromise. This triumph of the radical, anti-Negro South and the continued prevalence of lynching which went on at the rate of 1 to 2 a week during most of Mr. Washington's career, greatly embarrassed him. He hated caste and lawlessness as much as any man. He wanted the best for his people, but he implicitly believed that once his economic program could be put through all else would follow and he made the fatal mistake of trying to forestall criticism from Negroes and of acquiescing in the neglect if not the suppression of Negro colleges.

49-1659

The result was the outburst of wrath and criticism led by the younger college-bred Negro group, an outburst which eventually split the Negro group in twain. But it was not that criticism that doomed the Washington program. It was the plain failure of the economic re-building which I emphasized. This is shown by the trend of Negro employment, despite the effort of both Hampton and Tuskegee to train farmers and servants, both of these decreased in number. Farmers, instead of forming 57% of the workers, as in 1890, now formed 37%. Servants have decreased from 31% in 1890 to 22% in 1920. Since then, they have increased to 29%. Manifestly, then, there were forces at work to drive the Negroes off the farm and out of the servant quarters. On the other hand, the number of Negroes in commerce and transportation and in the manufacturing and mechanical industries, increased largely from 10% in 1890 to 29% in 1930, but it was not all the kind of increase that Mr. Washington had in mind. The newcomers were mainly laborers. They made some headway into the semi-skilled and skilled industries, but were kept out by the trade unions and the trade unions held against them as an excuse the fact that they had been trained and that the plan had been to train them as strikebreakers and low-cost laborers. The caste system in the South increased the whole idiology of caste throughout the United States until labering men felt themselves degraded to work with black men. Moreover, the attempt of Negroes to enter the employing class as merchants and landholders was made impossible by severe competition and monopoly. The attempt to teach Negroes the skill of modern industry was also frustrated by the changing of skill, the mass production, the use of machinery. While, therefore, land ownership among Negroess and the accumulation of property increased until 1910, it then began to decrease and the increase in Negro property, while a credi able index of thrift, was dwarfted by the immense piling up of capital in the hands of whites. Without doubt, the Washington program improved the economic status of the Negro, but on the other hand, and just as surely, it did not show a way out because it fasten the change of exploitation on Negro labor and increased labor antagonism in the labering classes.

09-91-44

This was particularly shown in the new development in the South where white labor used its political and social influence to replace black labor and eliminate the so-called Negro jobs. At the time of the depression, therefore, the status of Negro labor, both North and South, was precarious, Through the opposition of unions and the discrimination of employers in the North and the competition of poor white labor in the South.

The next plan for social re-organization was that of agitation of legal defense. It was at first a part of the plan for political power and not a demand for fixing the unconstitutionality of disfranchisement legislation and the enforcing of war amendments. One of the earliest group movements to agitate for this was the National League formed in Boston in 1885. It was local in its membership but had some influence.

In 1887, T. Thomas Fortune, editor of what is now the NEW YORK AGE, issued an appeal for a national organization and repeated this in 1889. The so-called Afro-American League, afterward changed to Afro-American Council, met in Chicago with 21 states represented in January, 1890. J. C. Price was President and Mr. Fortune, Secretary. The League held another meeting in Tennessee and then died until Bishop Walters revived it in 1898. It met that year in September at Rochester and later in November in Washington. The object of the organization was to investigate lynching, to test the constitutionality of discriminatory laws, to secure civil rights legislation, to promote migration from the South and to encourage organization. It met for several years and practically died with a final meeting in St. Paul, Minnesota about 1900. Its weakness was that it consisted simply of an annual meeting without a continuous working organization. The result was that it did little more than meet, organize and pass resolutions. In the year 1905, a new aspect came over the plans for American Negroes for social Reconstruction.

The new disfranchisement laws and the wave of discriminatory legislation, coupled with Mr. Washington's concessions, alarmed the colored people. Particularly the young colored college man began to fear the dictatorship of the Tuskegee machine and the difficulty of expressing even legitimate criticism. This opposition was crystalized by the jailing of Monroe Trotter in Boston for trying to heckle Mr. Washington during a speech of the colored church. It seems to me that this was going too far and that while Trotter was much more bitter and outspoken than was necessary, yet he did have a right to talk even though he criticized Mr. Washington. The result was that a call was issued in June, 1905, signed by 59 men from 17 states. In July, 1905, 29 of these men, representing 14 states, met at Niagara Falls and formed the Niagara movement. The movement grew and in 1906 held a significant meeting at Harpers Ferry. The Manifesto which it sent out was plain and bitter.

> "The men of the Niagara movement coming from the toil of the year's hard work and pausing a moment from the earning of their daily bread turn toward the nation and again ask in the name of ten million the privilege of a hearing. In the past year the work of the Negro hater has flourished in the land. Step by step the defenders of the rights of American citizens have retreated. The work of stealing the black man's ballot has progressed and the fifty and more representatives of stolen votes still sit in the nation's capital. Discrimination in travel and public accommodation has so spread that some of our weaker brethren are actually afraid to thunder against color discrimination as such and are simply whisperin for ordinary decencies.

49-16-61

"Against this the Niagara Movement eternally protests. We will not be satisfied to take one jot or tittle less than our full manhood rights. We claim for ourselves every single right that belongs to a freeborn American, political, civil and social; and until we get these rights we will never cease to protest and assail the ears of America. The battle we wage is not for ourselves alone but for all true Americans. It is a fight for ideals, lest this, our common fatherland, false to its founding, become in truth the land of the thief and the home of the Slave--a by-word and a hissing among the nations for its sounding pretentions and pitiful accomplishment.

"Never before in the modern age has a great and civilized folk threatened to adopt so cowardly a creed in the treatment of its fellow-citizens born and bred on its soil. Stripped of verbiage and subterfuge and in its naked nastiness the new American creed says: Fear to let black men even try to rise lest they become the equals of the whites And this is the land that professes to follow Jesus Christ. The blasphemy of such a course is only matched by its cowardice.

"In detail our demands are clear and unequivocal. First, we would vote; with the right to vote goes everything: freedom, manhood, the honor of your wives, the chastity of your daughters, the right to work, and the chance to rise, and let no man listen to these who deny this.

"We want full manhood suffrage, and we want it now, henceforth and forever.

"Second. We want discrimination in public accommodation to cease. Separation in railway and street cars, based simply on race and color, is un-American, undemocratic, and silly. We protest against all such discrimination.

29-91-64

"Third. We claim the right of freemen to walk, talk, and be with them that wish to be with us. No man has a right to choose another man's friends, and to attempt to do so is an impudent interference with the most fundamental human privilege.

"Fourth. We want the laws enforced against rich as well as poor; against Capitalist as well as Laborer; against white as well as black. We are not more lawless than the white race, we are more often arrested, convicted and mobbed. We want justice even for criminals and outlaws. We want the Constitution of the country enforced. We want Congress to take charge of Congressional elections. We want the Fourteenth amendment carried out to the letter and every State disfranchised in Congress which attempts to disfranchise its rightful voters. We want the Fifteenth amendment enforced and No state allowed to base its franchise simply on color.

"The failure of the Republican Party in Congress at the session just closed to redeem its pledge of 1904 with reference to suffrage conditions at the South seems a plain, deliberate, and premeditated breach of promise, and stamps that party as guilty of obtaining votes under false pretense.

"Fifth. We want our children educated. The school system in the country districts of the South is a disgrace and in few towns and cities are the Negro schools what they ought to be. We want the national government to step in and wipe out illiteracy in the South. Either the United States will destroy ignorance or ignorance will destroy the United States.

"And when we call for education we mean real education. We believe in work. We ourselves are workers, but work is not necessarily education. Education is the development of power and ideal. We want our children trained as intelligent human beings should be, and we will fight for all time against any proposal to educate black boys and girls simply as servants and underlings, or simply for the use of other people. They have a right to know, to think, to aspire.

"These are some of the chief things which we want. How shall we get them? By voting where we may vote, by persistent, unceasing agitation;

49-16-63

by hammering at the truth by sacrifice and work.

"We do not believe in violence, neither in the despised violence of the raid nor the lauded violence of the soldier, nor the barbarous violence of the mob, but we do believe in John Brown, in that incarnate spirit of justice, that hatred of a lie, that willingness to sacrifice money, reputation, and life itself on the altar of right. And here on the scene of John Brown's martyrdom we reconsecrate ourselves, our honor, our property to the final emancipation of the race which John Brown died to make free."

"The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People seeks to uplift the colored men and women of this country by securing to them the full enjoyment of their rights as citizens, justice in all courts, and equality of opportunity everywhere. It favors and aims to aid, every kind ofeducation among them save that which teaches special privileges or prerogative, class or caste. It recognizes the national character of the Negro problem and no sectionalism. It believes in the holding of the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln. It upholds the doctrine of "all men up and no man down." It abhors Negro crime, but still more the conditions which breed crime, and most of all the crimes committed by mobs in the mockery of the law, by individuals in the name of the law.

"It believes that the scientific truths of the Negro problem must be available before the country can see its way wholly clear to right existing wrongs. It has no other belief than that the best way to uplift the colored man and the best way to aid the white man to peace is social content; it has no other desire than exacting justice, and no other motive than patriotism." (First Annual Report, January 1, 1911. N. A. A. C. P.)

The Niagara movement, however, had certain inherent difficulties. First, it was a racial movement of men entirely unknown outside their group and with no means of contact by which they could easily reach influential persons in the white group. And secondly, Mr. Trotter, who owned and edited the one organization journal, was not an organization man. He was an extreme individualist. When, therefore, in 1909 there was held a conference in New York with practically the same program that the Niagara movement had, practically all of the leading members of the Niagara movement went into the N. A. A. C. P., 7 of them going upon its Board of Directors and thus to a large measure the work of the Niagara movement became merged with that of the N. A. A. C. P.

The work of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is too well-known to call for review here. I need only point out that its greatest triumph was in the matter of legal defense. Practically, it made the Supreme Court for the first time in the history of the country affirm the validity of the 15th Amendment, outlaw the Grandfather Clauses and curtail the segregation ordinances. It also secured some protection for accused Negroes from mob violence and made the most effective anti-lynching campaign in the history of the country.

The first sign of change that faced the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was falling off of its income and the decrease in the circulation of THE CRISIS. This was not due to the fact that the American Negro did not want to fight discrimination and lynching and was not willing to pursue cases in legal defense which should build up the foundation of the whole caste system in marriage, in travel and in education. But it did come from the fact that the colored people, economically, were unable to stand the expense. It had been the proud boast of the N.A.A.C.P. that beginning as a quasi philanthropic institution, expecting to rely upon funds furnished mainly by rich white friends, it had become during its best years supported in the main by the mass of colored workers and that THE CRIS had been made financially independent by the same kind of support. The amounts of money which it received from rich white people were small and their withdrawal would have made no particular difference in its program. The falling off now of this income meant that the colored people were financially unable to sustain this program and especially to back its expansion. We realized this before the depression and the causes lay in a new industrial development, North and South. In the South, the Negro was losing the monopoly of certain jobs which he had had. The machine was displacing semi-skilled and skilled labor among both Negroes and whites. A new monopoly of capital and materials was so changing the face of industry that the Negro was becoming a reservoir of casual labor and the general causes of the collapse of agriculture throughout the world were at work in increased degree among Negro farmers.

49-16-65

The mass migration of Negroes North alleviated but did not change the basic trouble. They found themselves in the midst of difficulties connected with housing, difficulties connected with unions, difficulties connected with the casual character of their labor and the low wage for which they were obliged to work. This should have taught the Negroes of the United States that a change of tactic was absolutely necessary. Agitation and legal defense must be kept up so far as possible but that possibility at present had its limitations. Before them and of more importance and of fundamental influence even to the campaign against race discrimination itself was a new plan of social security.

I began to advocate, therefore, for the N. A. A. C. P. a new social program as early as 1928. I was by no means clear in my own thinking, but was groping for light and for that reason had visited Russia, had begun the study of Karl Marx and had voted the Socialist ticket since 1912. My efforts brought little reaction; no particular opposition and at the same time no emphasis of agreement until the wave of depression overwhelmed us. Then, suddenly, there came to the fore, a peculiar situation made by the fact that the problem of race discrimination always cuts across and hinders the settlement of other problems, and we are repeatedly forced to give up direct attack upon it in order to save our very lives.

It happened in the Civil War; in the midst of a fight for physical freedom, civil and political rights, the Negro was suddenly faced with the problem of fighting when the outcome was by no means clear nor was it altogether certain just where his interest lay. He was compelled for a time to lay aside his racial demands to become Union soldiers and laborers and afterward was rewarded by receiving a greater measure of political power and civil rights than he had dreamed of. The same kind of dilemma came at the time of the World War.

We had no choice between war and peace--the nation was rushing headlong. We had no allies save a small group of thinkers who for the most part were not interested in Negroes. Labor was near unanimous for war and so were most socialists here and abroad. We were in a raging flood and our only real choice was to fight swimming with the current or to be drowned in impotent opposition. I said then and under similar circumstances would say again, close ranks and fight for our own liberty while the world was committing suicide.

49-16-66

The victim of mob violence, lynching and residential segregation for a time had to concentrate his efforts toward securing decent treatment of his segregated regiments, an opportunity for men to become officers even if they were black and permission to fight at the front instead of work blindly in the rear. After the World War, the Negro was able to return to his attack upon prejudice with increased power and efficiency. The years from 1919 to 1929 represent a high water mark of our organized striving for increased political power, the suppression of lynching and legal defense.

The irony of the situation, however, proved to be the fact that the cause for which we were verbally compelled to fight itself failed in its very victory and cast us with all men, workers and owners, in the maelstrom of World Depression. Today, then, our original paradox again appears with wider ramification and vaster perils.

We are in the midst of a national and world movement to reconstruct the basis of industry. In order to be efficient co-workers in this Reconstruction, we have got to escape the present threat of starvation, to conserve our schools and social organizations and to get regular, decently paid work. With that foundation settled, even in a reasonable degree, we can begin again to fight discrimination. But until unemployment among American Negroes is decreased and a decent standard of living re-established, we have no resources upon which the battle against discrimination can effectively be carried.

Here, then, is the dilemma and how has it been met? Briefly put, there have been 3 moves: (1) toward invoking the protection of restored capitalism, (2) a movement toward alliance with organized labor, and (3) a movement toward socialism.

In the first category may be placed practically all of the older organizations: the Urban League, the Federation of Churches, the N.A.A.C.P. Nearly all of these organizations have, to be sure, shown signs of uneasiness at their position. The Urban League organized a National Economic Council, which through an executive committee and Workers' Councils was designed to guide the Negro through the crisis. Apparently, this never functioned. The N. A. A. C. P. sought to adopt an economic program but was unable to agree on anything definite. The Federation of Churches has adopted a liberal labor program, but has not applied it to Negroes. Gradually, most of these and many other organizations under the guidance of the Joint Committee on Recovery, fell back upon a drive on the administration to secure justice for the Negro in relief and reorganization; but the difficulty was in determining just what economic justice for the Negro involved and how it could best be secured. The organizations themselves had scant common ground. Ten of them were religious, 4 were academic fraternities and sororities, 1 is a fraternal order, 1 an organization for agitation and reform, 4 organizations of professional men, 1 designed for club work and 3 are industrial organizations. The only thing upon which this conglomerate body could wholeheartedly unite was the matter of race discrimination.

Of the fact of discrimination, the Joint Committee has unearthed ample proof, but as to what we are going to do about it, the Joint Committee, quite naturally, has nothing to say and nothing to think.

Indeed, everything that has happened in the NRA and the New Deal might easily have been foretold before the NRA was established.

If the United States government comes in to the depression picture to administer local relief, that relief must be directly carried out by local people and these local people in the places where Negroes are most numerous are going to be prejudiced and narrow.

If the government is going to relieve the farmer by a scarcity program or bonuses, the people who are going to reap the benefit from that program are going to be the white people who own the land. If the government is going to establish a great power organization with towns and industries, in these towns and industries there is going to be repeated the same pattern of discrimination and segregation that is current in the nation. If we are going to have housing projects, subsistence homesteads, farm credit and credit unions, we are going to find in the carrying out of these plans the same American prejudice against color that we find everywhere. What, then, are we to do? Are we to starve to death until we settle color discrimination in America or are we first to secure the power to fight before we enter battle? The one thing that we are bound to do in self-defense is to see that in the midst of all this whirlpool we make sure of such beginnings of economic security that in the future we shall have power to work out our destiny; and to this everything else is subordinate.

89-91-644

If segregated homesteads and segregated land will give us more secure employment and higher wage, we cannot for a moment hesitate. If segregated schools will give us better education, then we must have segregated schools. If segregated housing will give us decent homes, we have no right to choose for our children and our families slums for the sake of herding with the white unfit. Our first business is in the midst of the great economic revolution which is going on is to secure a place for ourselves.

To this, the advocates of labor alliance answer: there is only one haven of refuge for the American Negro. He must recognize that his attempt to enter the ranks of capital as an exploiter came too late, if it were ever a worthy ideal for a group of workers. He is now forever excluded by the extraordinary monopoly which white capital and credit have upon the machines and materials of the world. Moreover, that solution after all was possible only for the few. The great mass of Negroes belong to the laboring class. They have the same interests that white laborers have. They must join the white labor movement.

This, however, is not nearly as easy as it might seem. Not only has the attempt of American Negroes to join the ranks of the white labor movement been discouraging for more than a century, but even today, the welcome which they are accorded is questionable. In the first place, the farmers and servants who compose the mass of workers among colored people are not organized. If we take the 30,000,000 of organizable laborers, less than 7,000,000 are organized, even if we include the company unions. If we take the less than 5,000,000 who are organized, the overwhelming majority of them will not allow the Negroes to join their ranks under any circumstances and most of the rest have only allowed Negroes to intrude when the power of Negro labor was such that they did not dare to oppose its competition. There are undoubtedly today a number of unions which are disposed to welcome Negro members and who recognize something of the real solidarity of labor interests; but their total number must be less than half a million. With such workers, Negro labor ought by all means to unite; but to say that the union of American Negro labor with 1/2 million out of 5,000,000 organizedlaborers, is a labor alliance, is seriously to overstate the case.

49-16-69

Suppose, now, that the Negro turns to the promise of socialism whither I have long looked for salvation. I was once a member of the celebrated Local No. 1. in New York. I am convinced of the essential truth of the Marxian philosophy and believe that eventually land, machines and materials must belong to the state, that private profit must be abolished, that the system of exploiting labor must disappear, that people who work must have essentially equal income and that in their hands the political rulership of the state must eventually rest.

Notwithstanding the fact that I believe this is the truth and that this truth is being gradually exemplified by the Russian experiment, I must, nevertheless, ask myself seriously: how far can American Negroes forward this eventual end? What part can they expect to have in a socialistic state and what can they do now to bring about its realization? And my answer to this has long been clear. There isno automatic power in socialism to overrkde and suppress race prejudice. This has been proven in America, it was true in Germany before Hitler and the analogy of the Jews in Russia is for our case entirely false and misleading. One of the worst things that Negroes could do today would be to join the American Communist party or any of its many branches. The Communists of America have become dogmatic expenents of the inspired word of Karl Marx as they read it. They believe, apparently, in immediate, violent and bloody revolution and they are willing to try any and all means of raising hell anywhere and under any circum tances. This is a silly program even for white men. For American colored men, it is suicide. In the first place, its logical basis is by no means sound. The great and fundamental change in the organization of industry which Karl Marx with his splendid mind and untiring sacrifice visualized must, to be sure, be brought about by revolution, but whether in all times and places and under all circumstances that revolution is going to involve war and bloodshed, is a question which every sincere follower of Marx has a right to doubt.

49-16-20

Social Planning for the Negro, Past and Present.

The most baffling paradox today is the attitude of men toward war. On the one hand, we have the advocates of radical reform in our fundamental, economic and political structure, insisting that the only path to this era of Peace and Justice is through violent revolution. On the other hand, we have the advocates of the present system insisting that they can only insure peace by world-wide preparation for the same kind of war which recently took the lives of ten million men.

The ordinary man seeking peace has, then, apparently not a choice between Peace and War, but only a choice of the kind of war in which he will fight and the object for which he will fight and apparently he must strive to make this last great murder of the West, this new War to end War, as peaceful and reasonable as possible.

Leaving for a moment the question as to how inevitable this dilemma is, we American Negroes under the race hate now prevalent, will in any case stand between the two armies as buffer and victim, pawn and peon; and we can only take this attitude:

We abhor violence and blood shed. We will join no movement that advocates a program of violence, except as the last defense against aggression.

We see today as the chief aggresser and threatener of violence, not indeed communism, but greed and reaction, masquerading as patriotism and Fascism, armed to the teeth, intolerant and ready to kill and repress not only those who oppose them, but those who dare to express opposing thoughts.

Such discrimination, represented in the United States by various patriotic women's organizations, by war veterans' leagues, by the army and navy and its friends, are the most dangerous advocates of war and murder; and it is foolish for those who believe in world Peace and economic Justice to be so misled by this reaction as to burst into wild words and futile deeds and thus give greed a chance to kill the innocent.

Granted that the Marxian dialectic is a masterful statement of a great truth, yet the Revolution which it sets down as inevitable, may logically, even if not probably, come by votes without violence, by restricted violence, or if with widespread violence, not with cruelty and unnecessary bloodshed. They are fools who think that successful and beneficial revolution consists primarily in raising the devil and it is very doubtful if such persons will ever lead America to Peace and Justice. It may well be that in the awful and fundamental changes to come, calm, silent and compassionate men may be compelled to lead the world to peace through irresistible force but never through irresponsible deviltry.

49-16-91-44

In any real revolution, every s tep that saves violence is to the glory of the great end. We may not save all, but we may never forget that revolution is not the object of socialism or communism rightly conceived; that their object is Justice and if haply the world can find that ju tice without blood, the world is the infinite gainer. Persistent and dominant denial of this possibility may be made and may be true, but wise men will nevercease to seek it. We black men say, therefore, we do not believe in violence. Our object is justice not violence and we will fight only when there is no better way.

The proletariat which stands for violence is that proletariat which becomes the tool to carry out capitalistic violence. The first duty of workers is not to fight but to convince themselves that union of workers, class solidarity, is better than force and a substitute for it.

The real problem, then, is this concert of the workers. The real emphasis today is not on revolution but on class consciousness and this is the job of socialism and the first proof of conversion is the abolition of race prejudice.

It is the duty of socialism to battle the war psychologically and not to promote it. Early Christianity with its battle hymns and war metaphors made the same ghastly mistake,--"Its blood-red banner streams afar" down to our own day.

If, now, reaction toward capitalism can no more save Negroes today than it could in the past; and if the opportunity to ally the Negro with white labor has been limited in the past and while wider today is still too limited for effective action and if a program of avowed violence is out of the question, what can the Negro do? This bringsme really to the end of my part of this program, but I may say for the benefit and attack of my good friend, Mr. Harris, to my mind, this is our program: so to organize the Negro group that within it, labor and the interests of labor shall be dominant; so to organize the vast consumers' power of this group as to secure wide economic independence through the exchange of services and the exchange and manufacture of goods. Through these methods, to train the American Negroes so that they will realize in their own group and realize at first, the kind of social reformation which the whole world is bound to come to some day And above all to stop this great people from being ashamed of itself, of its color and history; of living together and working together and to realize that race segregation is the white man's loss and not the black man's damnation.

49-16-27

SOCIAL PLANNING FOR THE NEGRO,
PAST AND PRESENT

From the day of the Negro's landing in the United States down to the present, there have been 4 well-defined plans of emancipation and social uplift. The first plan was naturally that of violence; the individual and organized resistance to slavery. The extent of this is usually misapprehended in the United States because the plan began in Africa and the West Indies and only its last efforts were extended to the mainland. Henry M. Stanley estimates that "in the African slave ~~returns~~ raids for every slave captured, at least 4 persons were left dead in the villages, and where the cause of Negro slavery was inter-tribal war, the toll of death was even greater. On the middle passage to America there were repeated efforts at mutiny in the 18th and 19th Centuries, down to the celebrated cases of the "Amistad" and the "Creole".

The Negroes once landed in the Western world were for many years a cause of turmoil. Ovando solicited that no Negro slaves be sent to Haiti for "they fled among the Indians and taught them bad customs and could never be captured." The story of the fugitive Maroons in South America and Jamaica is one of the sagas of modern history. They fought the English government for a ~~thousand~~ hundred years; they resisted the Spanish and Portuguese and they achieved freedom which continues to our day in Haiti and Guiana.

The fear of slave violence on the American mainland is sufficiently proven by the legislation. The laws of South Carolina in 1712 were defended as necessary "to restrain the disorders, rapines and inhumanity to which they are naturally prone and inclined." The law of 1740 declared that "many late, ~~horrible~~ horrible and barbarous massacres have actually been committed and many more designed on the white inhabitants of this province by Negro slaves." ~~Help~~ Harsh and pitiless legislation based on these premises continued during slavery and especially was revived and ~~performed~~ increased after the attempts of Vesey and Nat Turner.

~~A third and much more successful plan of legislation to slavery, however, soon came to act as the safety valve against violence, but~~ We must not forget that the ~~recent~~ last effective act of violence which the slaves used was their mass movement during the ~~time of~~ the Civil War year which added 200,000 soldiers and even larger numbers of servants and laborers to the ~~American troops during the war~~ Union armies. It was this actual adherence of slaves to the Union cause and the threat that it would be extended indefinitely that made the Civil War hopeless for the South and led to its sudden cessation.

The third plan which ~~I mentioned~~ acted as the safety valve for slavery was that of the fugitive slave, and it was by far the most successful attack on slavery and began a real social re-organization for the Negro. In a comparatively empty country, the individual slave who could not and would not endure the system would not have to wait until he got the assent and support of a larger number of his fellows. He could steal away to the swamps of Florida and Virginia and along the Appalachian Mountains and the Mississippi Valley into the North. This running away of slaves was ~~the~~ first ~~for~~ an individual enterprise; then it became organized and systematized under Negro leaders and finally gained the co-operation and active help of whites during the era of the Underground Railroad.

The Underground Railroad led to the Civil War. It meant that the capital invested in slaves was continually suffering losses and the slave owners demanded more and more peremptorily the enactment of severe fugitive slave laws. The last one which they secured on the eve of the Civil War, not only interfered with individual rights, but state rights. It led to retaliatory nullification in the North, intensified the bitterness between the sections and eventually resulted in Civil War.

It is difficult to say how many slaves escaped, but ~~if we remember that~~ the black population of the North increased from 130,000 in 1820 to 345,000 in 1860; ~~we must note that~~ this is a considerably larger increase than ~~in the case~~ that of the total Negro population and ~~if we remember that~~ this Northern group was composed of poor emigrants with broken family life and insecure economic basis suddenly transferred from city to town, it seems certain that ~~between~~ at least 100,000 ~~and 200,000~~ of them were fugitives from slavery and represented a loss of at least $25,000,000 in invested capital and perhaps much more than that. It was this economic loss that spurred secession.

41-9-82

Meantime there were especial centers of runaway slaves. There were the fugitive slaves at the time of the Revolutionary War who not only took part in the hostilities, but caused infinite difficulties in peace negotiations. There were the 1,000 Negroes, who in 1815 manned a former British port in Georgia and resisted the power of the United States and finally there were the so-called Seminole wars which were simply slave ~~riots~~ raids for runaway property.

Beside these efforts, there were more far-reaching efforts to settle the Negro problem by mass migration. A proposal to leave this country for Africa seemed logical in the 18th Century when so many Negroes were newly come to the country. This plan was not simply a plan of white folk. Paul Cuffe was actually the first person who successfully transported ~~slaves~~ emigrants, taking 38 Negroes to Africa at his own expense. Later, came the American Colonization Society, but the plan for wholesale migration ~~which it had also swelled~~ was spoiled by the effort of the radical South to turn this migration into an attempt to bolster slavery by getting rid of free Negroes. Nevertheless, out of that effort, together with the attempt to enforce the slave trade laws, came the settlement at Liberia.

Among the free Negroes of the North, plans for social amelioration began about 1830 when the Nat Turner insurrection in the South and the new foreign immigration to the North, made the economic situation of the free Negroes difficult. Riots and discriminatory laws in Ohio and Pennsylvania led to the Conventions of 1830, 1831 and to a well thought-out plan of migration. The British government was approached and offered an asylum, at first in Canada and later, after the West Indian emancipation, in the West Indies. The Canadian migration was financed by Negroes themselves and large numbers went to Ontario where they built up successful settlements. They were headquarters of the Underground railroad. Their influence on American Negroes has been great. It was here that John Brown went to perfect his plans for the Harper Ferry raids, and it was here that Richard B. Harrison was born.

41-9-23

Between 1830 and 1860, the situation of American Negroes became increasingly difficult because of the spread of the abolition controversy and the rise of the cotton kingdom. An increasing number of Negroes in the 50's began to consider that wholesale migration was the only escape. They saw no chance of emancipation in the United States. Even Frederick Douglass placed his whole hope on war and blood, but, nevertheless, steadfastly opposed migration.

In 1854, a remarkable convention met in Cleveland, Ohio. They made 3 proposals: Martin R. Delaney proposed migration to the Niger Valley of Africa, James M. Whitfield proposed to go to Central America and Theodore Holly to Haiti. They not only made these propositions, but they actually made the necessary investigation and at the next colonization convention in Canada in 1856, Holly made a report which resulted, eventually, in 2,000 Negro emigrants going to Haiti. Delaney concluded 8 treaties with African kings and brought evidences of land concessions and welcome. Whitfield did not actually get to Central America before the Civil War broke out.

The war stopped migration schemes, until black fugitives began to pour into the Union armies. For a while, Lincoln did not realize the significance of this tremendous accession of power to the North and withdrawal of labor force from the South. The first problem, and an irritating problem it was, was what was going to be done to get rid of the Negroes. If some plan of mass migration could be devised there was the possibility not simply of withdrawing these slaves from work in the South, but of inducing the Border States to give up slavery. Lincoln had long been an advocate of colonization. He said frankly that he could not conceive Negroes and white people living together in the United States as equals. He, therefore, secured in 1861 an appropriation of $100,000 from Congress and a further appropriation of $500,000 in 1862. He consulted delegations of Negroes and made contacts with foreign countries, but before he went further, he suddenly saw just what the significance of Negro soldiers and laborers was. He saw that without their help, the war against the South could not be won, while with their help and the threat of increased accessions from the slaves, the opposition in the South was doomed. Moreover, he became convinced that mass migration of the Negroes could not be carried on with their consent nor at a price which the United States was willing to pay. His one venture with 500 Negro sellers on a little island near Haiti was a disastrous failure and nearly half the victims died of disease and were cheated outrageously by the white manager. Then came the era of Reconstruction and with the thrill of political power in the minds of the Negro and his friends, social Reconstruction by migration was practically given up, except that Negroes moved in considerable groups from place to place in the South in order to find free land and better working conditions. When, however, the revolution of 1876 came and the Negro by force and fraud was disfranchised, a great migration movement to the West was conceived by Henry Adams in Louisiana and Benjamin Singleton in Tennessee. Some 50,000 Negroes actually migrated to Kansas and the West and it took conciliation and violence in the South to stop the stream. Its more effectual stoppage, however, was due to poverty and ~~lack of~~ cold welcome in the West. Nevertheless, a Negro ~~colony~~ population was planted in Kansas and its descendants remain there. Later, Bishop Turner, and the Congressman Morgan of Alabama, tried to revive the project of migration to Africa, but its only result was 1 shiplead of 200 Negroes in 1885. On the other hand, the migration of Negroes from South to North has gone on continuously since the Civil War. Between 1880 and 1900, some 10,000 to 20,000 a year went into the North, while from 1910 to 1930, between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 moved in one of the great mass movements of the history of migration.

h-8-1-h

Meantime, the fourth great plan for the social emancipation of Negroes began with the Reconstruction efforts in the Civil War. From 1867-1876, the Negroes placed their whole hope of full emancipation and economic security upon their vote and this forms one of the most interesting episodes in American history. It was not simply the enfranchisement of black folk, it was the attempt to reconstruct the basis of American democracy and to put the political power in the hands of the lowest working group. If this group had had leadership and a greater chance for industrial development, there might would have ensued in the South a dictatorship of the proletariat which might have led the modern world. But, of course, these laborers themselves were under the direction and ideology of a capitalistic form of industry. Their idea of emancipation was the rise of an exploiting class of black capitalists. Nevertheless, their realistic grasp of the situation led them to efforts to make the situation of the emancipated workers as advantageous as possible. They tried co-operation, farms in Louisiana and state division of large plantations in South Carolina. They advocated and made actual free public school education in every Southern state. They gave opportunity for the poor man, not only to vote, but to represent his class in the legislature and the greatest charge against Reconstruction that the legislature was filled by people who did not pay taxes, was really its greatest worry. The non-tax-paying laborer was the man who for a long time dominated the legislature with both white and black representatives. There were, however, 2 unconquerable centers of opposition: one was the white landholder, who despite the fortunes of war, was enabled to continue his monopoly of the land through the determination of Andrew Johnson. It was one of the ironies of fate that the poor white who was the author of the legislation which distributed free land to the peasants of Europe and the North, was also the man, who succeeded in keeping the emancipated Negroes of the South as landless serfs.

The second unconquerable center of opposition was the new capitalism of the North which was rising to tremendous and ruthless power. This new capitalism looked upon the South not as a center of a new democracy, but as a center of exploitation. So long as the Southern land monopolist threatened the power and career of the Northern industrialists, he was perfectly willing to let black and white labor have its way in the South. But when Southern labor began to increase its demands and power, and on the other hand, the Southern landholder showed himself ~~perfectly~~ willing to unite with the Northern capitalists ~~on new deals~~ in new exploitation, the bargain of 1876 was ~~kept~~ made and the laborers, white and black, were disfranchised. over

41-9-86

However, the plan for Negro emancipation by political means did not end in 1876. The Negro held on to vestiges of his political power, first, by black congressmen, up until the beginning of the 20th Century, by a few members of ~~the~~ Southern legislatures and especially by ~~the~~ their power inside the Republican Party. This latter power, ~~however,~~ was gradually undermined by the fact that it ~~gradually~~ had back of it less and less of real ~~Democratic support~~ control and, therefore, could more easily be ~~secured~~ reduced by bribery and manipulation. ~~The power, therefore, dwindled until the 65 Negro delegates of 1918 were reduced to 49 in 1928.~~

Appointments of Negroes to Federal office also became less in number, as Reconstruction receded. Nevertheless there were certain compensations in the North. Negroes appeared in the legislature of 11 or 12 Northern states and sometimes played a conspicuous part. They were elevated to the judicial bench in the District of Columbia and 3 other states, and in cities, particularly like Chicago, New York and ~~New York~~, they occupied positions of real power. The result of this political influence can be shown in many ways. Between 1884 and 1897, 25 civil rights laws, in addition to the national civil rights law, were passed in 16 Northern states. Many of them, including the national law, were emasculated by judicial interpretation, ~~while~~ but others, like the Massachusetts and New York laws, are effective today. Federal appropriations for Negro education in the case of Howard University and the land grant colleges have been secured, ~~and~~ On the other hand, further discriminatory legislation has been held up. Jim-Crow cars have been kept out of Delaware, West Virginia and Missouri and partially out of Maryland. A flood of anti-racial inter-marriage laws introduced in 1913 in Congress and 12 different states were defeated in every instance but one. On the other hand,

What ensued in the South after emancipation was not at all the classical bourgeois revolution but something far more complicated and reactionary in the South, "Jim-Crow" legislation and disfranchisement laws between 1881 and 1910 swept through with little opposition. ¶ It became clearer and clearer as the plan of political power to emancipate the American Negro was followed, that something was lacking; that the poverty and inexperience of the Negro made it impossible for him to exercise his political power in full and that as a minority, even then he could not succeed unless he could make some alliance with the majority. There ensued, therefore, two plans which both explain and supplement the plan of political power from 1867-1930. ¶ One of these movements came ~~from~~ in 1896-1920 and it sought firmly to integrate the American Negro into American industry as a farmer, laborer, skilled artisan and capitalist. The other movement, sought by agitation and legal defense, to clear away race discrimination and allow untrammeled advancement of black folk according to ability. These 2 latter movements fell into bitter centroversy. The economic movement ended with the World War and the anti-discrimination movement declined with the depression ~~and both these movements before they ended tended gradually to coalesce the principle while employing different methods.~~ ¶ The plan of social Reconstruction advocated by Booker T. Washington was not simply a plan for the uplift of labor as is so often assumed, and it can be only understood as we consider its ~~go back to the~~ immediate background. The late William H. Baldwin, President of the Long Island Railroad and slated to be President of the Pennsylvania , was a young man trained in Southern industry and he was one of the first to conceive of the training of ~~a party~~ of black laborers who should share work with white laborers and at the same time keep the white labor movement from too strong and insistent demands in its fight with capital. ¶ This idea began in the day when the "one big union" of the Knights of Labor had changed to the craft unionism of the American Federation of Labor. The strength of the labor movement was growing but ~~it~~ almost without exception it excluded black skilled labor. However, ~~now~~, black skilled labor was valuable and could be ~~organized and~~ trained in the South, ~~it was~~ Mr. Baldwin's ~~idea~~ idea was gradually growing that you would not only do a service and open opportunity for black folk, but you would in this same way serve as a hold white labor in check. ¶ About this time, Booker T. Washington took charge of Tuskegee in Alabama. He was an opportunist with high ideals. He believed in political rights for people who could exercise them but in the case of ~~the~~ Southern Negroes as, he knew that they could not exercise them without ~~present danger~~ the consent of the white South. He took the position, therefore, that the Negro must gain an economic status before he could use his political rights and in this he was undoubtedly right; but on the other hand, his idea of the economic status which Negroes must gain was based ~~especially and~~ unquestionably on the capitalistic organization of the United States.

41-9-862

Mr. Washington's program included a temporary acquiescence in giving up Negro political rights and agitation for civil rights and insistence upon training young Negroes for farming and industry. The plan was launched by the Atlanta Speech in 1896 and was triumphant from that date until about 1910. It included alliance with white capital and was rewarded by large contributions toward Negro education, especially such schools as conformed to the Hampton-Tuskegee type. As a first step toward this new Negro capitalism, Mr. Washington especially stressed landholding, widespread peasant proprietorship and even large farms among Negroes; and then a training of Negro laborers and artisans for use in industry at a wage necessarily less than that demanded by union labor. The result of this compromise was new understanding between leading elements, North and South, with regard to the Negro. The Negro college, while not entirely discouraged, was looked upon with some suspicion and positions for Negro college graduates became difficult. To some extent, appointments and opportunities for young Negroes were carefully censored and referred for approval to Tuskegee over a very wide extent of country. Negro newspapers were brought in line by judicious advertising and other means of control. This was really regarded as clever and far-sighted compromise, which if it did not solve would at least peacefully postpone the solution of a baffling, intricate problem of race contact until more favorable times. Between 1900-1910, Mr. Washington became one of the most popular men in America, in constant demand North and South as a speaker, adviser and referee.

As the current opinion of the land became unified, Mr. Washington's program began to become increasingly suspicious in the eyes of Negroes. A wave of Jim-Crow legislation and disfranchising bills swept over the South and the Border States. Already separation of the races in travel had been made compulsory in 8 Southern states before 1891, but had paused. Now a new wave of legislation began in 1898 and covered South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland and Oklahoma. Determined and repeated efforts were made in Missouri, West Virginia and Delaware. Disfranchising laws swept over the South and Border States, from 1890-1910, at the very time when Negro political power and agitation had been lulled to its lowest by the Washington compromise. This triumph of the radical, anti-Negro South and the continued prevalence of lynching which went on at the rate of 1 to 2 a week during most of Mr. Washington's career, greatly embarrassed him. He hated caste and lawlessness as much as any man. He wanted the best for his people, but he ~~impatiently~~ plaintively believed that once his economic program could be put through all else would follow. and he made the fatal mistake of trying to forestall criticism from Negroes and of acquiescing in the neglect if not the suppression of Negro colleges.

41-9-88

The result was the outburst of wrath and criticism led by the younger college-bred Negro group, an outburst which eventually split the Negro group in twain. But it was not that criticism that doomed the Washington program. It was the plain failure of the economic re-building which I emphasized. This is shown by the trend of Negro employment, despite the effort of both Hampton and Tuskegee to train farmers and servants, both of these decreased in number. Farmers, instead of forming 57% of the workers, as in 1890, now formed 37%. Servants have decreased from 31% in 1890 to 22% in 1920. Since then, they have increased to 29%. Manifestly, then, there were forces at work to drive the Negroes off the farm and out of the servant quarters. On the other hand, the number of Negroes in commerce and transportation and in the manufacturing and mechanical industries, increased largely from 10% in 1890 to 29% in 1930, but it was not at all the kind of increase that Mr. Washington had in mind. The newcomers were mainly laborers. They made some headway into the semi-skilled and skilled industries, but were kept out by the trade unions and the trade unions held against them as an excuse the fact that they had been trained and that the plan had been to train them as strikebreakers and low-cost laborers. The caste system in the South increased the whole idiology of caste throughout the United States until laboring men felt themselves degraded to work with blackmen. Moreover, the attempt of Negroes to enter the employing class as merchants and landholders was made impossible by severe competition and monopoly. The attempt to teach Negroes the skill of modern industry was also frustrated by the changing of skill, the mass production, the use of machinery. While, therefore, land ownership among Negroes and the accumulation of property increased until 1910, it then began to decrease and the increase in Negro property, while a creditable index of thrift, was dwarfted by the immense piling up of capital in the hands of whites. Without doubt, the Washington program improved the economic status of the Negro, but on the other hand, and just as surely, it did not show a way out because it fasten the change of exploitation on Negro labor and increased labor antagonism in the laboring classes.

This was particularly shown int he new development in the South where white labor used its political and social influence to replace black labor and eliminate the so-called Negro jobs. At the time of the depression, therefore, the status of Negro labor, both North and South, was precarious, through the opposition of unions and the discrimination of employers in the North and the competition of poor white labor in the South.

The next plan for social re-organization was that of agitation of legal defense. It was at first a part of the plan for political power and not a demand for fixing the unconstitutionality of disfranchisement legislation and the enforcing of war amendments. On of the earliest group movements to agitate for this was the National League formed in Boston in 1885. It was local in its membership but had some influence.

In 1887, T. Thomas Fortune, editor of what is now the NEW YORK AGE, issued an appeal for a national organization and repeated this in 1889. The so-called Afro-American League, afterward changed to Afro-American Council, met in Chicago with 21 states represented in January, 1890. J. C. Price was President and Mr. Fortune, Secretary. The League held another meeting in Tennessee and then died until Bishop Walters revived it in 1898. It met that year in September at Rochester and later in November in Washington. The object of the organization was to investigate lynching, to test the constitutionality of discriminatory laws, to secure civil rights legislation, to promote migration from the South and to encourage organization. It met for several years and practically died with a final meeting in St. Paul, Minnesota about 1900. Its weakness was that it consisted simply of an annual meeting without a continuous working organization. The result was that it did little more than meet, organize, and pass resolutions. In the year 1905, a new aspect came over the plans for American Negroes for social Reconstruction. The young college man began to pass under the dictatorship of the Tuskegee machine and the possibility of expressing even legitimate or temporary criticism. The opposition was crystalized by the jailing

41-2-89

CHAPTER IV.

10 A.

The new disfranchisement laws and the wave of discriminatory legislation, coupled with Mr. Washington's concessions, alarmed the colored people. Particularly the young colored college man began to fear the dictatorship of the Tuskegee machine and the difficulty of expressing even legitimate criticism. This opposition was crystalized by the jailing of Monroe Trotter in Boston for trying to heckle Mr. Washington during a speech of the colored church. It seems to me that this was going too far and that while Trotter was much more bitter and outspoken than was necessary, yet he did have a right to talk even though he criticized Mr. Washington. The result was that a call was issued in June, 1905, signed by 59 men from 17 states. In July, 1905, 29 of these men, representing 14 states, met at Niagara Falls and formed the Niagara movement. The movement grew and in 1906 held a significant meeting at Harpers Ferry. The Manifesto which it sent out was plain and bitter.

41-9-90

CHAPTER IV.

10 C

41-9-71

10 D

" The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People seeks to uplift the colored men and women of this country by securing to them the full enjoyment of their rights as citizens, justice in all courts, and equality of opportunity everywhere. It favors and aims to aid, every kind of education among them save that which teaches special privileges or prerogative, class or caste. It recognizes the national character of the Negro problem and no sectionalism. It believes in the holding of the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln. It upholds the doctrine of "all men up and no man down." It abhors Negro crime, but still more the conditions which breed crime, and most of all the crimes committed by mobs in the mockery of thelaw, by individuals in the name of the law.

" It believes that the scientific truths of the Negro problem must be available before the country can see its way wholly clear to right existing wrongs. It has no other belief than that the best way to uplift the colored man and the best way to aid the white man to peace is social content; it has no other desire than exacting justice, and no other motive than patriotism. ".

(First Annual Report, January 1, 1911.)
N.A.A.C.P.

41-9-92

The Niagara movement, however, had certain inherent difficulties. First, it was a racial movement of men entirely unknown outside their group and with no means of contact by which they could easily reach influential persons in the white group. And secondly, Mr. Trotter, who owned and edited the one organization journal, was not an organization man. He was an extreme individualist. When, therefore, in 1909 there was held a conference in New York with practically the same program that the Niagara movement had, practically all of the leading members of the Niagara movement went into the N.A.A.C.P., 7 of them going upon its Board of Directors and thus to a large measure the work of the Niagara movement became merged with that of the N. A. A. C. P.

41-9-93

of Monroe Trotter when he and George Forbes bitterly attacked Mr. Washington in their new paper, " THE BOSTON GUARDIAN" and Trotter was eventually put in jail because he tried to heckle Mr. Washington during his speech at Zion Church, Boston. It seemed to many of us who were then young that this was going too far; that while Trotter was much more bitter and out-spoken than most of us, that he did have a right to talk and that a man must not be put in jail because he talked against Mr. Washington. The result was that in June, 1905, a call was sent out from Atlanta, Georgia to a few, select persons "for organizing determination and aggressive action on the part of men who believe in Negro freedom and growth." A conference was proposed "to oppose firmly cheap methods of strangling honest criticism." Fifty-nine men from 17 states eventually signed the call and 29 men from 14 states went to Niagara Falls in July, 1906 and formed the Niagara movement. The movement grew and in 1908 had a great and significant meeting at Harpers Ferry. It might not be out of place to read the manifesto issued at that meeting.

The Niagara movement, however, had certain inherent difficulties. First, it was a racial movement of men entirely unknown outside their group and with no means of contact by which they could easily reach influential persons in the white group. And secondly, Mr. Trotter, who owned and edited the one organization journal, was not an organization man. He was an extreme individualist. When, therefore, in 1909 there was held a conference in New York with practically the same program that the Niagara movement had, practically all of the leading members of the Niagara movement went into the N.A.A.C.P., 7 of them going upon its Board of Directors and thus to a large measure the work of the Niagara movement became merged with that of the N. A. A. C. P. The work of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is too well-known to call for review here. I need only point out that its greatest triumph was in the matter of legal defense. Practically, it made the Supreme Court for the first time in the history of the country affirm the validity of the 15th Amendment, outlaw the Grandfather Clauses and curtail the segregation ordinances. It also secured some protection for accused Negroes from mob violence and made the most effective anti-lynching campaign in the history of the country. Its weakness and the cause of its decline was the inability to see that the economic program of Mr. Washington had failed because it was not the program of the mass of Negro laborers, but a program which tried not the capitalistic exploitation which was the backbone of the economic structure of America.

The first sign of change that faced the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was falling off of its income and the decrease in the circulation of THE CRISIS. This was not due to the fact that the American Negro did not want to fight discrimination and lynching and was not willing to pursue cases in legal defense which should build up the foundation of the whole caste system in marriage, in travel and in education. But it did come from the fact that the colored people, economically, were unable to stand the expense. It had been the proud boast of the N.A.A.C.P. that beginning as a quasi philanthropic institution, expecting to rely upon funds furnished mainly by white friends, it had become during its best years supported in the main by the mass of colored ~~people~~ workers and THE CRISIS had been made financially independent by the same kind of support. The amounts of money which it received from rich white people were small and their withdrawal would have made no particular difference in its program. The falling off, now, of this income meant that the colored people were financially unable to sustain this program and especially to back its expansion. We realized this before the depression and the causes lay in a new industrial development, North and South. In the South, the Negro was losing the monopoly of certain jobs which he had had. The machine was displacing semi-skilled and skilled labor among both Negroes and whites. A new monopoly of capital and materials was so changing the face of industry that the Negro was becoming a reservoir of casual labor and the general causes of the collapse of agriculture throughout the world were at work in increased degree among Negro farmers. The mass migration of Negroes North alleviated but did not change the basic trouble. They found themselves in the midst of difficulties connected with housing, difficulties connected with unions, difficulties connected with the ~~careful~~ casual character of their labor and the low wage for which they were obliged to work. This should have taught the Negroes of the United States that a change of tactic was absolutely necessary. Agitation and legal defense must be kept up so far as possible but that possibly at present had its limitations. Before them and of more importance and of fundamental influence even to the campaign against race discrimination, was a new plan of social security. I began to advocate, therefore, for the N. A. A. C. P. a new social program as early as 1928. I was by no means clear in my own thinking, but was groping for light and for that reason visited Russia, began the study of Karl Marx and voted the Socialist ticket. My efforts brought little reaction, no particular opposition and at the same time no emphasis of agreement until the wave of depression overwhelmed us. Then, suddenly, there came to the fore, a peculiar situation made by the fact that ~~which is still apparently unsolved and that is~~ the problem of race discrimination always cuts across and hinders the settlement of other problems, ^ we are repeatedly forced to give up direct attack when it orders save our very lives

It happened in the Civil War, in the midst of a fight for physical freedom, civil and political rights, the Negro was suddenly faced with the problem of fighting in the ~~a civil war and~~ when the outcome was by no means clear nor was it altogether certain just where his interest lay. He was compelled for a time to lay aside his racial demands to become Union soldiers and laborers and afterward was rewarded by ~~afterward~~ receiving a greater measure of political power and civil rights than he had dreamed of. The same kind of dilemma came at the time of the World War.

41-9-96

We had no choice between War & peace — The nation was rushing headlong We had no allies save a few a small group of thinkers who for the most part were not interested in Negroes. Labor was near unanimous for war & so were most Socialists here & abroad. ~~Our only choice was~~ we were in a raging flood & our only real choice was to fight swimming with the current or to be drowned. An impotent objection & cries then & under similar circumstances would say again close Ranks & fight for our own liberty while the world ~~fight for~~ was Communistic suicide

The victim of mob violence, lynching and residential segregation ~~was asked to fight on the side of the Allies and~~ for a time he had to concentrate his efforts toward securing decent treatment of his segregated regiments, an opportunity ~~of Negroes~~ for men to become officers, even if they were blind and permission to fight at the front instead of work blindly in the rear. ~~Yet~~ After the World War, ~~he~~ the Negro was able to return to his attack upon prejudice with increased power and efficiency. ~~Today there is before us something of the same thing only it has vaster implications.~~ Other We are in the midst of a national and world movement to reconstruct the basis of industry. In order to be efficient co-workers in this Reconstruction, we have got to escape the present ~~wide~~ threat of starvation, to conserve our schools and social organizations and to get regular, decently paid work. With that foundation settled, even in a reasonable degree, we can begin again to fight discrimination. But until unemployment among American Negroes is decreased and a decent standard of living re-established, we have no resources upon which the battle against discrimination can effectively be carried ~~on~~. Here, then, is the dilemma and how has it been met? Briefly put, there have been 3 moves: (1) toward invoking the protection of restored capitalism, (2) a movement toward alliance with organized labor, and (3) a movement toward socialism.

In the first category may be placed practically all of the older organizations: the Urban League, the Federation of Churches, the N. A. A. C. P. ~~At the same time,~~ Nearly all of these organizations have to be sure shown signs of uneasiness at their position. The Urban League organized a National Economic Council, which through an executive committee and Workers' Council, was designed to guide the Negro through the crisis. (Apparently this never functioned) The N.A.A.C.P. sought to adopt an economic program but was unable to agree on anything definite or authoritative. ~~The Federation of Churches has adopted a liberal labor program but has not applied it to Negroes~~ Gradually, most of these and many other organizations ~~and many others~~ under the guidance

Social Planning for the Negro:
Past and Present.

of depression overwhelmed us. Then, suddenly, it came to the fore, a peculiar situation which is still comparatively unsolved and that is the problem of race discrimination always rube across and hinders the settlement of other problems.

It happened in the Civil War, in the midst of a fight for physical freedom, civil and political rights, the negro was suddenly faced with the problem of fighting in

The years from 1919 to 1929 represent a high water mark of our organized strivings for increased political power, the enthusiasm of agitation & legal defense.

The wrongs to be righted seemed limited to the fact that the cause for which we made voluntarily committed & fight dearly failed in its long victory and cast us back all men, workers & owners, in the maelstrom of World Depression. Today then our original paradox again appears with new complications & broader fields of the Joint Committee on Recovery, began a drive on the administration to secure justice for the Negro in relief; but the difficulty was in finding for these various organizations any unified plan for future guidance. Ten of the organizations were religious, 4 were academic fraternities and sororities, 1 is a fraternal order, 1 an organization for agitation and reform, 4 organizations of professional men, 1 designed for group work and 3 industrial organizations. The only thing upon which this conglomery could wholeheartedly unite was the matter of discrimination. Of the facts of discrimination, the Joint Committee has furnished adequate and commendable proof, but as to what we are going to do about it, the Joint Committee, quite naturally, has nothing to say and nothing to think. Everything that has happened, practically, might easily be foretold before the NRA If the United States government comes in to the depression picture to administer actual local relief, that relief must be directly carried out by local people and these local people in the places where Negroes are most numerous are going to be prejudiced and narrow.

If the government is going to relief the farmer by a scarcity program or bonuses, the people who are going to reap the benefit from that program are going to be the people who own the land. If the government is going to establish a great power organization with towns and industries, in these towns and industries there is going to be repeated the same pattern of discrimination and segregation that is current in the nation. If we are going to have housing projects, subsistence homesteads, farm credit and credit unions, we are going to find in the carrying out of these plans the same American prejudice against color that we find everywhere. The one thing, therefore, that we are bound to do in self-defense is to see that in the midst of all this we secure such beginnings of economic security that in the future we shall have power to work out our destiny, and to this everything else is subordinate. If segregated homesteads and segregated land will give us more secure employment and higher wage, we cannot for a moment hesitate. If segregated schools will give us better education, then we must have segregated schools. If segregated housing will give us decent homes, we have no right to choose for our children and our families slums for the sake of herding with the unfit. Our first business is in the midst of the great economic revolution which is going on to secure a place for ourselves.

To this, the advocates of labor alliance answer: there is only one haven of refuge for the American Negro. He must recognize that his attempt to enter the ranks of capital as an exploiter came too late. He is now forever excluded by the extraordinary monopoly which white capital and credit have upon the machines and materials of the world. Moreover, that solution after all was possible only for the few. The great mass of ~~laborers~~ Negroes belong to the laboring class. They have the same interests that white laborers have. They must join the white labor movement. This, however, is not nearly as easy as it might seem. Not only has the attempt of American Negroes to join the ranks of the white labor movement been discouraging for more than a century, but even today, the welcome which they are accorded is questionable. In the first place, the farmers and servants who compose the mass of ~~American~~ workers, ~~particularly~~ among colored people, are not organized. If we take the 30,000,000 of organizable labor, no less than 7,000,000 are organized, even if we include the company unions. If we take ~~that~~ the less than 5,000,000 who are organized, the overwhelming majority of them will not allow the Negroes to join their ranks under any circumstances and most of the rest have only allowed Negroes to intrude when the power of Negro labor was such that they did not dare to oppose its competition. There are, undoubtedly, today a number of unions which are disposed to welcome Negro members and who recognize something of the real solidarity of labor interests; but their total number must be less than half a million. With ~~those~~ such workers, Negro ~~workers~~ labor ought by all means to unite; but to say that the union of American Negro labor, with 1/2 million out of 5,000,000 organized laborers, is a labor alliance, is seriously to overstate the case.

41-9-98

Suppose, now, that the Negro turns to the promise of socialism whither I have long ~~turned~~ looked for salvation. (I was once a member of the celebrated Local No 1 in New York.) I am convinced of the essential truth of the Marxian philosophy and believe that eventually land, machines and materials must belong to the state, that private profit must be abolished, that the system of exploiting labor must disappear, and that people who work must have essentially equal income and that in their hands the political rulership of the state must eventually rest.

Notwithstanding the fact that I believe this is the truth and that this truth is being gradually exemplified by the Russian experiment, I must, nevertheless, ask myself ~~carefully~~ seriously: how far can American Negroes forward this eventual end? What part can they expect to have in a socialistic state and what can they do now to bring about its realization? And my answer to this has long been clear. One of the worst ~~and last~~ things that ~~they~~ Negroes could do today would be ~~for them~~ to join the American Communist party or any of its many branches. The Communists of America have become dogmatic exponents of the inspired word of Karl Marx as they read it. They believe, apparently, in immediate, violent and bloody revolution and they are willing to try any and all means of raising hell anywhere and under any circumstances. This is a silly program even for white men. For American colored men, it is suicide. In the first place, its logical basis is by no means sound. The great and fundamental change in the organization of industry which Karl Marx with his splendid mind and untiring sacrifice visualized, must, to be sure, be brought about by revolution, but whether in all times and places and under all circumstances that revolution is going to involve war and bloodshed, is a question which every sincere follower of Marx has a right to ~~pose~~ doubt

(over)

66-6-14

The most baffling paradox today is the attitude of men toward war. On the one hand, we have the advocates of radical reform in our fundamental, economic and political structure, insisting that the only path to this era of Peace and Justice is through violent revolution. On the other hand, we have the advocates of the present system insisting that they can only insure peace by world-wide preparation for the same kind of war which recently took the lives of ten million men.

The ordinary man seeking peace has, then, apparently, not a choice between Peace and War, but only a choice of the kind of war in which he will fight and the object for which he will fight and apparently he must strive to make this last great murder of the West, this new War to end War, as peaceful and reasonable as possible.

Leaving for a moment the question as to how inevitable this dilemma is, we American Negroes under the race hate now prevalent, will in any case stand between the two armies as buffer and victim, pawn and peon; and we can only take this attitude:

We abhor violence and blood shed. We will join no movement that advocates a program of violence, except as the last defense against aggression.

We see today as the chief aggressor and threatener of violence, not communism, but greed and reaction, masquerading as patriotism and Fascism, armed to the teeth, intolerant and ready to kill and repress not only those who oppose them, but those who dare to express opposing thoughts.

Such discrimination, represented in the United States by various patriotic women's organizations, by war veterans' leagues, by the army and navy andits friends, ~~these~~ are the most dangerous advocates of war and murder; and it is foolish for those who believe in world Peace and economic Justice to be so misled by this reaction as to burst into wild words and futile deeds and thus give greed a chance to kill the innocent.

Granted that the Marxian dialectic is a masterful statement of a great truth, yet the Revolution which it sets down as inevitable, may logically, even if not probably, come by votes without violence, by restricted violence, or if with widespread violence, not with cruelty and unnecessary bloodshed. They are fools who think that successful and beneficial revolution consists primarily in raising the devil and it is very doubtful if such persons will ever lead America to Peace and Justice. It may well be that in the awful and fundamental changes to come, calm, silent and compassionate men may be compelled to lead the world to peace through irresistible force but never through irresponsible deviltry.

In any real revolution, every step that saves violence is to the glory of the great end. We may not save all, but we may never forget that revolution is not the object of socialism or communism rightly conceived; that then object is justice and if happily the world can find that justice without blood, the world is the infinite gainer. Persistent and dominant denial of this possibility may be made and may be true, but wise men will never cease to seek it. We black men say, therefore, we do not believe in violence. Our object is justice not violence and we will fight only when there is no better way.

The proletariat which stands for violence is that proletariat which becomes the tool to carry out capitalistic violence. The first duty of workers is not to fight but to convince themselves that union of workers, class solidarity, is better than force and a substitute for it.

The real problem, then, is this concept the workers. The real emphasis today is not on revolution but on class consciousness and this is the job of socialism and the first moral of conversion is the abolition of race prejudice.

41-9-100

In 1848, when the Communist Manifesto was written, the united laboring class was weak physically before the power of the owners. Today, the workers are the physical backbone of the owners' power. They mann their armies and navies and police; conviction and determination on their part, a general strike such as the English partially succeeded in carrying out, shows the possibility of the future.

It is the duty of socialism to battle the war psychologically and not to promote it. Early Christianity with its battle hymns and war metaphors made the same ghastly mistake,-- "Its blood-red banners streams afar" ~~today.~~ down to our own day

If, now, reaction toward capitalism can no more save Negroes ~~than that which~~ today than it could in the past, and if the opportunity to ally the Negro with white labor has been limited in the past and while wider today is still too limited for effective action and if a program of avowed violence is out of the question, what can the Negro do? This brings me really to the end of my part of this program, but I may say for the benefit and attack of my good friend, Mr. Harris, to my mind, this is our program: so to organize the Negro group that within it, labor and the interests of labor shall be dominate; so to organize the real consumers' power of this group as to secure economic independence through the exchange of services and the exchange and manufacture of goods. Through these methods, to train the American Negroes so that they will realize in their own group and realize at first the kind of social reformation which the whole world is bound to come to some day. And above all to stop this great people from being ashamed of nearly of its color + history; of living together + working together + to realize that race segregation is the while means loss + not the black means damnation

41-9-101

608

SOCIAL PLANNING FOR THE NEGRO, PAST AND PRESENT.

From the day of the Negro's landing in the United States down to the present, there have been 4 well-defined plans of emancipation and social uplift. The first plan was naturally that of violence; the individual and organized resistance to slavery. The extent of this is usually misapprehended in the United States because the plan began in Africa and the West Indies and only its last efforts were extended to the mainland. Henry M. Stanley estimates that in the African slave raids, for every slave captured, at least 4 persons ~~were left~~ lay dead in the villages; and where the cause of Negro slavery was inter-tribal war, the toll of death was even greater. On the middle passage to America there were repeated efforts at mutiny in the 18th and 19th Centuries, down to the celebrated cases of the "Amistad" and the "Creole".

The Negroes once landed in the Western world were for many years a cause of turmoil. Ovando solicited that no more Negro slaves be sent to Haiti for they "fled among the Indians and taught them bad customs and could never be captured." The story of the fugitive Maroons in South America and Jamaica is one of the sagas of modern history. They fought the English government for a hundred years; they resisted the Spanish and Portuguese and they achieved a freedom which continues to our day in Haiti and Guiana.

The fear of slave violence on the American mainland is sufficiently proven by the legislation. The laws of South Carolina in 1712 were defended as necessary "to restrain the disorders, rapines and inhumanity to which they [the Negroes] are naturally prone and inclined." The law of 1740 declared that "many late, horrible and barbarous massacres have actually been committed and many more designed on the white inhabitants of this province by Negro slaves." Harsh ~~and pitiless~~ legislation based on these premises continued during slavery and especially was revived and increased after the attempts of Vesey and Nat Turner.

We must not forget that the last effective act of violence which the slaves used was their mass movement during the Civil War which added 200,000 soldiers and even larger numbers of servants and laborers to the Union Army. It was this actual adherence of slaves to the Union cause and the threat that it would be extended indefinitely that made the Civil War hopeless for the South and led to its sudden cessation.

The second plan which acted as the safety valve for slavery was that of migration of the fugitive slave; it was by far the most successful attack on slavery and began a real social re-organization for the Negro. In a comparatively empty country, the individual slave who could not and would not endure the system would not have to wait until he got the assent and support of a large number of his fellows. He could steal away to the swamps of Florida and Virginia and along the Appalachian Mountains and the Mississippi Valley into the North. This running away of slaves was first an individual enterprise; then it became organized and systematized under Negro leaders and finally gained the co-operation and active help of whites during the era of the Undergreund Railroad.

The Undergreund Railroad led to the Civil War. It meant that the capital invested in slaves was continually suffering losses and the slave owners demanded more and more peremptorily the enactment of severe fugitive slave laws. The last one which they secured on the eve of the Civil War, not only interfered with individual rights, but state rights. It led to retaliatory nullification in the North, intensified the bitterness between the sections and eventually resulted in Civil War.

It is difficult to say how many slaves escaped, but the black population of the North increased from 130,000 in 1820 to 345,000 in 1860; this is a considerably larger increase than that of the total Negro population and if we remember that this Northern group was composed of poor emigrants with broken family life and insecure economic basis suddenly transferred from city to town, it seems certain that at least 100,000 of them were fugitives from slavery and represented a loss of at least $25,000,000 in invested capital and perhaps much more than that. It was this economic loss that spurred secession.

41-9-158

Meantime there were especial centers of runaway slaves. There were the fugitive slaves at the time of the Revolutionary War who not only took part in the hostilities, but caused infinite difficulties in peace negotiations. There were the 1,000 Negroes, who in 1815 manned a former British fort in Georgia and resisted the power of the United States; and finally there were the so-called Seminole wars which were simply slave raids for runaway property.

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

Beside these efforts, there were more far-reaching efforts to settle the Negro problem by mass migration. A proposal to leave this country for Africa seemed logical in the 18th Century when so many Negroes were newly come to the country. This plan was not simply a plan of white folk. Paul Cuffe, a black man, was actually the first person who successfully transported emigrants, taking 38 Negroes to Africa at his own expense. Later, came the American Colonization Society, but their plan for wholesale migration was spoiled by the effort of the radical South to turn this migration into an attempt to bolster slavery by getting rid of free Negroes. Nevertheless, out of that effort, together with the attempt to enforce the slave trade laws, came the settlement at Liberia.

Among the free Negroes of the North, plans for social amelioration began about 1830 when the Nat Turner insurrection in the South and the new foreign immigration to the North, made the economic situation of the free Negroes difficult. Riots and discriminatory laws in Ohio and Pennsylvania led to the Conventions from 1830 and to 1836 and to a well thought-out plan of migration. The British Government was approached and offered asylum, at first in Canada and later, after the West Indian emancipation, in the West Indies. The Canadian migration was financed by Negroes themselves and large numbers went to Ontario where they built up successful settlements. Their influence on American Negroes has been great. They were headquarters of the Underground Railroad, and Liberty Leagues. It was here that John Brown went to perfect his plans for the Harper Ferry raids; and it was here that Joseph Henson and Richard B. Harrison was born.

Between 1830 and 1860, the situation of American Negroes became increasingly difficult because of the spread of the abolition controversy and the rise of the cotton kingdom. An increasing number of Negroes in the 50's began to consider that wholesale migration was the only escape. They saw no chance of emancipation in the United States. Even Frederick Douglass placed his whole hope on war and bleed, but, nevertheless, steadfastly opposed migration.

In 1854, a remarkable convention met in Cleveland, Ohio. They made 3 proposals: Martin R. Delaney proposed migration to the Niger Valley of Africa; James M. Whitfield proposed to go to Central America and Theodore Holly, to Haiti. They not only made these propositions, but they actually made the necessary investigation and at the next colonization convention in Canada in 1856, Holly made a report which resulted, eventually, in 2,000 Negro emigrants going to Haiti. Delaney later concluded 8 treaties with African kings and brought evidences of land concessions and welcome. Whitfield ~~did not actually get~~ died on the way to Central America ~~before the Civil War broke out~~.

The war stopped migration schemes, until black fugitives began to pour into the Union armies. For a while, Lincoln did not realize the significance of this tremendous accession of power to the North and withdrawal of labor force from the South. The first problem ~~and an irritating problem it was,~~ was what was going to be done to get rid of the Negroes? If some plan of mass migration could be devised there was the possibility not simply of withdrawing these slaves from work in the South, but of inducing the Border States to give up slavery. Lincoln had long been an advocate of colonization. He said frankly that he could not conceive Negroes and white people living together in the United States as equals. He, therefore, secured in 1861 an appropriation of $100,000 from Congress and a further appropriation of $500,000 in 1362. He consulted delegations of Negroes and made contacts with foreign countries, but before he went further, he suddenly ~~saw just what~~ realized the significance of Negro soldiers and laborers were.

41-9-152

He saw that without their help, the war against the South could not be won, while with their help and the threat of increased accessions from the slaves, the opposition in the South was doomed. Moreover, he became convinced that mass migration of the Negroes could not be carried on with their consent nor at a price which the United States was willing to pay. His one venture with 500 Negro settlers on a little island near Haiti was a disastrous failure and nearly half the victims died of disease and were cheated outrageously by their white manager.

Then came the era of Reconstruction and with the thrill of political power in the minds of the Negro and his friends, social Reconstruction by migration was practically given up, except that Negroes moved in considerable groups from place to place in the South in order to find free land and better working conditions. When, however, the revolution of 1876 came and the Negro by force and fraud was disfranchised, a great migration movement to the West was conceived by Henry Adams in Louisiana and

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

Benjamin Singleton in Tennessee. Some 50,000 Negroes actually migrated to Kansas and the West and it took conciliation and violence in the South to stop the stream. Its more effectual stoppage, however, was due to poverty and cold welcome in the West. Nevertheless, a Negro population was planted in Kansas and its descendants remain there. Later, Bishop Turner and Congressman Morgan of Alabama, tried to revive the project of migration to Africa, but its only result was 1 shipload of 200 Negroes in 1885.

On the other hand, the migration of Negroes from South to North has gone on continuously since the Civil War. Between 1880 and 1900, some 10,000 to 20,000 a year went into the North, while from 1910 to 1930, between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 moved in one of the great mass movements of the history of migration.

Meantime, the fourth great plan for the social emancipation of Negroes began with the Reconstruction efforts in the Civil War. From 1867-1876, the Negroes placed their whole hope of full emancipation and economic security upon their vote and this forms one of the most interesting episodes in American history. It was not simply the enfranchisement of black folk, it was the attempt to reconstruct the basis of American democracy and to put the political power in the hands of the lowest working group. The bottom economic rail was put on top. If this group had had leadership and a greater chance for industrial development, there might have ensued in the South a dictatorship of the proletariat which might have led the modern world. But, of course, no such rapid transition from feudal slavery to industrial democracy could be expected. These laborers were themselves under the direction and ideology of a capitalistic form of industry. Their idea of emancipation was the rise of an exploiting class of black capitalists. Nevertheless, their realistic grasp of the situation led them to preliminary efforts not to exploit labor but to make the situation of the emancipated workers as advantageous as possible. They tried co-operative farming in Louisiana and state division of large plantations in South Carolina. They advocated and made actual free public school education in every Southern state. They gave opportunity for the poor man, not only to vote, but to represent his class in the legislature and the greatest charge against Reconstruction, that the legislature was filled by people who did not pay taxes, was really its greatest glory. The non-tax-paying laborer was the man who for a long time dominated the legislature with both white and black representatives.

41-9-153

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

There were, however, 2 unconquerable centers of opposition: one was the white landholder, who despite the fortunes of war, was enabled to continue his monopoly of the land through the determination of Andrew Johnson. It was one of the ironies of fate that the poor white who was the author of the legislation which distributed free land to the peasants of Europe and the North, was also the man who succeeded in keeping the emancipated Negroes of the South as landless serfs.

The second unconquerable center of opposition was the new capitalism of the North which was rising to tremendous and ruthless power. This new capitalism looked upon the South not as a center of a new democracy, but as a new center of exploitation. So long as the Southern land monopolist threatened the power and career of the Northern industrialists, the north was perfectly willing to let black and white labor have its way in the South. But when Southern labor began to increase its demands and power, and on the other hand, the Southern landholder showed himself willing to unite with the Northern capitalists in new exploitation, the bargain of 1876 was made and the laborers, white and black, were disfranchised. What ensued in the South after emancipation was not at all the classical bourgeois revolution but something far more complicated and reactionary.

41-9-154

However, the plan for Negro emancipation by political means did not end in 1876. The Negro held on to vestiges of his political power, first, by black congressmen, up until the beginning of the 20th Century, by a few members of Southern legislatures and especially by their power inside the Republican Party. This latter power was gradually undermined by the fact that it had back of it less and less of real democratic control and, therefore, it could more easily be seduced by bribery and manipulation.

Appointments of Negroes to Federal office also became less in number, as Reconstruction receded. Nevertheless there were certain compensations in the North. Negroes appeared in the legislature of 11 or 12 Northern states and sometimes played a conspicuous part. They were elevated to the judicial bench in the District of Columbia and 3 other states, and in cities, particularly like Chicago and New York, they occupied from time to time positions of real power.

The result of this political influence can be shown in many ways. Between 1884 and 1897, 25 civil rights laws, in addition to the national civil rights law, were passed in 16 Northern states. Many of them, including the national law, were emasculated by judicial interpretation, but others, like the Massachusetts and New York laws, are effective today. Federal appropriations for Negro education in the case of Howard University and the land grant colleges have been secured. On the other hand, further discriminatory legislation has been held up. Jim-Crow cars have been kept out of Delaware, West Virginia and Missouri and partially out of Maryland. A flood of anti-racial inter-marriage laws introduced in 1913 in Congress and 12 different states were defeated in every instance but one.

On the other hand, in the South, "Jim-Crow" legislation and disfranchisement laws between 1881 and 1910 swept through with little opposition.

It became clearer and clearer as the plan of political power to emancipate the American Negro was followed, that something was lacking; that the poverty and inexperience of the Negro made it impossible for him to exercise his political power in full and that as a minority, even then he could not succeed unless he could make some alliance with the majority. There ensued, therefore, two plans which both explain and supplement the plan of political power from 1867-1930.

41-9-155

One of these movements came in 1896-1920 and sought firmly to integrate the American Negro into American industry as a farmer, laborer, skilled artisan and capitalist. The other movement, sought by agitation and legal defense, to clear away race discrimination and allow untrammeled advancement of black folk according to ability. These 2 latter movements fell into bitter controversy. The economic movement ended with the World War and the anti-discrimination movement declined with the depression.

The plan of social Reconstruction advocated by Booker T. Washington was not simply a plan for the uplift of labor as is so often assumed, but also for a new black Capitalism and it can be only understood as we consider its immediate background. The late William H. Baldwin, President of the Long Island Railroad and slated to be President of the Pennsylvania, was a young white man trained in Southern industry and he was one of the first to conceive of the training of black laborers who should share work with white laborers and at the same time keep the white labof movement from too strong and insistent demands in its fight with capital.

Social Planning for the Negroes, Past and Present.

This idea began in the day when the "one big union" of the Knights of Labor had changed to the craft unionism of the American Federation of Labor. The strength of the labor movement was growing but almost without exception it excluded black skilled labor. However, black skilled labor was valuable and could be trained in the South. It was the idea of Mr. Baldwin and gradually of many others that this one you would not only do a service to and open opportunity for black folk, but one would in this same way serve capital and hold white labor in check.

About this time, Booker T. Washington took charge of Tuskegee in Alabama. He was an opportunist with high ideals. He believed in political rights ~~for people who could exercise them~~, but in the case of Southern Negroes, he knew that they could not exercise them without the consent of the white South. He took the position, therefore, that the Negro must gain an economic status before he could use his political rights and in this he was undoubtedly right; but on the other hand, his idea of the economic status which Negroes must gain was based unquestioningly on the capitalistic organization of the United States.

Mr. Washington's program included a temporary acquiescence in giving up Negro political rights and agitation for civil rights and insistence upon training young Negroes for farming and industry. Then up from a thrifty ~~cotton~~ class of black landlords and artisans, Washington expected a class of Negro capitalists to arise and employ Negro workers. The plan was launched by the Atlanta Speech in 1896 and was triumphant from that date until about 1910. It included alliance with white capital and was rewarded by large contributions toward Negro education, especially to such schools as conformed to the Hampton-Tuskegee type.

41-9-156

As a first step toward this new Negro capitalism, Mr. Washington especially stressed landholding, widespread peasant proprietorship and even large farms among Negroes; and then a training of Negro laborers and artisans for use in industry at a wage if necessary less than that demanded by union labor. The result of this compromise was new understanding between leading white elements, North and South, with regard to the Negro. The Negro college, while not entirely discouraged, was looked upon with some suspicion and positions for Negro college graduates became difficult. To some extent, appointments and opportunities for young Negroes were carefully censored and referred for approval to Tuskegee over a very wide extent of country. Negro newspapers were brought in line by judicious advertising and other means of control. This was really regarded as clever and far-sighted compromise, which if it did not solve would at least peacefully postpone the solution of a baffling, intricate problem of race contact until more favorable times. Between 1900-1910, Mr. Washington became one of the most popular men in America, in constant demand North and South as a speaker, adviser and referee.

As the current opinion of the land became unified, Mr. Washington's program began to become increasingly suspicious in the eyes of Negroes. A wave of Jim-Crow legislation and disfranchising bills swept over the South and the Border States. Already separation of the races in travel had been made compulsory in 8 Southern states before 1891, but had paused. Now a new wave of legislation began in 1898 and covered South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland and Oklahoma. Determined and repeated efforts were made in Missouri, West Virginia and Delaware. Disfranchising laws swept over the South and Border States, from 1890-1910, at the very time when Negro political power and agitation had been lulled to its lowest by the Washington compromise. This triumph of the radical, anti-Negro South and the continued prevalence of lynching which went on at the rate of 1 to 2 a week during most of Mr. Washington's career, greatly embarrassed him. He hated caste and lawlessness as much as any man. He wanted the best for his people, but he implicitly believed that once his economic program could be put through all else would follow and he made the fatal mistake of trying to forestall criticism from Negroes and of acquiescing in the neglect if not the suppression of Negro colleges.

41-9-157

The result was the outburst of wrath and criticism led by the younger college-bred Negro group, an outburst which eventually split the Negro group in twain. But it was not that criticism that deemed the Washington program. It was the plain failure of the economic re-building which I emphasized. This is shown by the trend of Negro employment; despite the effort of both Hampton and Tuskegee to train farmers and servants, both of these decreased in number. Farmers, instead of forming 57% of the workers, as in 1890, now formed 37%. Servants have decreased from 31% in 1890 to 22% in 1920. ~~Since the n, they have increased to 30%~~. Manifestly, then, there were forces at work to drive the Negroes off the farm and out of the servant quarters. On the other hand, the number of Negroes in commerce and transportation and in the manufacturing and mechanical industries, increased largely from 10% in 1890 to 29% in 1930, but it was not at all the kind of increase that Mr. Washington had in mind. The newcomers were mainly laborers. They made some headway into the semi-skilled and skilled industries, but were kept out by the trade unions and the trade unions held against them as an excuse the fact that they had been trained and that the plan had been to train them as strikebreakers and low-cost laborers. The caste system in the South increased the whole ideology of caste throughout the United States until laboring men felt themselves degraded to work with black men. Moreover, the attempt of Negroes to enter the employing class as merchants and landholders was made impossible by severe competition and monopoly. The attempt to teach Negroes the skill of modern industry was also frustrated by the changing of skill, the mass production, the use of machinery. While, therefore, land ownership among Negroes and the accumulation of property increased until 1910, it then began to decrease and the increase in Negro property, while a creditable index of thrift, was dwarfed by the immense piling up of capital in the hands of whites. Without doubt, the Washington program improved the economic status of the Negro, but on the other hand, and just as surely, it did not show a way out because it fastened the chance of exploitation on Negro labor and increased labor antagonism in the laboring classes.

41-9-158

This was particularly shown in the new development in the South where white labor used its political and social influence to replace black labor and eliminate the so-called Negro jobs. At the time of the depression, therefore, the status of Negro labor, both North and South, was precarious, through the opposition of unions and the discrimination of employers in the North and the competition of poor white labor in the South.

The next plan for social re-organization was that of agitation for legal defense. It was at first a part of the plan for political power and began as a demand for fixing the unconstitutionality of disfranchisement legislation and the enforcing of war amendments. One of the earliest group movements to agitate for this was the National League formed in Boston in 1885. It was local in its membership but had some influence.

In 1887, T. Thomas Fortune, editor of what is now the NEW YORK AGE, issued an appeal for a national organization and repeated this in 1889. The so-called Afro-American League, afterward changed to Afro-American Council, met in Chicago with 21 states represented in January, 1890. J. C. Price was President and Mr. Fortune, Secretary. The League held another meeting in Tennessee and then died until Bishop Walters revived it in 1898. It met that year in September at Rochester and later in November in Washington. The object of the organization was to investigate lynching, to test the constitutionality of discriminatory laws, to secure civil rights legislation, to promote migration from the South and to encourage organization. It met for several years and practically ended with a final meeting in St. Paul, Minnesota about 1900. Its weakness was that it consisted simply of an annual meeting without a continuous working organization. The result was that it did little more than meet, organize and pass resolutions. In the year 1905, a new aspect came over the plans for American Negroes for social Reconstruction.

The new disfranchisement laws and the wave of discriminatory legislation, coupled with Mr. Washington's concessions, alarmed the colored people. Particularly the young colored college man began to fear the dictatorship of the Tuskegee machine and the difficulty of expressing even legitimate criticism. This opposition was crystalized by the jailing of Monroe Trotter in Boston for trying to heckle Mr. Washington during a speech of the colored church. It seemed that this was going too far and that while Trotter was much more bitter and outspoken than was necessary, yet he did have a right to talk even though he criticized Mr. Washington. The result was that a call was issued in June, 1905, signed by 59 men from 17 states. In July, 1905, 29 of these men, representing 14 states, met at Niagara Falls and formed the Niagara movement. The movement grew and in 1906 held a significant meeting at Harpers Ferry. The Manifesto which it sent out was plain and bitter.

41-9-159

> "The men of the Niagara movement coming from the toil of the year's hard work and pausing a moment from the earning of their daily bread, turn toward the nation and again ask in the name of ten million the privilege of a hearing. In the past year the work of the Negro hater has flourished in the land. Step by step the defenders of the rights of American citizens have

retreated. The work of stealing the black man's ballot has progressed and the fifty and more representatives of stolen votes still sit in the nation's capital. Discrimination in travel and public accommodation has so spread that some of our weaker brethren are actually afraid to thunder against color discrimination as such and are simply whispering for ordinary decencies.

"Against this the Niagara Movement eternally protests. We will not be satisfied to take one jot or tittle less than our full manhood rights. We claim for ourselves every single right that belongs to a freeborn American, political, civil and social; and until we get these rights we will never cease to protest and assail the ears of America. The battle we wage is not for ourselves alone but for all true Americans. It is a fight for ideals, lest this, our common fatherland, false to its founding, become in truth the land of the thief and the home of the Slave--a by-word and a hissing among the nations for its sounding pretentions and pitiful accomplishment.

"Never before in the modern age has a great and civilized folk threatened to adopt so cowardly a creed in the treatment of its fellow-citizens born and bred on its soil. Stripped of verbiage and subterfuge and in its naked nastiness the new American creed says: Fear to let black men even try to rise lest they become the equals of the whites. And this is the land that professes to follow Jesus Christ. The blasphemy of such a course is only matched by its cowardice.

"In detail our demands are clear and unequivocal. First, we would vote; with the right to vote goes everything: freedom, manhood, the honor of your wives, the chastity of your daughters, the right to work, and the chance to rise, and let no man listen to those who deny this.

"We want full manhood suffrage, and we want it now, henceforth and forever.

"Second. We want discrimination in public accommodation to cease. Separation in railway and street cars, based simply on race and color, is un-American, undemocratic, and silly. We protest against all such discrimination.

41-9-165

[p 13 MISSING]

Social Planning for the Negro, Past and Present.

by hammering at the truth by sacrifice and work.

"We do not believe in violence, neither in the despised violence of the raid nor the lauded violence of the soldier, nor the barbarous violence of the mob, but we do believe in John Brown, in that incarnate spirit of justice, that hatred of a lie, that willingness to sacrifice money, reputation, and life itself on the altar of right. And here on the scene of John Brown's martyrdom we reconsecrate ourselves, our honor, our property to the final emancipation of the race which John Brown died to make free."

"The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People seeks to uplift the colored men and women of this country by securing to them the full enjoyment of their rights as citizens, justice in all courts, and equality of opportunity everywhere. It favors and aims to aid, every kind ofeducation among them save that which teaches special privileges or prerogative, class or caste. It recognizes the national character of the Negro problem and no sectionalism. It believes in the holding of the Constitution of the United States and its amendments, in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln. It upholds the doctrine of "all men up and no man down." It abhors Negro crime, but still more the conditions which breed crime, and most of all the crimes committed by mobs in the mockery of the law, by individuals in the name of the law.

"It believes that the scientific truths of the Negro problem must be available before the country can see its way wholly clear to right existing wrongs. It has no other belief than that the best way to uplift the colored man and the best way to aid the white man to peace is social content; it has no other desire than exacting justice, and no other motive than patriotism." (First Annual Report, January 1, 1911. N. A. A. C. P.)

The Niagara movement, however, had certain inherent difficulties. First, it was a racial movement of men entirely unknown outside their group and with no means of contact by which they could easily reach influential persons in the white group. And secondly, Mr. Trotter, who owned and edited the one organization journal, was not an organization man. He was an extreme individualist. When, therefore, in 1909 there was held a conference in New York with practically the same program that the Niagara movement had, practically all of the leading members of the Niagara movement went into the N. A. A. C. P., 7 of them going upon its Board of Directors and thus to a large measure the work of the Niagara movement became merged with that of the N. A. A. C. P.

The work of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is too well-known to call for review here. I need only point out that its greatest triumph was in the matter of legal defense. Practically, it made the Supreme Court for the first time in the history of the country affirm the validity of the 15th Amendment, ~~outlaw~~ repeal the Grandfather Clauses and curtail the segregation ordinances. It also ~~secured some protection for accused Negroes from mob violence~~ and made the most effective anti-lynching campaign in the history of the country.

The first sign of change that faced the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was falling off of its income and the decrease in the circulation of THE CRISIS. This was not due to the fact that the American Negro did not want to fight discrimination and lynching and was not willing to pursue cases in legal defense which should undermine the foundation of the whole caste system in marriage, in travel and in education. But it did come from the fact that the colored people, economically, were unable to stand the expense. It had been the proud boast of the N.A.A.C.P. that beginning as a quasi-philanthropic institution, expecting to rely upon funds furnished mainly by rich white friends, it had become during its best years supported in the main by the mass of colored workers and that THE CRIS had been made financially independent by the same kind of support. The amounts of money which it received from rich white people were small and their withdrawal would have made no particular difference in its program. The falling off now of this income meant that the colored people were financially unable to sustain this program and especially to back its expansion. We realized this before the depression and the causes lay in a new industrial development, North and South. In the South, the Negro was losing the monopoly of certain jobs which he had had. The machine was displacing semi-skilled and skilled labor among both Negroes and whites. A new monopoly of capital and materials was so changing the face of industry that the Negro was becoming a reservoir of casual labor and the general causes of the collapse of agriculture throughout the world were at work in increased degree among Negro farmers.

41-9-162

Social Planning for the Negro, Past and Present.

The mass migration of Negroes North alleviated but did not change the basic trouble. They found themselves in the midst of difficulties connected with housing, difficulties connected with unions, difficulties connected with the casual character of their labor and the low wage for which they were obliged to work. This should have taught the Negroes of the United States that a change of tactic was absolutely necessary. Agitation and legal defense must be kept up so far as possible but that possibility at present had its limitations. Before them and of more importance and of fundamental influence even to the campaign against race discrimination itself was a new plan of social security.

I began to advocate, therefore, for the N. A. A. C. P. a new social program as early as 1928. I was by no means clear in my own thinking, but was groping for light and for that reason had visited Russia, had begun the study of Karl Marx and had voted the Socialist ticket since 1912. My efforts brought little reaction; no particular opposition and at the same time no emphasis of agreement until the wave of depression overwhelmed us. Then, suddenly, there came to the fore, a peculiar situation made by the fact that the problem of race discrimination always cuts across and hinders the settlement of other problems, and we are repeatedly forced to give up direct attack upon it in order to save our very lives.

41-9-163

It happened in the Civil War; in the midst of a fight for physical freedom, civil and political rights, the Negro was suddenly faced with the problem of fighting when the outcome was by no means clear nor was it altogether certain just where his interest lay. He was compelled for a time to lay aside his racial demands to become a Union soldier and laborer and afterward was rewarded by receiving a greater measure of political power and civil rights than he had dreamed of. The same kind of dilemma came at the time of the World War.

We had no choice between war and peace--the nation was rushing headlong. We had no allies save a small group of thinkers who for the most part were not interested in Negroes. Labor was near unanimous for war and so were most socialists here and abroad. We were in a raging flood and our only real choice was to fight swimming with the current or to be drowned in impotent opposition. I said then and under similar circumstances would say again, close ranks and fight for our own liberty while the world was committing suicide.

The victim of mob violence, lynching and residential segregation for a time had to concentrate his efforts toward securing decent treatment of his segregated regiments, an opportunity for men to become officers even if they were black and permission to fight at the front instead of work blindly in the rear. After the World War, the Negro was able to return to his attack upon prejudice with increased power and efficiency. The years from 1919 to 1929 represent a high water mark of our organized striving for increased political power, the suppression of lynching and legal defense.

The irony of the situation, however, proved to be the fact that the cause for which we were verbally compelled to fight itself failed in its very victory and cast us with all men, workers and owners, in the maelstrom of World Depression. Today, then, our original paradox again appears with wider ramification and vaster perils.

41-9-164

We are in the midst of a national and world movement to reconstruct the basis of industry. In order to be efficient co-workers in this Reconstruction, we have got to escape the present threat of starvation, to conserve our schools and social organizations and to get regular, decently-paid work. With that foundation settled, even in a reasonable degree, we can begin again to fight discrimination. But until unemployment among American Negroes is decreased and a decent standard of living re-established, we have no resources upon which the battle against discrimination can effectively be carried.

Here, then, is the dilemma and how has it been met? Briefly put, there have been 3 moves: (1) toward invoking the protection of restored capitalism, (2) a movement toward alliance with organized labor, and (3) a movement toward socialism.

In the first category may be placed practically all of the older organizations: the Urban League, the Federation of Churches, the N.A.A.C.P. Nearly all of these organizations have, to be sure, shown signs of uneasiness at their position. The Urban League organized a National Economic Council, which through an executive committee and Workers' Councils was designed to guide the Negro through the crisis. Apparently, this never functioned. The N. A. A. C. P. sought to adopt an economic program but was unable to agree on anything definite. The Federation of Churches has adopted a liberal labor program, but has not applied it heartlessly to Negroes. Gradually, most of these and many other organizations under the guidance of the Joint Committee on Recovery, fell back upon a drive on the administration to secure justice for the Negro in relief and reorganization; but the difficulty was in determining just what economic justice for the Negro involved and how it could best be secured. The organizations themselves had scant common ground. Ten of them were religious, 4 were academic fraternities and sororities, 1 is a fraternal order, 1 an organization for agitation and reform, 4 organizations of professional men, 1 designed for club work and 3 are industrial organizations. The only thing upon which this conglomerate body could wholeheartedly unite was the matter of race discrimination.

Of the fact of discrimination, the Joint Committee has unearthed ample proof, but as to what we are going to do about it, the Joint Committee, quite naturally, has nothing to say and nothing to think.

Indeed, everything that has happened in the NRA and the New Deal might easily have been foretold before the NRA was established.

41-9-165

If the United States government comes in to the depression picture to administer local relief, that relief must be directly carried out by local people and these local people in the places where Negroes are most numerous are going to be prejudiced and narrow.

If the government is going to relieve the farmer by a scarcity program or bonuses, the people who are going to reap the benefit from that program are going to be the white people who own the land. If the government is going to establish a great power organization with towns and industries, in these towns and industries there is going to be repeated the same pattern of discrimination and segregation that is current in the nation. If we are going to have housing projects, subsistence homesteads, farm credit and credit unions, we are going to find in the carrying out of these plans the same American prejudice against color that we find everywhere. What, then, are we to do? Are we to starve to death until we settle color discrimination in America or are we first to secure the power to fight before we enter

30-29-9

Negro educational advisers are ~~to be appointed~~ increased in ~~every~~ the all-Negro camps. There are 154 Veterans' CCC camps and 7 all-Negro camps with a total number of 1,748. Others, make the grand total of 3,000 all-white camps. If Negroes had their proper ratio in these camps there would be about 37,000 instead of 15,000.

This brings me really to the end of my part of this program, but I may say for the benefit and attack of my good friend, Mr. Harris, to my mind, this is our program: so to organize the Negro group that within it, labor and the interests of labor shall be dominant; so to organize the vast consumers' power of this group as to secure wide, economic independence through the exchange of services and the exchange and manufacture of goods. Through these methods, to train the American Negroes so that they will realize in their own group and realize at first, the kind of social

30-29-A

If I were white, I might stand for a program of revolution, but I have no right in the United States today to act as if I were white. I must act with reference to my responsibilities to 12,000,000 Negroes.

The splendid inter-racialism of the left-wing unions must not be forgotten, but at the same time, it must be remembered that the ulterior motives back of this willingness to welcome Negroes on equal terms is ~~not~~ in many cases vicitated by the ulterior motive of being willing to use any weapon in order to foment trouble and to involve the American Negro in disaster so long as this ultimately redounds to the advance of the white worker.

It is idle for Negroes to believe that after any economic revolution in the United States, they are going automatically to find places in the reserve seat section.

30-29-8

[pp 19-22 MISSING]

reformation which the whole world is bound to come to some day And above all to stop this great people from being ashamed of itself, of its color and history; of living together and working together and to realize that race segregation is the white man's loss and not the black man's damnation.

30-29-5

October 1935
Johnson C. Smith U.
Conference

A PHILOSOPHY OF RACE SEGREGATION

Quite by accident, I ran across the other day an editorial which I had written in May, 1917, over eighteen years ago. Its subject was: "Officers for Negro Troops in the World War", and I shall read it.

"Give us Negro officers for Negro troops. This is the slogan and [illegible] no specious argument turn us from it. Liars tell us that only white men can lead black men, and they tell us this in the face of the record of Sonni Ali, Toussaint L'Ouverture, General Dodd, Charles Young, and Frank Dennison. Give us Negro officers for Negro troops.

"Justice and right calls for the admission of Negroes to the civilian training camps on the same terms as white men. This right The Crisis and Dr. Spingarn demanded from the first and we were refused.

"As the next best thing, Dr. Spingarn said: 'If colored men cannot be admitted to Plattsburg and similar camps give them a camp of their own.'

"The Crisis advocated and strongly advocated this alternative. Moreover, The Crisis wonders how on earth the wild and dapper advocates of 'Jim Crow' regiments can somersault into opponents of the training of Negro officers in separate camps?

"Do they want 'Jim Crow' regiments? No, but they want black soldiers and they accept separate regiments rather than forego military training. Do Dr. Spingarn and Dr. Du Bois and thousands of level-headed colored folk want a 'Jim Crow' training camp? No, but they want black officers and they advocate a separate camp rather than see Negro regiments officered solely by white men.

"How easily some of us are beguiled. We are assured that the General Staff will not refuse Negro troops. It may not, but there is every evidence that it intended to in the plan drafted previous to the declaration of war which did not become law. We are told to 'wait' for our camp until after all white officers are trained, and some colored papers actually rejoice at this, unable to grasp the clear fact that once enough whites are trained for all regiments, no Negroes need apply.

"Where in heaven's name do we Negroes stand? If we organize separately for anything--'Jim Crow!' scream all the Disconsolate; if we organize with white people--'Traitors! Pressure! They're betraying us!' yell all the Suspicious. If, unable to get the whole loaf we seize half to ward off starvation--'Compromise!' yell all the Scared. If we let the half loaf go and starve--'Why don't you do something?' yell those same critics, dancing about on their toes.

"It is simply silly to talk about pressure being brought to bear on the editor of The Crisis or on anyone else to back this demand. The only 'pressure' brought is the pressure of common sense. Mr. Storey, Mr. Villard, Dr. Spingar, Mr. Loud, Mr. Kennaday, Mr. Russell, Mr. Walling, Miss Ovington, and Mr. Nash and dozens of other white men are working shoulder to shoulder in the N. A. A. C. P. with us black men and treating us as comrades in a great fight for human rights. It is beneath contempt for the Cleveland, Ohio, Gazette to suggest that their motives are not above suspicion or that the editor of The Crisis has ever been asked by them to advocate that which he did not sincerely believe was right. Just now we demand Negro officers for Negro regiments. We cannot get them by admission to the regular training camps because the law of the land, or its official interpretation, wickedly prevents us. Therefore, give us a separate training camp for Negro officers.

"Later: we have won! The camp is granted; we shall have 1,000 Negro officers in the United States Army! Write us for information."

(The Crisis, Volume XIV., 1917, pp. CO, Cl.)

I bring this to your attention because it illustrates the perennial difficulty that comes in trying to make a general statement which will cover any such complicated matter as the segregation of races in the United States. Any such general statement can be immediately answered: what must be our attitude toward separate schools and separate colleges? What must be our attitude toward separation in travel and in civil life? Or more recently, what should be our attitude toward subsistence homesteads and housing propositions? In all these and similar cases there is no possibility of answer unless we examine carefully an exhaustive and specific case. No general policy or philosophy can be enunciated except as it is built upon these various real instances. This is illustrated by the history of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and other organizations toward segregation. For most of its career, the National Association announced no policy or slogan of "No segregation." I could not. In the first place, it was faced by the fact of the Negro school systems. I was faced by the fact that there were colored colleges and there must be. It was faced by the much more intricate fact that if it was going to attack the Jim-Crow cars of the South the first line of defense must be a demand for similar accommodation which by implication would have admitted the right of separation. In all these matter, therefore, for the most part, the Association simply kept silent. It announced no policy; it took no specific action. Unfortunately, however, when the matter of subsistence homesteads came up, without careful examination of the subject, the Association committed itself to a program only to find that it was taking a position which it could not maintain and from which it virtually had to withdraw. Now suppose instead of seeking to state a similar case, we simply admit that the situation of the Negro in the United States does not fit any logical categories. He may not wish to be segregated by race, but he is. He may and certainly ought to complain against a caste system, but he is a victim of it and he is going to live under it until all Negroes now living are long dead. His philosophy, therefore, must undertake, first, to examine the facts, and secondly, to see what action in view of these facts will bring the best results for the American Negro and for human culture, and this action must vary with time and place. To illustrate what I have in mind, let us take a number of specific cases: first take the New York public schools. Early in the eighteenth century, a Negro school was established in New York City. It was maintained for many years by charity and then in the early nineteenth century, it was supported mainly by the colored people themselves. It had some distinguished teachers who impressed their individuality upon the group in New York and outside New York. Into the white public schools which were growing at the time Negroes were not admitted and a fight began after the Civil War which lasted up until 1890 to force the admission of colored children into the white schools. The triumph of this demand, finally, was celebrated with great joy, not only in New York City, but throughout the United States. It was a triumph for justice and democracy and to crown it, a colored member was appointed to the Board of Education and gradually colored teachers were allowed in the schools. This appointment of colored teachers, however, met numerous obstacles. At first they were appointed only in districts where there were many colored children. Then at last they were appointed in other districts, but only in the elementary grades. Finally there came the appointment of a colored principal over white and colored teachers in elementary and grammar grades. It created a great furor in New York and elsewhere, but gradually it died down. The principal performed his duties for many years until retired and died only a few years ago. Even after that there was a dead line in the high schools.

37-10-92

37-10-93

When I went to New York in 1910, no Negro teacher had ever been appointed in any of the high schools and there seemed to be no chance of such an appointment no matter what marks a teacher might make in his written and oral examinations, he could always be excluded by the indefinite test of personal adaptation to the work. I know one brilliant graduate of Cornell who eventually went insane because his temporary appointment as teacher of Spanish in one of the high schools was never made permanent. Notwithstanding that, in recent years colored teachers have been appointed to high schools: first, a woman as teacher of Spanish; then a woman as teacher of French; then a man, teacher of history, etc., and another colored personx has been made acting principal of a grammar school and will become principal in a short time. Now this represents a brave, persistent and successful effort. Nevertheless, it doesn't settle the matter of the education of colored children in the New York public schools. I have often said and I repeat, that the colored children in the New York schools are not getting as good training as the colored children in the separate Washington schools, and the reason is quite clear: the New York schools are crowded; they are attended by children of all nationalities and grades of culture and the teachers are not interested in the children under them. Even the colored teachers very seldom teach colored children and are not particularly interested in the Italians, Jews and other children who come under them. It isn't a matter of prejudice or neglect; it's just the absence of close human ties. As a result, the schools are crowded; the retardation is very large; the discipline is lax and the position of teacher in those schools is sought mainly because the wages are high. Now what is to be done in a case of that sort? The action necessary seems to me to be very clear: more money must be spent upon the schools, more housing provided, less crowding and more modern teaching. The discipline has got to be improved in every way and the Parent-Teachers' Associations have got to attend to new and important duties. The colored Parent-Teachers' Association should be organized to keep watchful supervision over every single colored child in school; to see that he is properly clothed and fed; that he goes to school regularly; that he gets reasonable treatment. There should be every effort made to keep them in school regularly; to see that they graduate; to celebrate their graduation. It is astonishing that while literally hundreds are graduating from the Baltimore and Washington separate colored high schools, that the number of colored students graduating from the New York high schools must be counted by the dozens. The reason is, that in Washington and Baltimore there is every encouragement given, while in New York there is systematic neglect. This situation can be changed not by segregation in the schools, but by the attention of colored parents systematically applied to the school system, and without that, this great triumph against segregation policies will not yield the results that it might.

37-10-94

37-10-25

37-10-96

Now let us take a second situation: suppose we look at the schools in Atlanta, Georgia. There are separate colored and white schools; there are separate rates of payments for colored and white teachers which greviously discriminate againstthe colored teachers. The supervision of the colored schools is not careful or thorough. In the appointment of teachers there is less discrimination and lower standards than in the appointment to the white schools. The school houses are so crowded that it is necessary to have two sessions a day in numbers if not the majority of elementary classes. Even in the high school, a beautiful building, space adapted to 1,300 students is occupied by 4,000. There is no auditorium; there is no gymnasium; there are no adequate facilities for the handling of these students and the number per teacher in the classes makes careful teaching especially impossible. The attention, therefore, that colored pupils are getting in the Atlanta public schools is poor and is not improving. What is to be done against this situation? Manifestly, the remedy of "no segregation" is simply impossible of application in Atlanta. The attitude of the people of Georgia is such that if any outside power forced white and colored children in the same schools, the result would be turmoil and uprising such as would utterly nullify the process of education. On the other hand, the colored people of Atlanta, backed by the sense of justice in some of the white people and the Federal power, should insist upon and be able to obtain equal and adequate wages for teachers, a securetenure of office, skilled superintendents, adequate housing and equipment and enough teachers to make the classes easy to handle. Such things, backed by a real compulsory attendance law and social relief which would put children clothed and fed regularly in schools, would revolutionize the educational process in the city. Now in neither of these cases is the problem of segregation generalized or accepted.

A PHILOSOPHY OF RACE SEGREGATION

In New York without segregation, the educational process is not satisfactory; in Atlanta with segregation, the educational process is also unsatisfactory. The fault, evidently, does not merely lie in segregation itself; it lies in poor educational facilities.

32-10-07

To these a third specific case: Harvard is a great university; it has one of the foremost libraries of the world and its endowment allows it to assemble on one campus laboratory facilities and facilities for research and a group of well-trained professors who are among the most distinguished in America, if not in the world. Other things being equal, the place for a man to be educated in the best way is at Harvard, but there are certainly drawbacks: first, there are drawbacks connected with tradition and geography. Harvard has long been the organ and property of certain old New England families with their own idea of culture and education. If now a man is going to live in the West or in the South or even in Boston, it is not always clear that the type of education which Harvard offers is going to bring out in him the best and broadest possibilities. But beyond this, Harvard is not only an institution of learning; it is a social settlement and the social intercourse between teachers and students and students themselves is, as in all institutions, a larger part of the actual education. Now at Harvard, it is difficult for certain classes of students to get that contact with professors and their fellows which is necessary to the best education. It is difficult for Jews; it is often difficult for Westerners; it is especially difficult for colored men. In my day, forty years ago, the institution was smaller; the group of professors was rather extraordinary for any day and time, and the chances for cultural intercourse between them and even colored students like myself, was considerable. But even in that day, my contact with my fellow students was exceedingly narrow. I knew some of them by sight; I know still fewer by name; I did not know more than a dozen out of the thousand as companions and fellow human beings. I went my own way, unassisted and unaspired by what is usually called "college life"; and if that was true in 1890, it is still more true in 1935. On the other hand, there have grown up in the South various Negro institutions. The library at Atlanta University can not be compared to the Harvard library, and yet it is a rather good library, the group of teachers at Atlanta are neither in scholarship nor renown at all comparable to the Harvard group. On the other hand, there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that a student in the affiliated colleges and the graduate school at Atlanta University can get an education through contact with his fellows that it would have been impossible for a Negro to get elsewhere in the United States, except in similar colored institutions. It will be an education narrow, in some respects, racial and provincial in its outlook, but, nevertheless, for fullness of life and chance for self-expression, it can not be duplicated in northern institutions. What now shall we say: that segregated college education is best for the American Negro? So broad a statement as that would not be true; but it is true that under the circumstances that most Negroes must for their own best interests get their education in Negro colleges and unless it is, it will not be gotten at all. The type of student who can stand the ostracism and lack of social intercourse, the deliberate and unconscious insults, the barren and lonely spiritual life which is the lot of the average Negro student in a white college, is rare. For the most part there would be no such college enrollment as we have today if it were not for the Negro college. On the other hand, it is undoubtedly the interpretation in Negro colleges to lower the standards, to get cheaper and less trained teachers and to seek to do without libraries and laboratories work which simply cannot be done. But here again no general word as to race segregation can be said. Segregated schools are doing excellent college work. Schools in which there is no formal segregation give Negro students only limited chances for real training. What is needed, therefore, is two long movements moving toward the same end; the increase in the endowment and efficiency of the colored college until it becomes the equal in facilities and teaching to the white college; the broadening and cultural liberation of the white college so that it can come to the place where a black student can be really welcomed and trained.

A PHILOSOPHY OF RACE SEGREGATION

Let us take now the farm problem: when Poe of North Carolina many years ago tried to askfor segregated white and Negro farms, we all fought the proposition vigorously as an astonishing and unthinkable extension of race separation in the United States. On the other hand, when sybsistence homesteads were recently proposed by the Federal gover-

ment, I said and still say, that Negroes ought to have seized the opportunity to build them up and that in the re-settlement problem which the United States is trying to work out even now, that Negro farm communities ought to be established and carried on. I see no conflict between those two positions. Compulsory farm separation by law would mean not simply separation, but poor land, high prices and distance from the markets so far as Negroes are concerned. On the other hand, the subsistence homestead was a proposition by which land near a city and near people who are employed could be used to eke out and supplement their regular wages. Such land could be chosen by a group of people and just as mixed schools were unthinkable in the South, so both in the South and the North, it wasn't reasonable to suppose that white people were going to be willing to share a subsistence homestead with colored people. No matter how short-sighted and narrow such an attitude is, it is a perfectly well-known attitude in the United States to think that we are going to ward off starvation until we kill race prejudice is a compulsory program. Just so, the fight of the Negro farmer today hangs perilously in the balance. If he scatters himself here and there on separate farms in order to avoid segregation, he invites lawlessness, oppression and exclusion from co-operative efforts and from favorable markets. On the other hand, if he builds up his own farming areas, he has a chance to make them modern, to place them on good land, to supply his children with their social intercourse which is the only thing which will keep them on the farm, and above all, to buy and sell as a co-operative unit to the best advantage. There is absolutely no other future for Negro farming in the United States save this. Here again nothing is settled so far as segregation is concerned. It will be a good deal more —— if people, regardless of race and color, could unite for economic co-operation. The chance for that in the United States is exceedingly narrow.

32-10-99

I might add to these specific instances any number ofothers, but they would simply bring out the same basic thought: there can be no general philosophy as to race segregation which will apply to all specific cases. We can of course say in a general sort of way: that it is desirable in a world of human beings that the fewest artificial methods of separation be used as possible, and that in that way like temperments will will act with like, great gifts will be developed regardless of race a d color, and the world will go on much more swiftly than behind artificial barriers. That is certainly true. At the same time, practically, the barriers are there and we have to work within the barriers. The only practical philosophy that we can evolve is to say that in our provincial and segregated life we look as far as possible gradually toward the ideal of a common humanity. So far as teaching is concerned, we shall be guided and made sane in our conclusions if we insist on sticking to the specific case instead of starting with generalities. If in our classes or in our organization the problem of segregation comes up, we must not even try to settle it as a whole. It cannot be so settled. We must try to apply our broadest wisdom to this specific case. Taking into account what our action will mean immediately and for the future and guiding ourselves accordingly. There will be cases where it will be perfectly clear that segregation must be accepted at present and that within segregated boundaries we work for the best development of the Negro race. There will be other cases where it will be just as clear, that any increase and encouragement of segregation will not only be bad for Negroes but for white people and that in addition to that there will be any number of cases where the proper action will be puzzling and indecisive, where we must grope in an experimental way to see what proves best for us and for the world.

37-10-100

1935

W.E.B. Du Bois

Copy

2 Copies

CURRICULUM REVISION

by

ACCORDING TO YOUR PROGRAM, YOU ARE CONSIDERING IN THIS CONVENTION, TWO MATTERS: (1) THE PECULIAR NEEDS AND PROBLEMS OF NEGRO CHILDREN, (2) A CLOSER ADAPTATION OF THE COURSES IN NEGRO SCHOOLS TO THESE NEEDS AND PROBLEMS.

37-10-228

I WANT TO EMPHASIZE, FIRST, THAT WHATEVER THESE NEEDS AND PROBLEMS ARE, THEY CANNOT BE WHOLLY SETTLED OR MET BY THE PUBLIC SCHOOL. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL IS AN INSTITUTION FOR CERTAIN DEFINITE ENDS. IT IS NOT AN INSTITUTION INTENDED OR ADAPTED TO SETTLE SOCIAL PROBLEMS OF EVERY KIND. I BELIEVE THAT THIS IS A FUNDAMENTAL ERROR AMONG AMERICAN NEGROES SO WIDESPREAD AS TO BE DANGEROUS, AND EVEN AMONG AMERICAN WHITES, IT IS A COMMON FALLACY. IN NO OTHER GROUP IN THE WORLD DOES ANYBODY SERIOUSLY DREAM THAT THE PRESENT WIDESPREAD UNEMPLOYMENT AND INDUSTRIAL DISARRANGEMENT CAN BE DIRECTLY AND ENTIRELY SETTLED BY A COURSE OF STUDY. TO MENTION SUCH A BELIEF IN MOST COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD WOULD BRING A SMILE. BUT AMONG AMERICAN NEGROES, BECAUSE OF THEIR HISTORY, BECAUSE THEY WERE SO LONG BY LAW DEPRIVED OF THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION, IT IS, QUITE NATURALLY, EVEN IF FOOLISHLY, BELIEVED THAT EDUCATION IS A PANACEA FOR ALL ILL.

37-10-229

NOW, OF COURSE, INDIRECTLY, AND IN THE LONG RUN, ALL MEN MUST BELIEVE THAT HUMAN WRONG IS GOING TO BE ~~SURELY~~ OR GREATLY AMELIORATED BY A SPREAD OF INTELLIGENCE; THAT THE SPREAD OF SUCH INTELLIGENCE BEYOND THE CONFINES OF A NARROW ARISTOCRACY AND THE PALE OF RACE, DOWN TO THE MASSES OF MEN, IS GOING TO OPEN GREAT AND INEXHAUSTIBLE RESERVOIRS OF ABILITY AND GENIUS. BUT, MIND YOU, THIS INTELLIGENCE IS THE ESSENTIAL AND INESCAPABLE STEP BETWEEN THE SCHOOL AND THE SOCIAL PROGRAM, WHICH CANNOT BE OMITTED WITHOUT DISASTER. THE SCHOOL CANNOT ATTACK SOCIAL PROBLEMS DIRECTLY. IT CAN AND MUST ATTACK THEM INDIRECTLY BY TRAINING INTELLIGENT MEN, AND THESE INTELLIGENT MEN THROUGH SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS OTHER THAN THE SCHOOL WILL WORK FOR A BETTER ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY, A JUSTER DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME, A SANER TREATMENT OF CRIME, A MORE EFFECTIVE PREVENTION OF DISEASE, A HIGHER AND MORE BEAUTIFUL IDEAL OF LIFE, without race prejudice and War. WHEN, THEREFORE, AN ORGANIZATION LIKE THIS, LOOKS INTO THE PECULIAR NEEDS AND PROBLEMS OF COLORED CHILDREN, IT IS EXAMINING, NOT SIMPLY THE DUTY OF THE SCHOOL, BUT THE DUTY OF OTHER SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS, OF LIFE ITSELF; AND IN THE PHRASING OF THE SUBJECT, IT MUST NOT ASSUME THAT WHATEVER THE NEEDS AND PROBLEMS OF NEGRO CHILDREN ARE, THEY CAN BE MET AND SETTLED BY A CHANGE OF CURRICULUM, BY NEW SUBJECTS OF STUDY, CURRICULUM REVISION

37-10-230

AND NEW METHODS OF TEACHING. NO, IT IS THE ETERNAL PROBLEM OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL TO FURNISH AN INTELLIGENT CITIZENSHIP. AND AT NO TIME IN THE HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION HAS THE NEED OF SUCH GENERAL INTELLIGENCE BEEN GREATER THAN TODAY. LARGE NUMBERS OF HUMAN BEINGS TODAY CAN READ AND WRITE, AND THIS APPLIES EVEN TO THE MAJORITY OF AMERICAN NEGROES, IN A CERTAIN LIMITED WAY. BEYOND READING AND WRITING, THE ABILITY TO USE NUMBERS AND TO FOLLOW, CLEARLY AND INTELLIGENTLY, PROCESSES OF THE USE OF NUMBERS, IS KNOWN TO ~~A LARGER~~ more ~~NUMBER OF~~ PEOPLE TODAY THAN EVER BEFORE IN THE WORLD'S HISTORY. WE HAVE A FAIRLY LARGE ACQUAINTANCESHIP WITH THE STRUCTURE OF NATIONAL AND STATE GOVERNMENT, AND THE GENERAL POLITICAL HISTORY OF OUR COUNTRY; IN ADDITION TO SOME KNOWLEDGE OF THE HISTORY OF EUROPE: WE KNOW FACTS ABOUT THE HUMAN BODY AND ITS METHOD OF WORK AND DEVELOPMENT; ABOUT THE CONSTITUTION OF MATTER; ABOUT THE GROWTH OF VEGETATION AND THE DEVELOPMENT OF ANIMALS.

BUT, SINGULARLY ENOUGH, THERE IS ONE VAST BODY OF FACTS WHICH TOUCH US TODAY MORE INTIMATELY AND FATALLY THAN ANY OTHER CONCERNING WHICH THE MASS EVEN OF FAIRLY INTELLIGENT FOLK, ARE CURIOUSLY IGNORANT OR MISINFORMED, AND THAT IS, THE WHOLE SYSTEM OF INDUSTRY, WORK AND WAGE; THE APPLICATION OF CAPITAL, AND THE DIRECTION OF LABOR; AND THE

37-10-231

FUNCTION AND USE OF MONEY. ALL THESE ARE CURIOUSLY MUDDLED IN THE MINDS OF MOST INTELLIGENT MEN, AND YET THEY ~~XXXX~~ ARE THE BASIC FACTS OF OUR PRESENT CULTURE, OUT OF WHICH ALL OUR CIVILIZATION--OUR LITERATURE, OUR RELIGION AND OUR ART, RISE. THE FAILURE OF MODERN DEMOCRACY COMES FROM NO FALSE PREMISES TOUCHING THE RIGHT OF THE GOVERNED TO A VOICE IN GOVERNMENT; BUT RATHER IS DUE TO THE FACT THAT IN THE WIDEST AND MOST IMPORTANT REALM OF HUMAN ACTION--THAT IS IN INDUSTRY--DEMOCRACY HAS NEVER BEEN TRIED, AND THAT ~~THEIR~~ there TYRANNOUS AND SELFISH MONARCHY IS NOT ONLY THE RULE, BUT ALMOST THE ONLY DREAMED OF POSSIBILITY OR REFUGE. AND THAT IS THE REASON TODAY WHY THE ATTEMPT TO APPLY INTELLIGENCE TO THE INDUSTRIAL MALADJUSTMENT IN THIS LAND AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD, IS SO DIFFICULT AND BOOTLESS.

WHAT WE NEED, THEN, AND WHAT THE PUBLIC SCHOOL, COLLEGE AND UNIVERSITY MUST SUPPLY, IS INTELLIGENCE CONCERNING HISTORY, NATURAL SCIENCE AND ECONOMICS; AND THE ESSENTIAL KEY TO THIS INTELLIGENCE IS A THOROUGH, LONG-DISCIPLINED KNOWLEDGE OF THE three ~~FOUR~~ "R'S". TO ASSUME THAT INSTEAD OF THIS, AND BY ALLOWING THE CURRICULUM OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL TO ENCROACH UPON THOROUGH WORK IN READING, WRITING AND ARITHMETIC, WE CAN CURE THE

CURRICULUM REVISION

37-10-232

ILLS OF THE PRESENT DEPRESSION BY TRAINING CHILDREN DIRECTLY AS ARTISANS, WORKERS AND FARMERS/WITHOUT MAKING THEM INTELLIGENT MEN, IS ABSOLUTELY FALSE. ON THE OTHER HAND, IT IS EQUALLY FALSE TO ASSUME THAT WITHOUT THE DEFINITE AND LONG-CONTINUED ACTION OF HUMAN INSTITUTIONS AND HUMAN BEINGS WORKING THROUGH THEM, THE ILLS OF INDUSTRY CAN BE CURED. INDUSTRY IS NOT SIMPLY MECHANICAL SKILL; IT DOES NOT CONSIST OF BLIND MACHINES AND POWER; ONE DOES NOT ENTER IT, GUIDE OR FOLLOW IT BY LEARNING A FORMULA. IT IS A HUMAN ORGANIZATION GUIDED BY HUMAN IDEALS. IT CAN, WITHIN THE LIMITS OF PHYSICAL NATURE, BE INFINITELY CHANGED AND REDIRECTED TO DIFFERENT ~~ONES~~ ends AND IDEALS. WHAT IS NEEDED THEN TO REFORM MODERN INDUSTRY BY INTELLIGENT APPLICATION OF SCIENCE AND IDEALS? IGNORANCE OF THE CHEMISTRY OF SOILS IS NOT THE REASON THAT NEGROES LEAVE THE FARMS; THAT REASON LIES IN LAND MONOPOLY, USURY, PEONAGE, ~~,~~ THE INADAPTABILITY OF LABOR-SAVING MACHINERY TO SMALL FARMS AND THE RIGGING OF THE FARMER'S MARKET. WHAT SCHOOL CURRICULUM CAN CHANGE THESE CONDITIONS?

LET US [redacted] DEFINITELY AND EXPLICITLY ASK WHAT THE PECULIAR NEEDS AND PROBLEMS OF NEGRO CHILDREN ARE. I CAN THINK OF TEN CHIEF NEEDS.

37-10-233

FIRST, AND MOREMOST, HOMES AND PARENTS. THE GREAT MASS OF NEGRO CHILDREN ARE NOT BORN OR REARED IN PHYSICALLY FIT HOMES, OR UNDER THE GUARDIANSHIP OF PARENTS WHO CAN TAKE CARE OF THEM PROPERLY. [redacted]; THIS LACK OF PARENTAL CARE IS DUE TO THE SMALL INCOME OF THESE PARENTS, SO THAT HIGHER WAGE STANDS NEXT TO THE NEED OF HOMES AND PARENTS. IN THE VICINITY OF THE HOME AND ELSEWHERE, THE CHILD NEEDS A CHANCE TO PLAY, IN AIR, SUNLIGHT, AND SAFETY. THE HEALTH OF THE CHILD NEEDS INSPECTION, GUARDIANSHIP, AND CAREFUL PROTECTION. THE CHILD HAS A RIGHT TO EXPECT ESSENTIAL JUSTICE FROM THE PEOPLE SURROUNDING HIM, AND NOT INSULT, BLOWS, AND DISCRIMINATION. THE CHILD NEEDS OCCUPATION, NOT ONLY UNORGANIZED AND ORGANIZED PLAY, BUT WORK, EITHER IN OLD-FASHIONED CHORES, OR THE NEW FASHIONED MANUAL TRAINING. A PART OF THE PERSONALITY OF THE CHILD MUST BE EVOKED AND ITS PHYSICAL WELL-BEING PROTECTED BY PROPER AND CLEAN CLOTHES. IT MUST HAVE CONTACT WITH THE BEAUTIFUL THINGS OF LIFE, SUNSETS AND PICTURES; GARDENS AND WORKS OF ART. IT MUST HAVE CONTACT WITH THE WORLD BY EXCURSIONS AND TRAVEL, AND INTER-COURSE WITH ELDERS AND OTHER CHILDREN, AND FINALLY, IT MUST HAVE FORMAL EDUCATION; A DISCIPLINED TRAINING IN THE THREE "R'S" AND THE STUDIES BUILT UPON THEM.

(7)

CURRICULUM REVISION

37-10-234

NOW OF THESE TEN NEEDS, AND THE PROBLEMS WHICH ~~THESE LACK OF PARTIAL SUPPLY~~ they GIVE RISE TO, ONLY A FEW CAN BE met BY THE PUBLIC SCHOOL. THE PUBLIC SCHOOL CAN SUPERVISE SOME PART OF THE CHILD'S PLAY; IT CAN PROTECT ITS HEALTH WHILE IN SCHOOL: IT CAN GIVE IT SOME CONTACT WITH BEAUTY: IT ~~CAN~~ may FIND TIME FOR SOME MANUAL TRAINING AND SOME OF THE SIMPLER ARTS, ~~LIKE COOKING~~. BUT IT DOES THESE THINGS INCIDENTALLY, AND THEY SHOULD BE WITHOUT SCHOOL CREDIT, SO FAR AS THE MAIN WORK OF THE SCHOOL IS CONCERNED.

NOW IT IS IN THE FAILURE TO DO THE MAIN WORK OF THE SCHOOL THAT THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS OF GEORGIA, AND OF OTHER STATES, AND PARTICULARLY THE NEGRO PUBLIC SCHOOLS, STAND CONVICTED OF INEFFICIENCY. I AM NOT NOW PLACING THE BLAME FOR THIS INEFFICIENCY. I AM MERELY POINTING TO THE FACT.

IF WE FOLLOW THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SYSTEM THE WORLD AROUND, AND STRENGTHEN OUR OBSERVANCE BY SOUND PSYCHOLOGY, WE KNOW PERFECTLY WELL THAT WHAT THE SCHOOL CHILD NEEDS, FROM 6-12, IS THE CAREFUL, CONTINUOUS, AND REPEATEDLY CHECKED PURSUIT OF A FEW, SIMPLE AVENUES TO KNOWLEDGE. THIS SCHOOL CURRICULUM CANNOT BE

(8)

DIVIDED UP INTO SEPARATE, UNRELATED PARTS. IT MUST BE ONE CONVERGING WHOLE, AND IT MUST LEAD TO A SINGLE, SIMPLE, UNEQUIVOCABLE RESULT. FIRST, THE CHILD MUST LEARN TO READ. HALF, EVEN THREE-FOURTHS OF THE DIFFICULTIES IN OUR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES AND UNIVERSITIES, AND THE DIFFICULTIES OF BASING DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT AND CIVILIZATION UPON INTELLIGENCE, IS THE PLAIN AND UNQUESTIONED FACT THAT MOST PEOPLE CANNOT READ, THEY CANNOT INTELLIGENTLY TAKE A PIECE OF WELL-WRITTEN ENGLISH AND IN A REASONABLY SHORT TIME GET A CLEAR AND DISTINCT IDEA OF JUST WHAT THE WRITER MEANT TO SAY. NOW THAT ABILITY TO READ DOES NOT COME BY CHANCE OR INSPIRATION, IT COMES BY SEVERE AND CONTINUOUS DISCIPLINE, CHECKED AND RE-CHECKED BY TEACHERS WHO THEMSELVES CAN READ, AND WHO KNOW WHAT TO READ, AND HOW TO READ. THERE IS NO SUBSTITUTE FOR THIS FUNDAMENTAL KNOWLEDGE, AND NO SHORT-CUT TO ITS ATTAINMENT. YOU CANNOT SUBSTITUTE FOR KNOWLEDGE OF READING, ADEPTNESS IN WHITE-WASHING THE TREES ON THE CAMPUS, OR FACILITY IN BOILING POTATOES. I SHOULD BE THE LAST TO DENY THAT TREES OUGHT TO BE CARED FOR, OR THAT FOOD OUGHT TO BE COOKED, BUT I AM INSISTING THE FIRST DUTY OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL TO ITS CHILDREN IS TO TEACH THEM TO READ; AND THAT NO PERSON OUGHT TO BE SENT OUT OF THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL WHO CANNOT READ. SECONDLY, THE CHILD MUST LEARN HOW TO WRITE. NOT SIMPLY TO FORM WORDS AND LETTERS BY HAND, OR ON THE TYPEWRITER, BUT TO

37-10-235

CURRICULUM REVISION

BE ABLE TO EXPRESS ITS OWN THOUGHTS, OR THE THOUGHTS OF OTHERS IN CLEAR, IDIOMATIC, AND GRAMMATICAL ENGLISH. HERE, AGAIN, THERE IS ABSOLUTELY NOTHING THAT CAN TAKE THE PLACE OF THIS. I DO NOT CARE HOW ELABORATE THE PROVISIONS OF THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL MAY BE FOR PLANING BOARDS OR WASHING DISHES, THE FIRST THING WHICH THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOL MUST DO AFTER THE CHILD HAS LEARNED TO READ, AND WHILE IT IS LEARNING, IS TO TEACH IT TO WRITE GOOD ENGLISH. AND THERE AGAIN, ONE HAS BUT TO LISTEN TO THE SLOVENLY ENGLISH ON THE STREET AND OVER THE RADIO, THE CARELESS TALK ON THE PUBLIC PLATFORM, AND THE UTTERLY IMPOSSIBLE CURRENT CONVERSATION OF MEN AND WOMEN, AS WELL AS CHILDREN, TO REALIZE THAT THE EXPRESSION OF HUMAN THOUGHT IN AMERICA TODAY IS IN AN ELEMENTARY CONDITION, AND THAT AMONG NEGROES IT HAS NOT QUITE REACHED THE ELEMENTARY STAGE.

37-10-236

THE THIRD BUSINESS OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL IS TO TEACH CHILDREN TO USE NUMBERS, AND IF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL HAS BEEN REMISS IN TEACHING READING AND WRITING, IT HAS ALMOST ~~FALLEN DOWN~~ failed WHEN IT COMES TO ADDITION, SUBTRACTION, MULTIPLICATION, AND DIVISION. HERE, AGAIN, THERE IS NO ROYAL ROAD.

MY DAUGHTER ATTENDED AS A CHILD A FIRST-CLASS KINDERGARTEN AND A PROGRESSIVE GRADE SCHOOL. BUT THERE WAS SO MUCH TO STUDY AND TO DO, AND SO MUCH EDUCATION RAMPART, THAT WHEN SHE WENT TO A REAL SCHOOL, AND ENTERED THE FIFTH GRADE, SHE HAD TO STOP EVERYTHING AND LEARN THE MULTIPLICATION TABLE. THE LEARNING OF THE MULTIPLICATION TABLE CANNOT BE DONE BY INSPIRATION OR EXORTATION. IT IS A MATTER OF BLUNT, HARD, EXERCISE OF MEMORY, DONE SO REPEATEDLY AND FOR SO MANY YEARS, THAT IT BECOMES SECOND NATURE, SO THAT IT CANNOT BE FORGOTTEN. MOREOVER, THE PROPER, AND ABSOLUTELY CORRECT USE OF NUMBERS IS THE ONLY ROAD TO THE USE OF HUMAN REASON, AND ONE CAN SEE HOW THIS DISCIPLINE HAS BEEN NEGLECTED IN THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS OF THE WORLD, WHEN ONE NOTES THE PITIABLE INABILITY OF THE MASS OF MEN TO DO A SIMPLE, STRAIGHT, BIT OF REASONING. IT IS LOGICALLY EASY IN EVERY PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN TO HAVE TWO AND TWO EQUAL FIVE, AND TO HAVE THE SQUARE OF THE HYPOTHENUSE EQUAL ANYTHING BUT ~~WHAT IT LOGICALLY AND UNALTERABLY MUST EQUAL.~~ the sum of the squares of the other two sides

37-10-237

THESE ARE THE THREE DISCIPLINES WHICH ARE THE ~~BASIS OF~~ gates to INTELLIGENCE, AND WHICH NO SCHOOL CAN FAIL TO TEACH THOROUGHLY AND DEFINITELY, AND CALL ITSELF A SCHOOL. WHENEVER A TEACHERS' CONVENTION GETS TOGETHER AND TRIES TO FIND OUT HOW IT CAN CURE THE ILLS OF SOCIETY, THERE IS SIMPLY ONE ANSWER: THE SCHOOL HAS BUT ONE

(11)

CURRICULUM REVISION

WAY TO CURE THE ILLSOF SOCIETY, AND THAT IS BY MAKING MEN INTELLIGENT. TO MAKE MEN INTELLIGENT, THE SCHOOL HAS AGAIN BUT ONE WAY, AND THAT IS, FIRST AND LAST, TO TEACH THEM TO READ, WRITE AND COUNT. AND IF THE SCHOOL FAILS TO DO THAT, AND TRIES BEYOND THAT TO DO SOMETHING FOR WHICH A SCHOOL IS NOT ADAPTED, IT NOT ONLY FAILS IN ITS OWN FUNCTION, BUT IT FAILS IN ALL OTHER ATTEMPTED FUNCTIONS. BECAUSE NO SCHOOL AS SUCH CAN ORGANIZE INDUSTRY OR SETTLE THE MATTER OF WAGE AND INCOME, CAN FOUND HOMES OR FURNISH PARENTS, CAN ESTABLISH JUSTICE OR MAKE A CIVILIZED WORLD.

37-10-238

ON THE OTHER HAND, IF THE SCHOOL DOES FURNISH THE BASIC ESSENTIALS FOR INTELLIGENCE, THEN THE PUPIL WHO CAN READ, WRITE AND COUNT, CAN GO FORWARD. IF HIS FORMAL SCHOOLING STOPS RIGHT HERE, HE still CAN READ THE THOUGHTS OF INTELLIGENT MEN; HE CAN STUDY HISTORY; HE CAN UNDERSTAND SCIENCE; AND HE CAN EXCHANGE THOUGHTS WITH MEN WHO ARE ABLE TO UNDERSTAND AND TEACH HIM. THE GATES TO INTELLIGENCE ARE OPEN TO HIM.

IF THE PERSON, WHO HAS PROPERLY COMPLETED the ELEMENTARY SCHOOL, HAS THE GREAT GOOD FORTUNE TO GO INTO THE HIGH SCHOOL, HE ALSO CAN DO THESE SAME THINGS, BUT DO THEM MORE QUICKLY, MORE THOROUGHLY, AND MORE PRECISELY. HE CAN STUDY ENGLISH (+ other languages

(12)

~~AS A LANGUAGE~~; HE CAN STUDY HISTORY FROM CAREFULLY SELECTED TEXTBOOKS UNDER THE LEADERSHIP OF PERSONS WHO KNOW HISTORY; HE CAN STUDY SCIENCE IN LABORATORIES WITH A CHANCE FOR HIS OWN EXPERIMENTATION.

37-10-239

ABOVE ALL, HE CAN STUDY THE SOCIAL SCIENCES, THE HISTORY OF INDUSTRY, AND OF THE MACHINE, THE FUNCTION OF MONEY, THE USE AND ABUSE OF CAPITAL, THE LAW OF INCOME AND WAGES. HE CAN GET SOME INSIGHT INTO THE NEWER OBSERVATIONS OF THE WORKING OF THE HUMAN MIND AND OF THE GROUP MIND. IN THIS WAY, THE STUDENT HAS AN OPPORTUNITY, BETWEEN THE YEARS OF 11-17, OF GRASPING THE MEANING OF THE WORLD IN MICROCOSM, AND HE MAY BEGIN TO APPREHEND WHAT IT MEANS TO LIVE IN THIS AGE AND IN THE FOREMOST RANKS OF TIME.

THESE ARE THE MAIN SUBJECTS OF HIS HIGH SCHOOL DISCIPLINE. OUTSIDE THESE, HE MAY FIND TIME AND OPPORTUNITY FOR CERTAIN DEFINITE APPLICATIONS OF HIS KNOWLEDGE AND INTRODUCTION to REAL WORK.

HE WILL NOT HAVE MUCH TIME FOR THOROUGH STUDY OUTSIDE OF THESE MAIN SUBJECTS OF A CAREFULLY PLANNED CURRICULUM, BUT FOR RECREATION AND PRACTICE, AND AS AN

CURRICULUM REVISION

INTRODUCTION TO THE REALITIES OF LIFE, HE CAN EITHER IN THE SAME SCHOOL, OR IN EXTRA-CURRICULUM ACTIVITIES, LEARN CERTAIN SIMPLE SKILLS FOR THE SAKE OF PHYSICAL DEXTERITY AND MENTAL DISCIPLINE. HE CAN DO JOBS AND EARN MONEY IN VACATIONS. HE CAN HELP AROUND THE HOME. HE CAN EVEN OBSERVE OR WORK AT SOME BRANCH OF REAL INDUSTRY. BUT ALL THIS EFFORT MUST BE STRICTLY LIMITED BY THE TIME ABSOLUTELY NECESSARY FOR HIM TO GRASP THE MAIN FACTS OF LANGUAGE, AND OF PHYSICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE, AND IF THE MAIN DISCIPLINES ARE CUT DOWN BY USING HIS TIME IN REPAIRING AUTOMOBILES, OR MAKING TABLES, IT SIMPLY MEANS THAT HE IS NOT PURSUING A HIGH SCHOOL EDUCATION.

37-10-240

IN SO MUCH OF OUR EFFORT TO REVISE THE CURRICULUM OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS, WE ARE REALLY TRYING TO SOLVE TWO PROBLEMS: HOW CAN A CHILD AT THE SAME TIME GET AN EDUCATION AND MAKE A LIVING? THE ANSWER IS SIMPLE: IT CANNOT BE DONE. WE MAY COME TO THE DAY (WHICH IS INDEED POSSIBLE) WHEN WE WILL PAY CHILDREN TO GO TO SCHOOL; BUT EVEN IN THAT CASE, WE SHALL BE PAYING THE CHILD TO BECOME INTELLIGENT, AND NOT GIVING HIM AN ECONOMIC WAGE FOR THE WORTH OF HIS WORK IN DIRECT GOODS AND SERVICES.

THE PRESSURE UPON US IN AMERICA, AND PARTICULARLY THE PRESSURE AMONG NEGROES, IS TO INCREASE OUR INCOME. THAT IS THE MAIN AND CENTRAL NEGRO PROBLEM. IN A RECENT STUDY WHICH I HELPED MAKE IN TEXAS, WE FOUND THAT OUT OF FOUR THOUSAND NEGRO INDUSTRIAL WORKERS EMPLOYED IN CITIES BY SOME OF THE BEST FIRMS OF TEXAS, OVER 90% WERE GETTING A WAGE WHICH WAS BELOW THE SUBSISTENCE LEVEL NECESSARY FOR A DECENT AND HEALTHY STANDARD OF LIFE. IF THIS WAS TRUE OF THE INDUSTRIAL WORKERS, IT WAS EVEN MORE TRUE OF THE TENANT-FARMERS. IF WE CLEARLY GRASP THIS ESSENTIAL NEED OF INCOME, THERE COMES THE PRESSURE TO USE OUR CHILDREN IN ORDER TO INCREASE THE FAMILY WAGE. AND WITH IT COMES THE SPECIOUS ARGUMENT THAT THIS CAN BE ACCOMPLISHED, AND AT THE SAME TIME THE CHILD CAN GET AN EDUCATION SIMPLY BY MAKING THE PUBLIC SCHOOL A SORT OF PRELIMINARY WORK SHOP. THIS IS SIMPLY NOT TRUE. THE OBJECT OF A WORKSHOP IS TO MAKE GOODS WHICH CAN BE used or SOLD FOR A PROFIT. THE OBJECT OF A SCHOOL IS TO MAKE CHILDREN WHO CAN KNOW, THINK, AND DO. THESE ARE TWO SEPARATE FUNCTIONS DONE BY TWO SEPARATE HUMAN INSTITUTIONS. THESE INSTITUTIONS CAN NOT ~~COLLAGE~~ coalesce IN ONE. IT IS QUITE TRUE THAT THE SCHOOL MAY DO SOMETHING TOWARD MAKING THE FUNCTION OF WORK IN THE WORLD MORE REAL TO STUDENTS. IT IS ALSO TRUE THAT INDUSTRY MUST NOT SIMPLY BE FOR THE MAKING OF GOODS, BUT MUST KEEP IN MIND CONTINUALLY THE WELFARE OF THE LABORERS. BUT SO LONG

37-10-241

CURRICULUM REVISION

AS WE DEMAND GOODS AND INTELLIGENCE, THE SCHOOL AND THE WORKSHOP MUST PERFORM THEIR DISTINCT FUNCTIONS. THE REWARD FOR LEARNING TO SHOE A HORSE IS THE WAGE OF A BLACKSMITH. THE REWARD FOR LEARNING THE BINOMIAL THEOREM IS INTELLIGENCE. ONLY THE LATTER LEARNING SHOULD RECEIVE ACADEMIC CREDIT.

I DO NOT FOR A MOMENT PRETEND TO SAY THAT WITH OUR PRESENT ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY AND PRESENT INCOMES, LARGE NUMBERS OF OUR CHILDREN HAVE NOT THE TIME FOR HIGH SCHOOL STUDY; BUT I MERELY INSIST THAT IF WHAT THE YOUTH IS DOING IS NOT TO TAKE A HIGH SCHOOL COURSE, YOU DO NOT MIRACULOUSLY CHANGE THE FACT BY CALLING IT A HIGH SCHOOL COURSE AND GIVING HIM MANUAL WORK. || THE YOUTH MAY BE AMONG THOSE FEW WHO GET A CHANCE TO GO TO COLLEGE. THE NUMBER WHO GO TO COLLEGE OUGHT TO BE LIMITED, NOT BY A MAN'S WEALTH, BUT BY HIS RECOGNIZED AND PROVEN ABILITY. IF THERE IS FOUND IN A HIGH SCHOOL OF ONE HUNDRED, TEN OR MORE CHILDREN WHO HAVE GIVEN INDISPUTABLE EVIDENCE OF UNUSUAL ABILITY, AND THOROUGH ACCOMPLISHMENT OF THEIR ELEMENTARY WORK, THEY OUGHT BY ALL MEANS TO GO TO COLLEGE, WHETHER THEIR PARENTS HAVE THE MONEY OR NOT, AND THEY OUGHT TO GO AT THE EXPENSE OF THE STATE. IT GOES WITHOUT SAYING THAT

FEW STUDENTS OF EITHER NEGRO OR WHITE COLLEGES ARE OF THIS CALIBER. OUR COLLEGES ARE BEING MORE AND MORE FILLED WITH STUDENTS WHO NEVER LEARNED HOW TO READ, WRITE OR COUNT, AND WHO HAVE NEVER DONE A THOROUGH HIGH SCHOOL CURRICULUM, AND THE RESULT IS, THAT INSTEAD OF THE COLLEGE BEING ABLE TO CARRY A REASONABLE NUMBER OF PERSONS ON TOWARD MASTERY OF THE GREAT STORES OF MODERN KNOWLEDGE, SO THAT THEY CAN BECOME LEADERS OF THOUGHT AND TEACHERS OF MEN, THE NUMBER OF SUCH PERSONS HAS BEEN PAINFULLY FEW. || THIS, THEN, AS I CONCEIVE IT, IS THE DUTY, AND THE INESCAPABLE DUTY OF THE SCHOOL IN ITS ELEMENTARY GRADES, IN ITS HIGH SCHOOL, AND IN ITS COLLEGES.

YOU WILL NOTE THAT I HAVE SAID HERE VERY LITTLE ABOUT WORK AND INDUSTRY, AND YOU MAY HAVE INFERRED FROM THAT THAT I THINK IT OF LESS IMPORTANCE THAN EDUCATION. ON THE CONTRARY, IT IS MORE IMPORTANT THAN EDUCATION. IT IS FUNDAMENTAL TO EDUCATION, TO ART, SCIENCE AND RELIGION. THE GREAT WORD OF BOOKER T. WASHINGTON IS JUST AS TRUE TODAY AS IT WAS WHEN HE ENNUNCIATED IT; MAINLY, THAT THE FIRST BUSINESS OF THE FREED NEGRO WAS TO FIND A SECURE PLACE IN AMERICAN INDUSTRY. BUT THE MISTAKE THAT MR. WASHINGTON MADE WAS IN ASSUMING THAT THE WAY TO FIND THIS PLACE WAS CLEAR AND CERTAIN, AND THAT THE DIRECT TOOL BY WHICH THE PLACE WAS TO BE FOUND WAS

CURRICULUM REVISION

A CERTAIN TYPE OF SCHOOL. THIS IS NOT TRUE. IT WAS NOT TRUE IN 1906: IT IS NOT TRUE IN 1935, AND THE REASON THAT IT IS NOT TRUE HAS NOTHING TO DO WITH MR. WASHINGTON'S HONESTY OF PURPOSE, OR WITH THE CURRICULUM IN THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS. IT HAS TO DO WITH SEVERAL OBVIOUS THINGS. IN THE FIRST PLACE, THERE HAVE BEEN PERIODS IN THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD, ESPECIALLY DURING THE MIDDLE AGES, AND THE EARLY HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES, WHEN IT WOULD HAVE BEEN FEASIBLE TO TAKE A CHILD OUT OF SCHOOL AND PUT IT IN A ~~SCHOOL~~ shop to be TRAINED IN THE CURRENT TECHNIQUE OF INDUSTRY. AND THAT TRAINING IN THE TECHNIQUE OF INDUSTRY MIGHT HAVE BEEN CALLED ~~been an~~ EDUCATION, AND MIGHT HAVE HAD NUMBERS OF EDUCATIONAL FEATURES. BUT IT HAS HAPPENED THAT IN THE 19th CENTURY, THE DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRY HAS BEEN SO THAT THIS IS PRACTICALLY IMPOSSIBLE. INDUSTRIAL TECHNIQUE HAS CHANGED SO RAPIDLY AND SO CONTINUOUSLY THAT IT HAS BEEN IMPOSSIBLE FOR ANY SCHOOL TO FOLLOW IT. MACHINES HAVE DISPLACED THE OLD-FASHIONED CARPENTER, SHOEMAKER, TINSSMITH, WAGON BUILDER, AND AUTOMOBILE MAKER. THE NEWER APPLICATIONS OF STEAM AND ELECTRICITY, THE NEW MATERIALS WHICH HAVE BEEN FABRICATED, THE NEW KINDS OF SKILL WHICH HAVE BEEN DEMANDED, ~~HAS~~ have MADE IT IMPERATIVE THAT THE PERSON WHO IS GOING TO ENTER ITS ~~STATE~~ WORK LEARN THE TECHNIQUE OF INDUSTRY IN THE TRADE AND NOT IN THE SCHOOL. NEITHER HAMPTON NOR TUSKEGEE ~~HAS~~ have PLACED ANY NUMBER OF INDEPENDENT FARMERS UPON THE SOIL. NONE OF THE INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS HAVE PERCEPTIBLY INCREASED THE NUMBER OF TRAINED ARTISANS WHO ARE IN INDUSTRY. THIS DOES NOT MEAN THAT THEY HAVE NOT WORKED HARD. BUT THE REASON THAT THE ~~POSITION~~ shops AT HAMPTON AND TUSKEGEE ARE TODAY CLOSED, AND ~~IS~~ these INSTITUTIONS BEING GRADUALLY TURNED INTO CONVENTIONAL HIGH SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES, IS BECAUSE THEY HAD TO RECOGNIZE THAT AS AN INSTITUTION THE SCHOOL COULD NOT DEAL WITH INDUSTRY; THAT THE MATTER OF EARNING A LIVING, THE RATE OF WAGES, THE BUYING AND SELLING OF COMMODITIES, THE ORGANIZATION OF COMMERCE, ALL OF THAT BELONGED TO INSTITUTIONS THAT WERE NOT SCHOOLS BUT WERE FOR THE EXPRESSED PURPOSE OF DEALING WITH INDUSTRY. THE ONE AND ONLY FUNCTION OF THE SCHOOL WAS TO FURNISH INTELLIGENT MEN WHO COULD CONDUCT THESE OTHER SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS.

IT IS HERE THAT SOME SIMPLE-MINDED TEACHERS AND MEMBERS OF SCHOOL BOARDS GET THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE IN ATTEMPTING TO TEACH INDUSTRY IN SCHOOLS. THEY ASSUME THAT TEACHING TYPEWRITING WILL GET A GIRL A PAYING JOB, WHEN IN FACT TEACHING

(19)

CURRICULUM REVISION

GRAMMAR AND SPELLING WOULD COME NEARER THE GOAL. THEY WANT TO TEACH GIRLS TO MAKE BREAD WHICH THEY CAN BUY CHEAPER THAN THEY CAN BAKE; HOW TO ENTERTAIN SIX ~~GIRLS~~ guests AT LUNCHEON AND IGNORE THE PROBLEM OF GETTING THE LUNCHEON; THEY SHOW BOYS HOW TO MAKE WAGONS WHICH COST TWICE AS MUCH AS MACHINE-MADE PRODUCTS. THEY THINK THAT A BUSINESS COURSE IN A COLORED HIGH SCHOOL WILL PUT NEGROES INTO BUSINESS WITHOUT CAPITAL, CREDIT OR EXPERIENCE AND IN DEFIANCE OF THE CHAIN STORE. YOU CANNOT TRAIN SUCCESSFUL COBBLERS AS LONG AS THE UNITED SHOE MACHINERY COMPANY MONOPOLIZES THE MAKING OF CHEAP SHOES; THE PLANING MILL IS DRIVING CARPENTERS OUT OF WORK JUST AS THE FABRICATED HOUSE WILL SOON DRIVE MASONS.

IF THIS IS TRUE OF THE NATION AS A WHOLE, IT IS PECULIARLY TRUE OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO. THE AMERICAN NEGRO HAS DEVELOPED BUT TWO SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS; THE SCHOOL AND THE CHURCH. IT HAS DEVELOPED NO INSTITUTIONS WHICH CAN SUCCESSFULLY DEAL WITH MATTERS OF WORK, INCOME AND WAGE. IN THOSE MATTERS, IT HAS PLACED ITSELF AT THE MERCY OF THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY, AND ASSUMED THAT WITHOUT THE USE OF POLITICAL POWER AND INTELLIGENCE, IT WAS GOING TO STAND THE SAME CHANCE THAT

(20)

WHITE MEN STOOD. THE DIFFICULTY WITH THIS IS THAT EVEN WHITE MEN STOOD POOR CHANCE, AS THE MILLIONS OUT OF EMPLOYMENT TODAY SHOW, AND THE BLACK MAN WAS INDUSTRIALLY ALMOST DISINHERITED.

THE TIME HAS COME, THEREFORE, WHEN OUTSIDE THE SCHOOL, INTELLIGENT WORKERS AND THINKERS AMONG AMERICAN NEGROES SHOULD SET THEMSELVES TO THE PROBLEM OF FURNISHING WORK FOR NEGROES ~~AND~~ at DECENT WAGES, SO THAT OUR YOUNG FOLK CAN GET MARRIED AT THE AGE THEY OUGHT TO BE MARRIED, AND BRING UP HEALTHY CHILDREN, AND SO THAT CONTRADICTORY PHENOMENA OF MILLIONS OF NEGRO WORKERS STARVING WHILE FOOD ROTS ON THE FARMS OF MILLIONS OF NEGRO FARMERS, SHOULD NOT STAND TO MOCK OUR INTELLIGENCE.

IT IS DIFFICULT TO SAY JUST HOW THE NEGRO IS GOING TO FIND HIS WAY OUT OF THE PRESENT DEPRESSION, AND WHAT SOCIAL INSTITUTIONS HE WILL HAVE TO INVENT OR ADOPT IN ORDER TO REACH ECONOMIC INDEPENDENCE. BUT ONE THING IS CERTAIN! THE FIRST STEP TOWARD ANY ACTION IS THE INCREASE OF TRAINED INTELLIGENCE AMONG US. THE FATAL MARK WHICH THIS DEPRESSION IS GOING TO LEAVE UPON THE NEGRO RACE, AS UPON THOUSANDS OF OTHER GROUPS, IS A GROUP OF CHILDREN, YOUTH, AND EVENTUALLY MEN, WHO HAVE HAD THEIR EDUCATION INTERFERED WITH, WHO HAVE BEEN PUSHED BY POVERTY INTO CRIME AND

37-10-246
37-10-247

CURRICULUM REVISION

DISEASE, AND WHO ARE GOING TO PLAGUE THIS RACE AND OTHERS FOR GENERATIONS AFTER THE DEPRESSION PASSES.

WE SHOULD, THEREFORE, CLING TO EDUCATION IN THESE TIME MORE DOGGEDLY AND STUBBORNLY THAN IN TIMES OF PROSPERITY. WE SHOULD SAY TO OURSELVES: IT IS GOING TO TAKE BRAINS AND TRAINED KNOWLEDGE FOR THE WORLD AND OUR RACE TO RIGHT ITSELF AFTER THIS CATASTROPHE, AND ABOVE ALL, TO KEEP ITSELF FROM FALLING INTO SIMILAR CATASTROPHIES IN THE FUTURE; AND THE BASIS OF THIS INTELLIGENCE IS THE WORK DONE IN THE ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOOL TERM, THEREFORE, MUST BE LENGTHENED NO MATTER WHAT THE EXPENSE, OR WHO PAYS IT. THE ATTENDANCE AT THE PUBLIC SCHOOL SHOULD BE COMPULSORY, DESPITE THE RACE AND POVERTY OF THE CHILD, OR THE GREED OF THE FARMERS AND MANUFACTURERS. THE TEACHERS SHOULD MORE CAREFULLY BE SELECTED WITHOUT SILLY RESTRICTIONS AS TO MARRIAGE, SEX, COLOR OR AGE, BUT WITH THE ONE CRITERION: WHETHER THEY KNOW THE SUBJECT WHICH THEY TEACH, AND ARE ABLE TO IMPART INFORMATION TO CHILDREN WHOM THEY CAN CONTROL BY CIVILIZED METHODS.

THE DISCRIMINATION IN WAGES BETWEEN WHITE AND COLORED TEACHERS IN THE SOUTHERN STATES, AND BETWEEN THE AMOUNT SPENT ON WHITE AND COLORED PUPILS, IS ONE OF THE MOST SHORT-SIGHTED MISTAKES THAT A NATION COULD MAKE. FEDERAL AID SHOULD TAKE THE GUISE OF AN EQUALIZATION FUND, SO THAT DISADVANTAGED RACES, GROUPS, AND LOCALITIES, SHOULD HAVE THEIR LACK OF FACILITIES MADE UP [redacted] WITH TAXES PAID BY THE WHOLE NATION.

WE ARE GOING TO HAVE IN THE WORLD SOONER OR LATER A RADICAL REORGANIZATION AND READJUSTMENT OF INDUSTRY. WE ARE GOING TO HAVE A MORE EQUITABLE DISTRIBUTION OF INCOME AND WEALTH. WE ARE GOING TO HAVE A MORE CAREFUL CONTROL OF MACHINERY AND RAW MATERIALS, AND REGULATION OF LAND AND MONOPOLY. IN THIS RECONSTRUCTION, INTELLIGENCE AND CHARACTER ARE GOING TO BE NEEDED. IF ANY PART OF THE COMMUNITY IS DEFICIENT IN INTELLIGENCE AND UNDEVELOPED IN CHARACTER, NOT ONLY WILL THE WHOLE NATION SUFFER, BUT MORE ESPECIALLY THAT IGNORANT AND CRIMINAL PART OF THE NATION WILL BE THE LAST TO SHARE THE BENEFITS OF REORGANIZED INDUSTRY. IT IS, THEREFORE, OF GREAT MOMENT TO US THAT IN THESE DAYS, WE SHOULD STRENGTHEN RATHER THAN WEAKEN THE

Z 3

CURRICULUM REVISION

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS; THAT WE SHOULD INSIST UPON THE STERN DISCIPLINE OF THE MAIN SUBJECTS OF STUDY, AND THAT WE SHOULD DO THIS EVEN AT GREAT SACRIFICE, SO THAT THE INTELLIGENCE OF THE NEGRO RACE CAN EVENTUALLY HELP OUR PEOPLE INHERIT A RIGHTFUL PLACE IN THE NEW KINGDOMS OF INDUSTRY.

37-10-250

(1) Negro Education

c 1935

38-13-63

THE NEGRO SCHOOL AND SOCIAL REORGANIZATION

I like, if possible, to keep within the bounds of the general subject on an occasion like this, but I humbly confess that after reading your convention theme through several times, I have been quite unable to understand its meaning. I can only hope that the subject of this paper, "The Negro School and Social Reorganization", has some faint relation to "Citizenship and the Child-Centered School".

In no other group and no other country, has such faith in the school as an organ of social reform been held, as in the United States and among American Negroes. We seem, almost, to base our whole belief in social reform and economic re-building upon the public school and the college. Naturally, what we mean by this, is that an intelligent citizenship is the first logical step toward the ultimate re-building of humanity. But we must be careful in repeating this truism to remember that reform does not come through the teaching of intelligence; nor even through intelligence itself; but only through the rightly directed work of intelligent men. The school, therefore, is only indirectly an institution for reform. And it is for this reason that in most countries of the world today no one is looking toward the school in itself as the instrument through which the world is to be re-built. This attitude must be adopted in America and in Negro schools lest we land in an intellectual muddle.

(2)

I have, for instance, just come from a meeting of the Negro teachers of Georgia. The main theme of their convention was the "adaptation of the curriculum to the peculiar needs of Negro children;" and the suppressed minor premise was that the social, and particularly the economic difficulties now faced by the Negro race, could be met by a change in the curriculum of the public schools.

38-13-64

It seemed to me, therefore, necessary to emphasize at that meeting the fact that the first job of the public schools was not to put the Negro to work or secure him an income, but to make him an intelligent man. And that, then, as an intelligent man, he, through institutions other than the school, would attack the pressing and fundamental problems of earning a living. And I went further to emphasize the clear truth that the teaching of intelligence depended primarily upon the acquisition of the tools which opened the gates to intelligence; mainly, learning to read, write and count. In this line, I said:

If we follow the development of the public school system the world around, and strengthen our observance by sound psychology, we know perfectly well that what the school child needs, from 6-12, is the careful, continuous, and repeatedly checked pursuit of a few, simple avenues to knowledge. This school curriculum cannot be divided up into separate, unrelated parts. It must be one converging whole, and it must lead to a single, simple, unequivocable result.

38-13-65

First, the child must learn to read. Half, even three-fourths of the difficulties in our schools and colleges and universities, and the difficulties of basing democratic government and civilization upon intelligence, is the plain and unquestioned fact that most people cannot read; they cannot intelligently take a piece of well-written English and in a reasonably short time get a clear and distinct idea of just what the writer meant to say. Now that ability to read does not come by chance or inspiration, it comes by severe and continuous discipline, checked and re-checked by teachers who themselves can read, and who know what to read, and how to read.

There is no substitute for this fundamental knowledge, and no short-cut to its attainment. You cannot exchange for knowledge of reading, adeptness in white-washing the trees on the campus, or facility in boiling potatoes. I should be the last to deny that trees ought to be cared for, or that food ought to be cooked; but I am insisting the first duty of the public school to its children is to teach them to read; and that no person ought to be sent out of the elementary school who cannot read.

38-13-66

Secondly, the child must learn how to write. Not simply to form words and letters by hand, or on the typewriter; but to be able to express its own thoughts, or the thoughts of others in clear, idiomatic, and grammatical English. Here, again, there is absolutely nothing that can take the place of this. I do not care how elaborate the provisions of the elementary school may be for sewing shirts or washing dishes, the first thing which the elementary school must do after the child has learned to read, and while it is learning, is to teach it to write good English. And there again, one has but to listen to the slovenly English on the street and over the radio, the careless talk on the public platform, and the utterly impossible current conversation of men and women, as well as children, to realize that the expression of human thought in America today is in an elementary condition, and that among Negroes it has not quite reached the elementary stage.

The third business of the public school is to teach children to use numbers, and if the public school has been remiss in teaching reading and writing, it has almost failed when it comes to addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division.

Here, again, there is no royal road. My daughter attended as a child a first-class kindergarten and a progressive grade school. But there was so much to study and to do, and so much education rampant, that when she went to a real school, and entered the fifth grade, she had to stop everything and learn the multiplication table. The learning of the multiplication table cannot be done by inspiration or exortation. It is a matter of blunt, hard, exercise of memory, done so repeatedly and for so many years, that it becomes second nature, so that it cannot be forgotten.

Moreover, the proper, and absolutely correct use of numbers is the only road to the use of human reason, and one can see how this discipline has been neglected in the elementary schools of the world, when one notes the pitiable inability of the mass of men to do a simple, straight, bit of reasoning. It is logically easy in every presidential campaign to have two and two equal five, and to have the square of the hypothenuse equal anything but what it logically and unalterably must equal.

These are the three disciplines which are the gates to intelligence, and which no school can fail to teach thoroughly and definitely, and call itself a school.

But our problem of earning a living within the Negro race is not settled by a negative. If the school is not the organ which is going to help the Negro achieve economic reform, how is this reform to be brought about? Because, certainly, the present situation is critical and full of dangers. It has changed materially from the early years of the 20th Century. At that time, we had laid down a program of economic re-building which gained wide allegiance. It was pointed out then that the mass of Negroes were farmers, laborers, and servants; that in all probability these were going to be the occupations of the mass of the Negroes for many years; that, therefore, Negroes should be trained for these occupations so that they would do them well, and that the best place for this training was in a certain type of school called the industrial school.

A generation has gone by. The Negroes are still, mainly, farmers, servants and laborers, although the proportion of laborers in the industries has increased, the servants decreased, and the proportion of those in the professions has also increased, but is still very small, as compared with the total. Moreover, the industrial schools have not succeeded in placing upon farms any considerable proportion of intelligent Negro farmers, while the proportion of Negroes in the skilled and semi-skilled trades has not noticeably increased; indeed, in many lines, it has decreased.

The elaborate trade schools, at Hampton and Tuskegee, are practically closed. The various schools of household arts and home economics are surviving but they are not furnishing any number of servants. They are training housewives, although in the meantime, the kind of home with its self-centered manufacturing occupations for which these schools are adapted, is disappearing in the new apartment house and community life.

All this does not mean that the industrial school has been in vain, or accomplished nothing. It is probably true that there are more good Negro farmers because of the industrial schools than there would have been if agriculture had not been so stressed and taught. It is just as true that the disappearance of many types of Negro artisans is a fellow phenomenon with the disappearance of similar types of white artisans. Indeed, what we have faced is a peculiar period of economic change. If industry had been as static in the 20th Century as in the 16th, industrial and trade schools might have been devised which would have been successful. But what with the use of capital, power and machines, the rise of mass production and the new methods of transport and distribution, the whole face of industry has undergone a revolutionwhich can only be compared to the industrial revolution of the 19th Century; and no system of instruction could stand before these strains. Here, again, this is no time simply to criticize or indicate failure. Rather, it is a time that calls all the more strongly for far-seeing constructive planning and work.

I do not have to tell you, who are in so close touch with actual conditions among the Negro race, how heavy the present pressure is upon our people. The peculiar Negro job has almost disappeared. The competition for the lowest and worst paid lines of work, between whites and blacks, is fierce, with the advantage going to those whites who are protected by political power, and social sanction. The common laborer, working at the machine, is displacing the old, skilled laborer in all fields of industry. The concentration in the control of capital is making individual thrift of little account today.

38-13-11

Take, for instance, the situation of the Negro farmer. Without land and without capital, and without control of the markets, he is in an impossible condition. The mistake of not making him a peasant-proprietor during Reconstruction, as Thaddeus Stevens and Charles Sumer so wisely maintained, is now clearly seen. The impossibility of solving the labor problem without machines, and the impossibility of using machines profitably on small farms, has been shown in the great Russian experiment. And finally, the effective and close organization of manufacturing and transport, has beaten down the price of raw materials the world over to a place that makes it almost impossible to raise them with profit.

38-13-72

What, now, is going to happen to the country and to the Negro? Manifestly, there are three possibilities which may again be called the three "R's": drastic revolution in the whole basis of the organization of industry; or far-reaching reform which does not go to the extent of revolution, and yet does make widespread change in the economic functions of government; or, finally, what is called Recovery; that is, the restoration of the former industrial status.

The thing for Negroes to remember is that in any case, whether prosperity returns on the old basis, or the present reforms are institutionalized and made at least in part pe manent; or whether there is a drastic change in the organization of industry; in any of these three cases, the Negro in America has got to organize in economic lines in order to safeguard his future, and be sure of his bread and butter.

We must not adopt or pursue any mere policy of drift. We must unite in planned racial co-operation for our economic emancipation. This is the basic meaning of that so-called new advocacy of segregation with which I have been rather frankly criticized in these latter days. My fundamental opposition to race segregation and discrimination is unchanged. I have no allusions about their meaning. Segregation, legal or voluntary, puts off the day of complete nationalism of a unified humanity. It is a step along that perilous path which in the long run leads to race deification, national patriotism, and world war. Nevertheless, it is a path that we are forced for a time to follow by grim necessity and unyielding race hatred, because only by uniting for justifiable self-defense can we meet the kind of economic war which we are today facing. No mere individualism, either in merit or effort, is going to gain the Negro the right to earn a decent living. He must unite the strength of a nation of twelve million people to protect himself from starvation, and to force himself on an economic plane where his work will be paid for and his demands recognized. Nor can he escape by deserting his masses and peeling off layer after layer of upper classes who propose to live on the poverty and exploitation of the classes beneath. To this ancient path of progress modern economic ethics opposes a bland wall which we will be fools to seek to oppose.

What now can be done?

We have in the Negro race, organized in different degrees of efficiency, three institutions: the school, the church, and what we may more loosely call, Negro business; that is, those efforts within the race to earn a living by exchange of reciprocal services. It is, as I have said, the work of the school to furnish intelligent men; to teach children to read, write and count; to give them in the high school some idea of the world in which they live; and to put through college those persons of ability among us who can use the great body of accumulated science and knowledge.

This is not being effectively done today, particularly during these days of depression. Our elementary schools are in wretched condition; the teachers unpaid, the school terms short and irregular, the school housing and facilities grossly inadequate. No inapt comparisons with the past can gainsay this. If we are educationally better off than we were in 1885, we are compared with the nation much worse off. Nevertheless, we have a growing body of trained men. Men, who to be sure, show lapses and lacunae in their training, but who, nevertheless, are men with modern ideas and modern knowledge. This knowledge has got to be used today in far-sighted and effective planning, and teachers, espcially, are in positions to do outside the school room and in their capacity as intelligent men, work that the school itself cannot do.

38-13-75

I am going to make a suggestion here, tonight, that I have not made before, and which at first will seem to you almost fantastic; but before you pronounce judgment upon it, give it long thought.

Negro business is either a branch of orduplication of white business. In our banking and insurance, we are practically a part of the white set-up. If, for instance, the big banks of Chicago decide to freeze out 200 of the smaller banks in order to consolidate their position in a time of crisis, the first of the smaller banks to go, because there is least opposition to it, is the colored Binga Bank. The Binga

38-13-76

Bank was not bankrupt in any real sense of the term, and it was not inefficiently conducted. Its failure was not the result of dishonesty. It was simply the freezing out of the small business men because Big Business needed his assets. It was a thing which under our present system can and does continually happen to small white business and forms one of the tragedies of our day. To us it is more apt to happen because of prejudice and the result is more disastrous. So long as the funds of Negro insurance organizations must be invested in white business enterprises, their safety and permanency depends absolutely on white business. If in the future this investment of funds can be safeguarded in Negro enterprises, the element of race discrimination can be avoided. Is this possible? This brings us to other lines of Negro business which seek to establish reciprocal services between Negro workers and Negro dealers, and thus reach a racial independence in part. They are handicapped by severe competition with white aggregations of capital, like the chain stores, and also by the fact that they are profit-making institutions. Now, private profit in the reorganization of industry which faces us is under fire. And while it is not going to disappear immediately, it is going to be reduced in volume, and it is going to be suspect. Yet, American Negroes have taken almost no steps toward reorganizing business among them on a non-profit basis.

Most of us do not realize this crucial point in the present plans for the reorganization of industry. The complete abolition of private profit, and the ownership of land and machines by the state, is undoubtedly a far-off ideal. But partial steps in this direction have been taken in our day by every civilized state, and the steps in the United States are well-known to you, although they are called by various names. We have interfered with private property in agriculture, and manufactures. We have set rates of wages and required conditions of work which have cut down the possibility of profit; we have furnished and controlled capital in railroads, and we are faced with the possibility of nationalizing the whole means of transportation in a future not far distinct.

:75

38-13-77

The individual citizens that enter into such a reorganized industry have got to be trained to the new ideals and new outlook. They have got to realize their position as consumers, and organize themselves accordingly. If colored people do this, and do it promptly, they are going to become eligible and valuable citizens in the new state. But if they allow themselves to continue to be the unthinking victims of exploitation; to be laborers, unorganized and unmindful of their rights, they will in the new state be subject to all the disabilities which they suffer now, if not to others more fatal.

38-13-78

I suggest, therefore, a step which they might take. The most complete and oldest, and in some respects the most effective Negro institution, is the Negro church. Without it, Negro business would be largely helpless, and the connection between the church and the school is historic. But the Negro church today has come upon difficult days. Its theology and creed are no longer compelling; the training of its ministers is poor, and ill-adapted to the function of the church. The housing of the church is often elaborate beyond its necessary social function, and to put it baldly, the Negro church needs something to do, and someone to do it.

Now, why would it not be possible for the Negro church to add to its organization, a business manager: a trained man with business methods, and particularly a knowledge of non-profit business methods, who had studied the work of consumers' co-operation throughout Europe, and in the United States.

38-13-79

Consumers' co-operation consists of group-buying on a large scale in order to save the profit of the wholesale and retail merchant; and the distribution of these goods to consumers at cost.

If the church today furnishes recreation and information to its members, there is no reason why tomorrow it should not furnish coal, food, houses and clothes, and a trained business manager, either running an organization under the auspices of the church, or taking charge of the whole business of the church, could accomplish this and eliminate the private profit motive from Negro economic organization.

This would leave a chance for the Negro minister to be an ethical leader and source of intellectual information for his people, just as the Jewish rabbi is today in the reformed Jewish church. This would mean, of course, a definite type of pastor than what we have today. It would mean that young men of high character and brains would have to be attracted to theological schools in a way that they are not attracted at all today. The whole course of study in theological schools would be changed. There would be an end to eschatology, homiletics, and exegesis; there would be an end to Hebrew and liturgics; and a stressing of economics and sociology, of history and modern languages, of music and art.

Such young, vivid and honest men, freed from the necessity of these endless collections from the poverty of the poor, could talk about things that they were interested in on this earth, instead of confining themselves to heaven and hell.

38-13-80

I know how difficult and seemingly impossible this program appears in the mere stating. It would involve the elimination from the present church organization just as far as possible, theology, and supernationalism. It would relegate miracles to the lore of fairy tales, and prayer would become earnest and purposeful effort. Nevertheless, the Negro church, and even the white church, faces grim alternatives: either it becomes a great social organ with ethical ideals based on a reorganized economics, or it becomes a futile and mouthy excrescence on society which will always be a refuge for reaction and superstition.

38-13-81

On the other hand, with this change that I indicate, there need be nothing revolutionary or sudden. The co-operative enterprise could be grafted on the church in the same way that organized charity and job-hunting and the visiting of the sick is a part of its present program. It could gradually be incorporated into the church organization and the business manager become the manager of the church with the minister as ethical leader. This method would save a great deal of the expense and difficulty of an entire new organization, in expenditure for housing, and in media for propaganda.

On the other hand, if this is not done, the co-operatives can and must be set-up as organizations entirely distinct from the church, which means that they must furnish housing; that they must furnish propaganda by methods which will eat into the church organization, even more than the fraternal lodges have, because the mission of the co-operatives will be more vital and the results more satisfactory. The object of this new church would be gradually to absorb Negro business, except in its larger forms, where it would for a long time be compelled to be a part of the national organization. It could begin a program of reciprocal service among a large proportion of the 12,000,000 Negroes in the United States. There is no reason why our 2,000,000 farmers should not furnish a large part of the food which Negroes eat, and of raw materials which they use. There is no reason why, with the use of modern machinery, and the new cheap power which is coming nearer to the home and farm each year, some of this raw material should not be turned by the Negro workers into goods which Negroes themselves use. Actual barter could be instituted in many cases, and group-buying on a scale which would greatly cheapen the price of goods for the mass of Negroes, and at the same time, give them employment at decent wages.

38-13-82

I do not think that we ourselves quite realize how wretchedly the average Negro worker is victimized and exploited by petty profiteers, particularly under the facile laws of the South. This is entirely unnecessary and it wastes a large proportion of the low wages which Negro workers receive.

38-13-83

There will be those who will characterize all this as imagination, and yet what I have proposed here has been done and is being done by a thousand groups throughout the world. The only reason that we do not know about it, is because it is to the interest of those who are profiting by the present organisation, that we should not learn. Newspapers can chronicle crime, gossip, and scandal, but not a word about the success of credit unions. The Peoples' Bank, that is, credit unions, where numbers of poor and honest people pool their savings and loan to each other small sums in time of stress or trouble, began in 1849 in Europe. Today, in Germany alone, there are more than 20,000 of them. They are spread through France, Russia, China, Japan, and South America. Even in the United States, there are 2,000, and the chief work of Henry Hunt, our representative in the Department of Agriculture, is to spread the knowledge of these credit unions among American Negroes.

Denmark, a generation ago, was a country which geographically resembled the spiritual condition of American Negroes. It stood between the powerful commercial organizations of England and Germany; it sold its raw material for nothing, and bought its manufactured goods at high prices. It was, in modern parlance, helpless; and yet, Denmark today is probably the best-educated, and economically the most independent land in the world; and the transformation was brought about by farmers who established seven hundred and fifty co-operative creameries, from 1881 to 1890, and from this the co-operatives went to the raising and selling of meat, the furnishing of butter and eggs, and the establishment of 1,800 stores, to supply the wants of 2,000,000 people without paying private profit. Two generations ago, 42% of the Danes were tenants; today, 90% own their land.

38-13-84

The people of Finland went into wholesale co-operation. They bought in large quantities through ten wholesale stores which had been established by 1928, and did a business of $75,000,000 a year. Co-operation in England began with 28 members in 1844, and in 1930, the sales were $1,000,000,000, on which the surplus over cost was $100,000,000; and that surplus instead of going into the hands of private promoters, went back to the people who bought the goods. The English co-operative movement carries on manufactures, banking, and insurance. It owns 32,000 acres of land in India and Ceylon to raise tea; it owns and runs ship lines, printing plants and schools, and it employs 40,000 persons. This does not deny the fact that co-operation is difficult to carry on. It calls for devotion, education, and high ethical standards. Thepath of its success is strewn with failure, but there is today nothing in the world that points so directly to a peaceful reform of industry, and a reform adapted to disadvantaged minorities who are the victims of prejudice and discrimination. Colored America is bound, sooner or later, to try this path.

38-13-85

If it could be tried in a new and re-born Negro church, then with this new church, let me end by insisting should go the old school; that is, the school which thoroughly teaches themass of children to read, write, and count. Even though their education ends here, the gates of knowledge are open to them; and led by an intelligent ministry, they could get a higher training, even though they never entered the high school or a college. This may all seem fantastic and approaching the realm of dreams, but we have only to remember that it is by means of dreaming like this that the world has become as decent a place to live in as it is; and it is only by paths that lead to the stars, that we are going really to escape the present depression, and the series of depressions and wars that threaten the future.

38-13-86

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

A lecture given in Milbank Chapel, Teachers College, Columbia University, Wednesday evening, March 25, 1936

Dr. W. E. B. Du Bois, Head of the Department of Sociology, Atlanta University, Atlanta, Ga.

It is impossible in any question of the relations of human beings to present any one simple way in which these relations can be improved and made ideal; and if we have to deal not simply with individuals but with groups of individuals having different history and training, then the difficulty of making any one so-called solution is even greater. It is difficult not only from the point of view of those who are outside the particular group you are thinking of, but also for the group itself.

Perhaps I can make clearest the difficulties of such philosophy and thought by treating it historically. There is, it seems to me, a sort of rhythm in the attitude of American Negroes toward their own problems. There have come times when some particular part or some particular aspect of the problems was of so great importance that it seemed as if all effort and all thought ought to be concentrated upon it. No one dreamed that this was the whole problem, but it seemed at the time as the thing of greatest moment. Then there would come other days when there was more of doubt; when the diversities, the many-sided difficulties of the problem presented themselves and one found, within and without the group, all sorts of solutions.

Let us illustrate this. Before the Revolutionary War there was that mob in Boston that defied the British soldiers. The man who led them was a fugitive slave, yet he identified himself entirely with the colonists. He was the one who yelled out to the soldiers and talked singularly enough of the "liberties" of the United States. It was quite fitting that the first national holiday of this country should for years have been celebrated on the day that Crispus Attucks died. He must have been conscious, and the small number of colored people in Boston must have been conscious, that there were many problems outside the colonial difficulties with England, in which they as Negroes were interested. But they knew that at that time they were identified with the interests of the colonies and the colonists looked upon them as one with them; if they did not look upon them as Indians or foreigners, but as part of the population of the colony that was fighting against England, then later the Negroes could better attack slavery and caste. This thought brought then concentration of effort since it was absolutely necessary that the Negroes insist upon being considered a part of the colonial population. They became a part and emancipation came gradually to all slaves in the Northern colonies.

37-11-102

Later, in 1787, there came a different series of events and more scattered efforts at solution.

St. George's Church in Philadelphia at Fourth and Vine Streets was a great Methodist Church. The Methodists rather prided themselves that they had followed Jesus Christ rather more fully than the Episcopalians in dealing with slavery. The Church of England had met many difficulties in inducing masters to send their slaves to church. The Methodists had invited them in. St. George's had grown to be the most popular church in Philadelphia. But in 1787, there had begun to pour into the city a large number of freed slaves from Pennsylvania with some fugitive slaves from Delaware and Maryland. So that the number of black folk who worshipped God in St. George's brought difficulties. They were not cultivated; they were not always clean; their manners were not the best. They were, nevertheless, welcomed there until it seemed to the good people of St. George's that something had to be done about this influx of dark Christians.

One Sunday morning two black men were on their knees praying, when the verger tapped them on the shoulder and courteously asked them to continue their prayers in the gallery.

Immediately a problem was presented to these men. Richard Allen was a man of good repute, a leader in a colored group of honest, God-fearing men. He didn't like this sort of thing. He hesitated as to what he should do about it. He knew he had not been asked to go to the gallery simply by the man who tapped him on the shoulder. Undoubtedly it was the decision of the church. He asked to be allowed to finish his prayer and then promised that he would leave and would not come again.

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR
NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

Not all the Negroes agreed. Some said, "What of it?" They could worship in the gallery just as well. Most of them had never been used to anything else. In fact, the gallery was closer to heaven. Others thought nothing about it. If they were told to go to the gallery, they went.

The little group with Richard Allen and Absolom Jones did not go to the gallery. They walked out of the church and then sat down and thought about where they were going to worship.

They formed a little organization with some insurance features and discussed the future after they had voluntarily segregated themselves from the white congregation. They differed in opinion. One part was invited to form a church under the Episcopalians. Their leader, Absolom Jones, was made rector of the church; but he was never allowed to meet with the white ministers. His group formed a church, but it was a church apart from the other churches. That church has grown; similar churches have grown, until you have 51,502 colored Episcopalians in 7,299 churches in the United States. But the segregation of these churches from white churches has never disappeared.

The men under Richard Allen were not satisfied with this. They said, "We are not going to accept segregated membership in any church. We are going to have our own church. They formed the African Methodist Episcopal Church. This church today has 545,814 members in 6,708 churches. It is a Negro organization, with Negro bishops, and owns 32 millions of dollars worth of property.

That, of course, is no final settlement of the race problem. This church is still a separate body. It lives to itself and it builds up the fences between itself and the other churches. Nor does this solution end this peculiar caste. Some Negroes who stayed in St. George's Church, they and their descendants are still Methodists, and number 26,130 members. But they form separate congregations with black ministers and black bishops. There is no reason why the Methodist Church South and the Methodist Church should not unite, except one, and that is this: what is going to be the status of these Negroes in the reunited church?

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR
NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

There were other differences of opinion as to what that little group of Negroes on their knees in St. George's should have done under the circumstances. I leave it to you to decide which part of them did the wisest thing for themselves, for the people of the United States, for the world.

To go on a few years. We come to 1812. It is not altogether clear what ~~this~~ the dispute was which made us go to war, but there were certainly some sailors who were taken forcibly from American ships by the English and put on English ships with the general feeling that America had no business to have ships. A large number of the sailors thus impressed were Negro sailors. Here again came absolute concentration of object among Negroes. They must be defended as American citizens and fight as such. They were thus going to settle their own problem in the United States and become a free people not only in the North, but in the Southern colonies. It did not come to that because of vital economic changes taking place in the world. Nevertheless, the War of 1812 strengthened the cause of Emancipation.

In about twenty years, we come to a different situation. The cotton kingdom had become areality, though not yet fully recognized. The South was beginning to consider slavery as a permanent part of a new economy. That meant that the Negro was beginning to feel the pinch of a new exploitation, and emancipation ceased. Slaves ran away North and met the competition of immigrant labor. In Philadelphia, the immigrants attacked them. In Cincinnati, they drove out Negroes who were doing rather well. Most of them were fugitives and were living in the city contrary to law. But people had winked at it and were rather proud of the way these ex-slaves were getting on. But the rivalry of white workers who were looking for the same jobs gave rise to stricter enforcement of laws. Walker's Appeal in 1829 was the bitter reply of harried black folk. It was a drastic arraignment of the nation. The Legislature of South Carolina took particular notice of it.

Negroes had to act, and they called a convention in Philadelphia in 1830. It was the first time that the Negroes of the United States had tried to come together in anything like a national assembly. There were Negroes who said, "What is the use of talking about what is to be done? We are at the mercy of the whites and must do in the long run what they tell us we must do." Others disagreed. They had corresponded with the Governor-General of Canada and had been told if Negroes wanted to settle in Canada they would be welcome to come there. Five or six thousand Negroes left the United States and went to Canada. They prospered there. They helped slaves to escape. Later, when John Brown laid his plans, he went to Chatham, Canada, to get his recruits.

The question of education came up in the meetings of 1830 and 1831. Negroes were not admitted to schools. The most fantastic things happened. When they sent the two unusually gifted black boys to a school in Vermont, the farmers hitched their oxen to the school and dragged it across the State line. In Connecticut, Prudence Crandal was jailed for admitting a Negro to her school. There were all sorts of reasons given why Negroes could not be admitted to schools, the chief of which was that they could not learn, and were evil companions.

The conventions of 1830 and 1831 tried to organize separate Negro schools and succeeded. Soon after, a West Indian Quaker gave money for a school in Philadelphia which became a center of higher education for Negroes. Private elementary schools established in Philadelphia and New York in the eighteenth century took on new life. Here then came movements of migration and segregation to settle the race problem.

There came a change. About 1845, a great number of people had risen who said, Slavery is a danger, not simply a danger to the South and to the colored people, but a danger to the nation. And the more radical added: Slavery is absolutely wrong and must go. This meant that again that a new simplicity and point of concentration appeared as a solution of the race problem. No Negro, no white man, believed that the abolition of slavery was going suddenly to make the Negro equal to the white. But it was an initial step, and it had to be taken immediately, and therefore beginning about 1845, the Negroes, with one voice, started in to help the abolitionists led by such men as William Lloyd Garrison and Frederick Douglass.

Ten years later, the whole atmosphere had changed. There was a convention in Rochester, where Frederick Douglass lived in 1854. It was a convention of colored people who had been working with the abolitionists for the abolition of slavery. They were largely discouraged and said: "The church has gone over to slavery, bag and baggage... The Government is owned by the South. The whole action of the country, its commercial policy, its social organization, is in favor of slavery. Frederick Douglass still held to his principles. The fight was discouraging, but must be kept up."

27-11-106

But many of his followers sat around and said: "We will have to submit. There is nothing we can do but wait until the white people abolish slavery." Others said, "There is no chance for Negroes in America. It is our business to see what can be done outside of America." They met the following year and sent one emissary to Mexico and Central America. He died on the way. They sent another one to Haiti. He became an Episcopal bishop there and eventually induced several thousand Negroes to migrate there. They sent Martin R. Delaney to Africa. He made an astonishing number of excellent contacts with the African chiefs and tribes. It is interesting to think what might have some of this happened if the Civil War had not intervened. He was gone five or six years, and when he got back, we were on the verge of war, and this diversity of ideas as to what Negroes must do was unified by war. They must fight on the side of the North. A few asked why should they fight at all. Mr. Lincoln was not opposing slavery. There was no guarantee in the battle cry of the "Union" that this was going to end in emancipation for the slaves. Even when the invitation came to join the war, some Negroes said, "After all, we are being asked to pull other people's chestnuts out of the fire. We are not sure this will end in universal emancipation. The white soldiers are offered certain perquisites and certain salaries. The colored soldiers get less and are doing the same kind of work."

All this was gradually overcome and by 1870, there was concentration of Negro opinion: the Negroes have the vote; they should vote to make the Negro workers and the white workers the dominant power in the State. Negroes were among the first that talked of democracy, including woman suffrage in the South. They were the first to establish public schools. They were the first to advocate distribute public land. Old-age pensions and economic security were mentioned long before they were considered seriously in the North. Negroes felt their lack of leadership, and of economic power behind their voting power, and finally because the white laboring class deserted the blacks, the political power of the Negro was nullified.

There was again, from 1876-1896, concentration of thought and action for getting political power back. But there came a new voice about the beginning of the twentieth century which insisted that the great thing for the colored people to do was to think of their economic power; of their right to work and their need to be trained for the jobs that were to be done. White men who ~~have~~ had been doing these jobs ~~have~~ had been organizing to demand higher wages and different conditions of work. Here ~~is~~ was the chance for the white employer to secure dependable labor and for the Negro to become such an integral part of industry that he ~~cannot~~ could be ousted. Negroes ~~can~~ could then follow the classic American path to wealth. They ~~can~~ could save and invest; they ~~can~~ could hire labor and in this way, the race problem ~~can~~ could be solved by making it part of the exploitation of labor in the United States, regardless of color.

This plan for solving the race problem, first announced by Booker T. Washington in 1896 at the Atlanta Exposition, brought widespread diversity of opinion among Negroes. Some thought that the stress on industrial education to furnish workers meant danger to Negro colleges and that enough Negro leaders would not be trained to guide the group in the future. They did not trust the leadership of white industry. On the other hand, a large section of Negroes, with the approval and encouragement of an almost unanimous white opinion, stressed business and industry, together with industrial training, as the solution of the race problem.

Increasing industrial prosperity encouraged both groups. Negroes began to buy land and amass capital, while they also contributed to organizations which agitated for legal protection and civil rights. Then came the World War, and its first effect upon Negroes was to open in the North an opportunity for employment caused by the cessation of immigration. Thousands went North and this increased race friction and job rivalry with the white groups. When the United States entered the World War, there were irritating and discriminating occurrences; segregation in the draft, refusal to commission Negro officers, and lynching. Negro opinion again became solidified and by organized pressure and political power, they secured better treatment for the draftees; seven hundred commissioned Negro officers, and a pronouncement against lynching by a Democratic president. The final outcome of their experience in the World War was to unite the Negroes in a determination to fight more steadily and insistently for equal rights of citizenship, but economic changes, due to war, frustrated this. The depression struck Negro workers first; and they became increasingly aware, between 1920 and 1930, that the economic foundation which was to be the basis of their fight for equality, was disappearing, and that they must for that reason reform their lines.

That brings us down to the situation in 1936, and the question as to what today, ~~in 1936~~, especially in the North is the basic philosophy of colored people. It is very easy to state what that ideal philosophy is. They want legal and civil equality. They want social contact, that social contact that every normal human being must have in order to be a real part of the social organization. They want economic justice which they are very far from having today.

The question is, however, how are they going to get all this? How are they going, by any action on their part, or action which they can induce on the part of their neighbors, to get this equality?

Despite all that Negroes had accomplished, the walls of race prejudice still stood and with little essential change. The excellent civil rights law passed in New York and some other states was only partially enforced because public opinion was not back of them. Confining ourselves to the Negroes in the North who form today one-fifth of the Negro population, we can more easily see the anomaly of the present situation. The two and one-half million Northern Negroes have an illiteracy of less than [redacted] city population primarily of servants and laborers, with a small professional and business class. The difficulties which confront them in seeking work, education and social ~~recreation~~ contacts can be illustrated in several ways: first, consider Wilberforce University, whose singers have entertained us tonight. It is a Negro institution carried on by the State of Ohio in defiance of its own laws. The reason for this is that Ohio State University does not want Negroes. The state, therefore, furnishes this separate institution, and the Negro has to decide whether to accept humiliating treatment in a mixed state institution, or a lower grade of instruction in a separate institution. If I were Mr. Mussolini of Ohio, I would force the state to give Wilberforce enough funds so as to make it a university so good that no colored student, and a good many white students, could afford to go anywhere else.

So in employment. Negroes ought not to be above working as servants and common laborers, but the income which these workers make is too small to support families decently, and in addition to that, many Negroes are capable of doing better work, but they are not given the opportunity, either by ~~decent~~ trade unions, or by employers.

The result is among Negroes an extraordinary spirit of defeatism. They have been taught to assume that everything ~~right~~ white is right, and that the one goal they have to reach is what white people have done. They have got to conquer this and to remember that they belong to that majority of mankind whose interests are the real interests of the world, whether they are represented by colored races or suppressed industrial classes among whites. This calls for organized action and primarily action among colored people. And this group action must be guided toward the organization of the power of Negroes as workers and consumers for the uplift and emancipation of their own race and other suppressed races and classes.

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

(Questions and Answers.)

Q. You mentioned the words "equality", and "social contact". I presume you meant the mingling of the races and the sexes. Is that what you meant?

A. Yes.

Q. But sometimes when white people have sought to mingle with colored people socially, they have been kicked out.

A. If I were kicked out under those circumstances, I would not go back.

Q. Would it be possible for the Negro to live in an American civilization and develop his own separate and distinct culture?

A. No, not entirely. He could not, for instance, develop a complete economic organization within the present system. Nevertheless, he could do a great deal toward a group economic organization and a great deal in the development of group culture.

Q. Could economic improvement for Negroes come without a revolutionary change in the present economic organization?

A. An improvement in economic conditions among Negroes must depend, of course, on improvement in the general economic conditions; but on the other hand, it must not be assumed that a great change or even a revolution in our industrial organization would imply automatically a disappearance of race prejudice. What I am saying is not that economic justice would not have a tremendous effect. Of course it would. But it is not going of itself to do away with race prejudice.

Q. Why were you not among the sponsors of the recent race congress in Chicago?

A. I have attended so many congresses in my life that I am not so eager to attend others. We have never had a real representative congress of American Negroes with elected delegates. When the Chicago congress was first proposed, I thought the sponsors had this in mind, and I said I did not think the time was ripe. When this plan was given up, and the Congress was simply a meeting, such as we have had many times before, I saw no particular reason why I should attend.

Q. You mean in effect that it would be a good thing for the Negro people to support a Fascist development in this country?

A. I never said anything of the sort.

Q. Does not the Russian revolution prove that communism is a cure for race prejudice?

A. No. Communism put down anti- Jewish prejudice in Russia because the leaders of the Communists were largely Jews. If in America Negroes were leaders in the labor movement, and the labor movement accomplished a revolutionary change in industry, then Negroes might see anti-Negro prejudice disappear with the new regime. But Negroes have always been excluded from the main labor movement in the United States and consequently a triumph of labor would not necessarily mean a lessening of race prejudice.

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

(Questions and Answers.)

I believe, of course, that at the bottom of race prejudice is the great economic cause. But I do not believe that this is the sole cause of race prejudice, particularly in a country like the United States. On the other hand, it would be a great deal easier to do away with race prejudice if we had economic justice.

Q. What would be your method of approach in bringing about consumers' co-operatives among Negroes?

A. I believe that the organization of the Negro as a consumer is the best step for the Negro to take. But it calls not simply for isolated efforts here and there, but a widely planned and carefully guided national movement among Negroes.

Q. Would it be advisable to start co-operatives under a system where there is so much race prejudice, as in the United States?

A. Yes, it would, and if the consumers were properly educated and remained loyal, there is no reason why they should not succeed.

Q. What should colored members of the Methodist Church do in the present situation when the Northern and Southern branches of the church are planning union?

A. I do not know what I would do if I happen to belong to the Methodist Church. I am afraid I would be so mad that I would not stay in the church at all. Negro Methodists should try to fight the thing through, and see what measure of justice they can get.

Q. Do youbelieve that the Negro church can help co-operation?

A. I think it undoubtedly might do so. If the church furnishes amusement for its people, information through lectures, food and relief of various kinds, why could it not furnish housing, coal and provisions by co-operative buying? Negro congregations with almost no capital can buy a large and expensive church. Why could they not finance a large housing proposition?

Q. If you are going to organize group action among colored people, how are yougoing to keep it from being mere dictatorship?

A. You can only do so by using common sense and education. If successful group action among colored people is aimed toward substituting colored masters of the world for white masters, we are still going to have a pretty poor kind of world. We have got to keep in mind that in order to move toward permanent human culture, all kinds of people have got to be given opportunity.

Q. When yo speak of co- peratives, what about the co-operatives in Austria which are in ruins? Is it safe to try co-operation when there have been so many failures?

A. Yes, I think it is. We have tried democracy and failed, but we must keep trying.

Q. At Teachers' College, we have been working for Federal support for education. The problem is: shall we wait for such support until we can have a law which will guarantee that the money will be distributed on a per capita basis among both races, or should we advocate a law now, realizing that the Negroes would not get a fair share?

BASIC PHILOSOPHY AND POLICIES FOR NEGRO LIFE IN THE NORTH

(Questions and Answers.)

A. I do not know which would be the better policy. In 1933-1934, the United States Government allotted to education in Georgia an emergency grant of $4,981,881, but only $643,733 went to colored schools, or 12.7%, although the colored children formed during this time 39 1/10% of the total school population. Yet this $600,000 spelled salvation to many colored children, although it wa s spent almost entirely in the cities and not in the country districts. This poses the whole problem as to how far a pittance can be accepted, instead of one's just dues.

37-11-112

The Meaning of Japan

I have thought that it might be instructive to turn from our own race problem to one of the great problems of the world and to consider the meaning of Japan in modern civilization. I do this the more gladly because Japan is a colored nation and thus exemplifies one of the color problems of the world.

The physical aspect of Japan as one sails across the China Sea from Shanghai is that of slim brown mountains rising suddenly from the water. The vegetation is sparse, only 15% of the whole area of Japan being cultivable. And yet the green of trees, the struggle of the crop, and the blooming of flowers gives a singular aspect of beauty and charm to the busy industry on the three islands that stretch northeast from Korea to Sakahlin.

Japan is a small country, smaller than Texas and but twice the size of Great Britain; but it is thickly settled with 70 millions of people. They came east ward to these islands from China and Korea, and northwest from the darker Malay lands and from India, and form a mixed people, short of stature, yellow and brown in color with coarse straight hair.

Here on these little islands the drama of their life has been played for $2\frac{1}{2}$ thousand years. The beginnings are swathed in myth with the first clear openings centering in strife with Korea which was the geographic center of the extension of Japan from the mainland to the sea, and which the inland Japanese conquered in the second century. From Korea and China came books and scholars, and upon this foundation Japanese civilization began to expand in the 5th and 6th centuries. Buddhism came from India at the same time that Christianity came to France and Great Britain. And in 710 the first permanent Japanese capital was erected at Nara. I was in Nara last fall and later in Kioto which became the second capital in 794. Here one can still see the subtler expressions of Japanese life; the beauty of architecture; the spread of poetry and painting; the growth of Shinto, the religion of honor and sacrifice, paralelling the more ceremonious Buddhism; and building up that pattern of Japanese civilization that has so captured the imagination of the world. The Toshoga Temple at Nikko, known to the world for the three monkeys who see, hear and speak no evil, is a characteristic gem of building. It is small and built of wood, colored white and red and brown, old and hard as stone. It rises against a hillside of tall and ancient trees, immense with leaf and gloom. It is perhaps over elaborate with intricate carving and symbolic ornamentation, but its roofs climbing on roofs, its dark tile, its carved beams and panels, its steps and statues made a thing of never to be forgotten beauty.

One other link of Japan with America and the American Negro might be mentioned. The same impulse which after the war sent teachers into the South to establish higher schools for Negroes sent teachers and missionaries into Japan. Japanese higher education, in its Western aspect, began then at the same time that Atlanta, Fisk, Talladega and Howard were established in the United States. Waseda and Doshisha are the Japanese equivalents of our schools. The role of the mission university in Japan was singular. It became the gate way through which Western education and Western ideas poured into Japan and it attracted some of the finest of the young Japanese students. The history of these schools differs naturally from ours. The graduates stood high in the industrial, educational, and political life of new Japan. They were able to supply endowment and government support. On the other hand, representing Christianity, a religion of the West, they encountered some difficulties and have been superceded in many respects today by the great imperial universities scattered over the land. They retain, however, their influence in the affection of the Japanese and are the strongest bond between the West and the East.

38-12-22

Japan was a culture of little things; of dwarfed trees and tiny gardens; of minute and untiring cultivation of the soil; and wide worship of sea and air and mountain. There were silk and pearls and gold and gorgeous ceremony and solid building. Yet life in Japan did not have the gorgeous iridescence of the Chinese tile and towers. It was more sombre and solid and built upon the hard and continuous work of masses of men. Under the music, dancing, and painting was the hard work and striving for power which characterizes a growing state until we had that curious division of power by which phantom emperors were ruled by the great families of the Shoguns who became the real rulers of Japan, who beat back the hords of Kublai Khan, the Mongul, who had conquered China and who eventually unified Japan into a country that knew how to guard itself from enemies without and within.

Perhaps it will be well to pause a moment here and review somewhat more in detail the history of Japan. The books of Confucius, one of the world's greatest philosophers, were brought to Japan from Korea in 286 A. D. and Korean and Chinese scholars became instructors to the young princes and nobles. In 552 A. D. came Buddhism and for two generations a fierce religious feud arose between the old religion and the new. The old religion was an accumulation of myths and ceremonies somewhat analogous to the ancient African religions as they re-established themselves in the West Indies and to a lesser extent in the United States. The new Buddhism came from India. It was one of the greatest attempts of all time to lead men into the paths of righteousness but belief and example, by dogma and ceremony. The spread of Buddhism over the East was analogous to the spread of Christianity over the West. But the results were different for Buddhism became a religion of art and humanity; it suppressed war, it built beautiful temples, it promulgated a religion of personal sacrifice. Gradually it gained the ascendency in Japan and for 200 years the state was gradually changed, the ownership of the land distributed more widely, the government centralized, the beautiful city of Nara built, "bright and gay like the cherry in full bloom." Then beginning with 784 came the period of great families and the rise of feudalism along with a development in literary and esthetic tradition, and the establishment of a new capital at Kyoto. Poets wrote, tournaments were held amid cherry blosoms, flower viewing became an art, games and amusements were elaborated, and music, and dancing, and painting cultivated. In the 12th century arose the powers behind the throne, the Shoguns, which made the hereditary emperior a shadow in some such way as the King of England today is but the official reminder of a power which is lodged in the hands of the Cabinet and Prime Minister. But the Japanese Shogunate from the 12th to the 19th century was upheld by the military power, ability, and wealth of a few great families without democratic control. It led in the middle of the 14th century to civil strife which lasted throughout the 16th century, but gradually in the 17th century Japan achieved a unity in contra-distinction to the division under the feudal lords. From 1603 to the middle of the 19th century the Tokugawa Shoguns ruled Japan. A long continued peace was established and the country was carefully secluded from its neighbors for fear of foreign religion and foreign aggression. A revival of learning took place. The Japanese language and literature as contrasted with the Chinese was encouraged, and nationalism and imperialism were preached. Then came the visit of Commodore Perry and the nation was rudely shaken from its slumber of seclusion. Treaties with foreign nations had to be made and suddenly the whole form of government was changed. The ruling Shoguns were deposed; the imperial power under the Emperor Meiji came to the front and the first deliberative assembly met in 1869. This did not mean that Japan was a democracy, but it meant that the basis of power was more widely distributed among noble families and the rising merchant class so that the democratization of the nation began in 1868.

38-12-24

Rather suddenly then in the middle of the 19th century, and through the impulse of a swash-buckling American ship captain, the doors of Japan were forced open and she came through commerce to be a part of the modern world. The great families of the Shoguns who were compelled to make treaty with the West and open the kingdom to power, incurred therefor such enmity that they fell from control and the empire was restored, under the visible power of the emperor, but still backed and advised by other great families and great nobles. This restoration of 1868 marked modern Japan.

That modern world had started with the African slave trade when labor became a commodity and when the growing disposition of Christianity to regard the souls of workers was transmuted into the new theory of capitalism which made human labor a thing to be bought and sold. The crops raised by Negro slaves in Louisiana, in the United States, the West Indies, and South America began to circle the world and built that primary accumulation of Capital which soon dominated the new machine industry; new cities arose; a new commerce; a new demand for the exchange of goods; and Japan had in its silk, its pottery, its handicrafts, material which the world wanted. Europe and America forced her to trade with them as they were forcing China. But Japan was different from China; not so different in the manner of its men for they had much of the same blood, but whereas the imperial power of China had driven resistance down into the family, clan and village and thus distintegrated the land, in Japan, on the other hand, you had a singularly unified country which enabled it to present a united front to the world from 1853 to this day. Social classes were straitly drawn and yet solidly and subtly knit together by the strongest bonds of religion, Emperor-worship, a common heritage of culture and a new enthusiatic nationalism. Only for a moment did foreign courts hold jurisdiction over foreigners living there. Foreign merchants found no such foothold as they found in China and India and pretty soon the European world was satisfied to trade with Japan as an equal, albeit a shrewd one to be watched.

Then came one of those sudden forward movements that has characterized Japanese history: a war with China over Korea broke out in 1894. It was in the view of the world an absurd illogical struggle. China was a giant even though sleeping with hands and feet tied by England, America, and France. But a giant, nevertheless, with 400 millions of people, with a history which made Europe an infant, and with possibilities that were colossal. Yet because China was encroaching upon Korea, that Korea which was almost a motherland to Japan and yet geographically a threat to her independence, Japan attacked China and in a short swift war of a year, showed the weakness of the greater country and convinced Europe that the time for dismembering China and making her a colonial appendage to European commerce had come.

The Japanese were practically compelled by the concert of European powers to take nothing from China but Korea and Formosa which meant that China, now revealed as weak and tottering was to be divided by Europeans with Japan left out. Hereupon immediately Russia, Germany, and England stepped forward to make good their claims upon various sections of China. But this led in 1904, to another and more astonishing war when Japan actually challenged Russia, in many respects then the greatest of European powers, and made her sue for peace in 1905. Thus in two bounds Japan from being in 1868 a country about to be dominated by European merchants, became in 1905 one of the great powers of the world, breaking the myth of white world domination. From this time until today Japan has presented a problem for those who think of the future of modern civilization as a problem of white folk.

38-12-26

From being first a cunning curiosity and then a presumptuous imitator she is envisaged today as a great danger and rival to Europe and America. This change of attitude has come about because of the military and naval power of Japan; because of her attitude toward China; and especially because of the fact that she has put the East into manufacture as a rival of the West. Japan's attitude toward China developed after the World War. The World War meant that the power of the white race to rule the world was definitely gone. Japan knew, however, that as soon as Europe recovered from this catastrophe and as a method of recovery she would pursue her plans toward China, and that China would practically be divided between France and England with Germany and the new communistic Russia demanding eventually their share. The result was that Japan, having suffered least in the War, seized Germany's share during the War and demanded practically a Monroe Doctrine for China; that is, the right of Japan to lead in the future economic development of the East to the exclusion of white Europe. It was a tremendous demand naturally preposterous in the eyes of Europe despite the well-known fact that she had been making demands for white domination of all Asia and Africa during the whole of the 19th century. Not only did Europe resist this demand but China, itself revolutionized before and during the World War, and seeking to reestablish its integrity, complained bitterly that her cousins of the yellow race were trying to play the same role which her enemies of the white race had so successfully played in the 19th century. It was in vain that Japan declared that her role was different; that she was protecting China and Asia against Europe; and that unless she warded off the communism of Russia to the north and the imperialism of England at the South, China would never survive and Asia would never become independent.

28-12-27

Pursuing this idea, Japan in 1931 seized Manchuria and made it into a puppet state and later dominated two districts of North China. The reaction toward Japan was bitter and the feeling throughout the European and American world would, under other circumstances and in other ages, have led immediately to war. But Europe as Japan well knew could not fight and for the first time since the Turks threatened Vienna, a colored people successfully defied Europe.

Nor did Japan rest here. Hitherto the whole European argument had arraigned Asia for backwardness in modern industrialization. Japan therefore deftly changed her object and attack. Gradually pushing back her purely military program of aggression, seemingly on China but really against the West, she began to industrialize the Japanese state. She integrated her handicrafts, she built factories, she imported raw material, she lowered her money wages. The state helped to furnish capital. While the export trade of Europe and America dwindled during the depression Japan's went up by leaps and bounds.

("Made in Japan", Guenther Stein, pp.167, 169, 170, 171)

"To-day Japan exports five or six times as many finished products as she did in 1914. if the exports of 1914 are used as a basic index of 100, the quantitative development of her exports is as follows:

1914, 100; 1920, 210; 1928, 254; 1932, 325; 1934, 555.

Japan's quantitative share in the world's trade of manufactures is now almost 10 per cent.

In some products her share is much larger; in cotton tissues, for instance, it is 40 per cent. Even the average figure is lower only than the shares of the four industrial Great Powers: Great Britain, the United States, Germany and France, which together monopolize two-thirds of this world trade. . . .

Today Japan is the largest exporter of cotton tissues in the world; her share of 40 per cent is larger than that of Great Britain. The British record, established shortly before the war, was 7 billion square yards of cotton tissues. At that time Japn was not a serious competitor. A few figures will illustrate the later development of British and Japanese exports of cotton tissues (in million yards):

	Great Britain	Japan
1928	3,866	1,419
1932	2,198	2,032
1934	1,995	2,568

Great Britain's exports of cotton tissues have gone back to the figures of the 'sixties, the time when feudal Japan was opened to international trade by force. At that time Japan had hardly any industry worth the name, and Japanese pioneers were coming to England to study Western spinning methods. And to-day Japan is ahead of Great Britain by 500 million square yards! . . .

Japan began her career on world markets as a simple exporter of raw silk. During the second phase of her development as an exporter, cotton tissues seemed the only item which could be added. Soon, however, in the third phase, she became a leading exporter of artificial silk and of other textiles. And already the fourth phase has begun, for of late the exports of all textile products have been exceeded by the exports of non-textile 'general industrial merchandise'. . . .

The 'non-textiles' which Japan to-day exports up to a value of at least 1 million pounds each include the following: tinned foodstuffs; wheat flour; refined sugar; drugs and chemicals; dyes, paints, &c.; boots and shoes; buttons and jewellery; paper; potteries; glass and glassware; iron rails; enamelled ware, cutlery and nails; clocks and scientific instruments; lamps; toys."

She reached all parts of the world, she under-sold England in England and the United States in America. She became a great rival of Western industry. Europe sought to retaliate by tariffs to restrict her exports but Japan so organized her buying power that she forced trade agreements even from such enemies as Australia and America. When Australia refused to buy Japanese goods, Japan refused to buy Australian wool; when the United States threatened to exclude Japanese goods, Japan threatened to stop buying 200 million dollars worth of American cotton annually. It did not take Australia and the United States long to come an understanding with Japan, for Japanese buyers did not compete with each other. They stood as a unit.

But this meant strain and told upon Japan's internal organization. It depressed the status of all Japanese workers, and particularly of Japanese peasants. It threatened inner turmoil, but despite this Japan had strong arguments to support her at home: what would happen if labor over-threw capital in Japan? Colored labor was not recognized in the West as human labor; the people of the United States had excluded the Japanese by law, not because they were vagabonds and burdens but because they were too thrifty and too efficient; a political deal between the West and the South brought the Japanese exclusion law in return for the defeat of the anti-lynching bill in 1924. Thus America showed her clear attitude toward colored labor whether it was her own black citizens or yellow foreigners. Moreover, while the money wage of Japanese was low, the return in satisfactions, in beauty and completeness of life, was larger than in the West; so that her workers were not as discontented as they ought to have been when one takes into account their need of better nourishment, clothing and shelter.

One cannot leave Japan without a further word as to its religion, literature, and art today. The most influential religion in Japan is Shinto. It is a combination of prehistoric myth, ancestor worship and Chinese ethics. One can understand it best by imagining that the African rites imported to Haiti by the early slaves had been rationalized and directed into a code of ethics by educated and thoughtful leadership, that their primitive beauty had been retained, and that on the family worship had been ingrafted the worship of government and nation as typified in the emperor. There emerged a religion of honor and ethic with little dogma, with simply ceremony which binds children and youth in a singularly charming way to the Japanese state. Shinto and Buddhism have had many points of contact and influence. To the 17½ million followers of Shinto must be added the 42 million followers of Buddha cooperating in many respects; and yet Buddhism divided, like Christianity into 11 sects, is still a powerful philosophy of life more Chinese than Japanese in its general outline. To these may be added 250 thousand Christians.

38-12-30

Japanese literature has had a long and honorable tradition. It has been influenced since 1868 by modern European literature which has been largely translated into Japanese. Newspapers and magazines have given rise to a wide body of readers among a people largely literate. There are several daily papers with a circulation of a million and more.

There is a native novel and a new native poetry and recently an increasing literature of the proletariat. In the fine arts Japan has been original and singularly beautiful. Their painting has been in water colors rather than oil and with India ink. Instead of centralizing their attention on the human figure they have protrayed more in the abstract, depicted beautiful landscapes and flowers and mountains, and in human beings action rather than form. I saw the last National Exhibition in Kiota and the marvelous work in screens and figures. There is, of course, nothing so beautiful as the Japanese color prints. In scupture and applied art, in lacquer war and ceramics Japanese art has set world wide standards. Architecture in Japan has been celebrated for its simplicity and simple beauty rather than the overwhelming grandeur of the Chinese. While in the drama there is a national tradition to which the West is more and more giving careful attention.

Here, therefore, stands Japan today. Slowly she is turning toward understanding with China although that involves the danger of European interference since China still has naive confidence in the philanthropy of the West. Japan has declared her enmity toward Russian communism although that forces her to give too much power to her military party and to turn her back upon perhaps the greatest effort to raise the economic level of the common people which the world has ever seen. Then too, because of the race prejudice of England and America which refuses Japan fellowship as an equal, she has been forced almost into the lap of Fascist Germany and Italy who represent today war, tyranny, reaction and race hate on the most dangerous scale. Yet all is not dark. Japan has a magnificent heritage of courtesy, pride, hard work, and efficiency. She has a beautiful national art and a religion of honor and sacrifice. She works as a group more completely than perhaps any other single nation. She has won the respect of the world even though that respect is expressed in fear and armament. She has but one thing to remember and larger and larger numbers of Japanese realize this: first, that the union of Japan and China and eventually India can easily dominate the world with a leadership of mankind such as Western Europe never could accomplish; but that secondly, this may be a danger to culture unless the welfare of the worker as contrasted with the profits of the rich are made the leading ideal of Japanese civilization. We who watch the development of Japan from afar, with sympathetic eyes, and the curious tie of color with all its memory of insult, slavery and exploitation can but hope that her possible leadership of the world will make for industrial democracy and human understanding across the color line on a far larger scale than the world has yet seen accomplished.

28-12-31.

It perhaps is not necessary to draw a moral from the history of Japan which may be applicable to us now and here, but I cannot refrain from pointing out one lesson: and that is that the fundamental problem which Japan is today attacking is not her problem of militarism or even of politics. Like a large part of the world today she recognizes that the economic foundation of her people, the regulation of industry no so much for profit as for the uplife of mankind must be the center of her future striving. And so with us, all we like sheep have gone astray in trying to imitate the profit making of America and the seeking to use our vote and power to that end. When in truth beneath the power of the ballot, beneath the order of the state and the social welfare of mankind is that organization of economic power by which poverty can be banished; crime cured;and health maintained. This is not industrial education coming back in new guise. It is industrial organization lead by higher training for the uplift of the masses.

38-12-32

Final draft Corrected.
Atlanta Univ.
Atlanta, Ga.
Delivered at Banquet
in his honor, 1938

A PAGEANT IN SEVEN DECADES, 1868-1938

by

W. E. B. DuBois

From this manuscript
the Du Bois read first three and the seventh decades.

I have been asked to review my life and I have chosen to essay this from the aspect of an historical pageant of human kind in which I have been a more or less active spectator, and whose end and meaning I have sought to see. It is not easy to do this; deeds, facts and fancies flow so ceaselessly and, with occasional whirlpools, so smoothly on, that one grasps and arranges them and views them with difficulty. Temptation to topical treatment is barred by the alchemy of time which not simply prolongs life but successively changes all perspective and interpretation. I find it better then to group my years in decades from childhood to today; seeking in each term of ten years the more or less elusive unity that may lie therein and checking somewhat my present memory by such documents and remains as may partially recreate the past.

41-7-113

The First Decade - Childhood, from 1868-1878 - 0-10 years.- The year of my birth was the year that the freedmen of the South were enfranchised and for the first time as a mass took part in government. Conventions with black delegates voted new constitutions all over the South; and two groups of laborers - freed slaves and poor whites - dominated the former slave states. It was an extraordinary experiment in democracy. Thaddeus Stevens, the clearest headed leader of this attempt at industrial democracy, made his last speech impeaching Andrew Johnson on February 16 and on February 23 I was born.

I had ~~in those first years~~ a pleasant childhood. I can remember no poverty although my family was certainly poor. I represented the third generation from three small land holding brothers on my mother's side and the fourth generation from a West Indian planter on my father's. The outstanding thing in my earliest memory was the school. In a letter which I began to my grandmother in 1877, after conventional thanks for some present, I plunged right into the real subject "My school house stands a little way from Main Street." I remember it vividly; down a lane with a great choke-cherry tree on the right; on the left the wooden primary and grammar school and further on the right, the brick grammar and high school. I attended these schools regularly from five or six years of age until I was sixteen with hardly a day's absence.

The town and its surroundings were a boy's paradise: there were mountains to climb and rivers to wade and swim in; lakes to be frozen and hills for coasting. There were orchards and caves and wide green fields; and all of it was the free property apparently of the children of the town. My family were pleasant and miscellaneous: the father was dead before I can remember; the mother brown and quietly persistent; the aunts and one uncle a bit censorious but not difficult to get on with; and then an endless vista of approving cousins. The town was shut in my its mountains and provincialism - cut off both from Boston and New York state.

My first glimpse of the outher and wider world was through Johnnie Morgan's news shop which occupied the front end of the post office. There newspapers and books were on display and I remember very early seeing pictures of "U. S." Grant and Tweed who was beginning his extraordinary career in New York state; and later of Hayes and the smooth and rather cruel face of Tilden. Of the great things happening in the United States at that time, we were touched only by the Panic of 1873; When my uncle came home from the little town east of us where he was the leading barber, he brought me, I remember, a silver dollar which was an extraordinary thing; Up to that time I had seen nothing but paper money. I do not remember hearing anything said about the Fifteenth Amendment which became law in 1870; but there were a few new colored people, "contrabands," who came to town. One family particularly I liked, they were so jolly and darkly handsome.

A11-14

Charles Sumner died and the Freedmen's Bank closed when I was but six years old, and when I was eight there came the revolution of 1876. But I hardly ~~comprehended~~ knew of it. On the other hand, of the world overseas: the Franco-Prussian War; the ups and downs of D'israeli and Gladstone; the opening of the Suez Canal; --of these things my little village said nothing nor did they mention the fact that the Medji Emperors of Japan ascended to new and ever growing power in the year I was born.

41-7-115

The Second Decade - Youth, from 1878-1888 - 10-20 year of age.- The United States in the decades 1870-1890 was an extraordinary country. Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur and Grover Cleveland were presidents. James G. Blaine was an aspirant who barely missed the highest office, and the country was reckless and propserous; squandering its seemingly endless resources; tying east and west with railways; exploiting iron and coal and oil and making fortunes for a new and ruthless caste of business men who were cashing in on the cost of Civil War. The results of this I could easily see in my town. I grew up in the midst of definite ideas as to wealth and poverty; work and charity. Wealth was the result of work and saving and the rich rightly inherited the earth. The poor, on the whole, were to be blamed. They were lazy or unfortunate and if unfortunate their fortunes could easily be mended ~~with care~~ by thrift and sacrifice.

There were ~~no great~~ some differences of wealth in Great Barrington; there were mills and mill-owners; there were German and Irish factory hands. Singularly enough I knew the mill owners and their children much better than

I knew the workers, but I was no flunky for the rich. My people always had a certain ~~singular~~ independence. They were by occupation small farmers, servants, laborers, barbers and waiters. They earned their way. I early came to understand that to be "on the town", the recipient of public charity, was the depth not only of misfortune but of a certain guilt. I presume some of my folk sank to that but not to my knowledge. We earned our way. I have a little post card dating from 1883 in which "Miss Smith," September 19, writes, "We would like to have you come certainly next Saturday as you did last week to do some splitting for us." This was a matter of splitting up kindling for two maiden ladies and was one of my ways of beginning financial independence. I remember well my first regular work: as a high school lad I went early of mornings and filled one or two of the so-called "base-burning" stoves with coal in a little millinery shop. I received twenty-five cents a week which represented the beginning of affluence. From then on, all through my high school course I worked after school and on Saturday's, mowing lawns, doing errands, and for a few months through the good will of Johnnie Morgan, I rose to be local correspondent of the Springfield Republican. For some time, too, I sent weekly letters to the New York Age, and before the A and P stores dealt in groceries and simply were selling tea I was one of their local agents. Thus in all sorts of little ways I managed to earn some money and never asked nor thought of gifts save in one case: my school principal suggested, quite as a matter of fact, that I ought to take the college preparatory course in high school which involved Latin and Greek. This meant a considerable expenditure for books but the wife of one of the mill owners, or rather I ought to describe her as the mother of one of my playmates, offered to furnish all the necessary high school books, which became my one charity.

41-7-116

The other class of rich folk with whom I came in contact were summer boarders who made yearly incursions from New York. I think I was most impressed by their clothes. Outside of that there was little reason so far as I could see to envy them. The children were not very strong and rather too well-dressed to have a good time playing. There were few slum areas in my town and almost no crime. The one ~~excess~~ indulgence was ~~drunkenness~~ liquor and there my mother quietly took a firm stand. I was never to enter a saloon. I never did. ~~It~~ Alcohol was ~~perhaps~~ almost the one reaction that this pleasant but rather drab little town had against the monotony of life and rich and poor got drunk more or less regularly. I have seen ~~one of the~~ a mill owners staggering; and my ~~very well-to-do~~ own very dignified uncle used to come home now and then walking ~~exceedingly~~ very straight.

41-7-117

In one respect my training in this town has had rather momentous results. It was not good form in New England or in Great Barrington to express yourself volubly, to give way to ~~excitement~~ emotion; - people held themselves in. They were sparing even of their greetings. There was only on the street a curt "Good Morning" to those whom you knew and no greetings at all for others. The result was that, because of this and probably from growing race consciousness, I was early thrown in upon myself. I found it difficult and even unnecessary to approach other people and by that same token my own inner life grew perhaps the ~~more~~ richer later. ~~But~~ the habit of repression often returned to plague me in after years for so early a habit could not easily be unlearned.

I entered the high school at the age of twelve and was graduated at the age of sixteen in 1884. I had during that time ~~some~~ my first chance to travel and to get little glimpses of the world. I was sent, for instance, by my mother across the state to see my grandmother and grandfather in New Bedford. I wrote back about this in 1883, "The house is white with green blinds. The yard is full of flowers. Grandma is about my color and taller than I thought. I like her very much. Grandpa is short and rather thick set. I like him better than I thought I would. He says very little but speaks civilly when I say anything to him. Grandma says by and by he will talk more."

When I graduated from the high school we all had ~~orations~~ speeches and mine was on Wendell Phillips. He had died in February and I spoke in June, fired by new and unusual knowledge of his sort of man. Then there came in my life the first great change. My mother died and it was decided that I was too young to go to college. I suspect that money matters had something to do with it. At any rate instead of being able to go to Harvard as I had fondly hoped, ~~in the fall of 1884~~ in the fall of 1884 I was given a job and promised that the next fall I should begin my college work.

811-7-14

The job brought me in curious touch with the world. There was a great uncle of mine, Tom Burghardt, whose tombstone I had seen often in the village graveyard. My family used to say in undertones that the money of Tom Burghardt helped to build the Pacific Railway and that it came in this wise: Nearly all his life Tom Burghardt was a servent in the Kellogg family, only the Kelloggs forgot to pay him but did give him a handsome burial. Then Mark Hopkins married into the family, ~~and~~ and used presumably my uncle's unpaid wage, with other assets, to make millions in railways. His widow came back to Great Barrington and planned a mansion out of the beautiful blue granite which formed our hills. A host of workmen, masons, stonecutters, and carpenters were assembled and in the summber of 1884 I was made timekeeper for the contractors receiving the fabulous wage of a dollar ~~a~~ each day.

It was a most interesting experience and had bits of romance. There was the English architect who appeared on the scene and the colored steward who committed suicide when the architect married the widow; then came the death of the widow amd the passing of the Hopkin's millions into foreign hands. In the meantime the fabrication and growth of this marvelous palace proceeded, beautiful beyond anything that Great Barrington had seen; and always I could sit and watch it grow and handle delegated powers in dismissing workmen and rewarding them.

Finally in the fall of 1885 there came a proposal which made all my cousins and aunts raise their eyebrows. I was to have a scholarship to go South to Fisk University. The South had an unholy name in my village and the family was not at all sure that I ought to go. Only one black Burghardt had ever gone South and he a Union soldier. But ~~, of course,~~ I never hesitated. ~~but~~ I started out and went into Tennessee at the age of seventeen to become a sophomore at Fisk University. It was to me an extraordinary experience. I was thrilled to be for the first time among so many people of my own color or rather of such various and such extraordinary colors, which I had not seen before, but who seemed close bound to me by new and exciting ties. I had never seen such beautiful girls in my life or men who gave themselves such merited airs.

The three years here were years of growth, and strength and expanding ambition. I learned new things about the world. I came in contact for the first time with a sort of violence that I had never realized in New England. I remember going down and looking wide-eyed at the door of a public building filled with buckshot where the white editor of the leading daily paper had been publicly murdered the day before. I was astonished to find many of my fellow students carrying firearms and to hear their stories of adventure. I suddenly determined that I was going out to teach during the summer vacations. It was not necessary. My scholarship would have supported me but it was adventure. I walked ~~out~~ into east Tennessee ten or more miles a day until at last in a little valley I found a place where they had had a Negro public school only once since the Civil War and there for two successive terms ~~during the summer~~ I taught at $28 and $30 a month; paid immediately in promises and in cash three or four months later.

41-7-119

summer

I began my writing and public speaking at Fisk. I wrote an article which the Century Magazine said, "We shall be glad to print 'The New Negro' if we may take our time and we are afraid we shall have to take a great deal." It did, for it hasn't been printed yet. For three years I was on the editorial staff of the Fisk Herald; as editor-in-chief the last year; contributing essays and one novel. I became a considerable orator and for a long time the older student of Fisk took deep joy in remembering the debate where in the very midst of impassioned periods I forgot my lines. ¶ The persistence, however, which I had learned in New England stood me now in good stead. The interlude at Fisk did not turn me from it. When I heard that Harvard was offering scholarships in various parts of the country I immediately wrote and to the astonishment of teachers and fellow students, not to mention myself, received Price Greenleaf aid of $300. I was graduated from Fisk in 1888 and took as my subject Bismarck. It showed my already growing interest in the wider world. I knew of the great jubilee of Queen Victoria, of the aftermath of the Franco-Prussian War and the triumph of the Madhi in Khartoum. I had followed the fortunes of Gladstone and Salisbury and was filled with enthusiasm at the rise of the new German empire under Bismarck. So I talked of Bismarck and then turned back to the North. I was thinking, too, during these days of political developments and have a speech which I delivered in 1887 which has a certain present validity: Today the Democratic and Republican parties are virtually without principles. In spite of the vast number of vitally important issues before the country there is not one in regard to which they are not on the fence! The elections are disgraceful scrambles for office, and the most unblushing bribery is carried on at the polls. This, by our votes, we are aiding and abetting. Having come forth from a personal slavery, we have voluntarily thrown ourselves into political serfdom. Instead of asking a man his conviction on the Blaine Bill, the Tariff, Lynch Law, or Civil Rights, you ask his party, and if he's got Republican pasted across his forehead, the legal representatives of seven millions of human beings will vote for him, be he Tom, Dick, or the Devil.

41-7-120

Third Decade - Education, from 1888-1898 - 20-30 years of age.- This decade covered the years of my education at Harvard and at Berlin and the beginning of my teaching career. The members of the Fisk Glee Club went to Lake Minnetonka, a resort in Minnesota, for the summer of 1888 with the idea of working in the dining room and giving concerts. I was to act as their business manager. During college I had developed rather as the executive and planner, the natural secretary of affairs rather than the ornamental president and chairman. The only difficulty about the Minnesota excursion was that I had never worked in a hotel in my life; I ~~could~~ did not know how to wait on table and therefore became one of the bus boys. It was so unusual a pageant to watch the dining room that I made no tips and for a long time had difficulty in getting enough to eat, not realizing that servants in great hotels are not systematically fed. But after the season I went on ahead and succeeded in making a respectable number of concerts for the students who followed me down all the way to Chicago; while I went on to Harvard to enter the junior class in the fall of 1888.

The Harvard of 1888 was an extraordinary aggregation of great men. Not often if ever since that day have so many distinguished teachers been together in one place and at one time. There was William James, the psychologist; Palmer in ethics; Royce and Santayanya in philosophy; Shaler in Geology and Hart in history. The president was the cold, precise but exceedingly efficient Charles William Eliot and there were a doezen lesser lights. By extraordinary good fortune I was thrown into contact with most of these men. I was repeatedly a guest in the house of William James; of all teachers, he was my closest friend. I was a member of the philosophical club; I talked often with Royce and Shaler; I sat alone in an upper room and read Kant's Critique with Santayana; I became one of Hart's favorite pupils and was afterwards guided by him through my graduate course and started on my work in Germany.# It was an extraordinary opportunity for a young man and I think I realized it. I evolved habits of work rather different from those of most of the other students. I burned no midnight oil. I did my studying in the daytime and had my day planned out almost to the minute. I spent a great deal of time in the library and did my assignments with persistent thoroughness and with a rather interesting pre-vision of the kind of work I wanted to do later. I have before me a theme which I wrote October 3, 1890, for Barret Wendell, the great pundit of Harvard English. I said: "Spurred by my circumstances I have always been given to systematically planning my future, not indeed without many mistakes and frequent alterations, but always with what I now conceive to have been a strangely early and deep appreciation of the fact that to live is a serious thing. I determined while in the high school to go to college - partly because other men went, partly because I foresaw that such discipline would best fit me for life. I believe foolishly perhaps but sincerely that I have something to say to the world, and I have taken English 12, in order to say it well." Barrett Wendell rather liked that last sentence; ~~and~~ he read it to the class.

U1-7-121

VI-7-122

I tried to take culture out into the colored community of Boston; I visited, joined clubs, lectured, and once actually gave the Birds of Aristophanes in a colored church on Thanksgiving night. The matter of meeting my college expenses presented some difficulties. I had scholarships for $300 for both college years but that was not enough. One year after careful calculation I found that I needed $50 more and noted with interest that this was exactly the stipend of the Boylston Prize in oratory. I had to have one of the prizes in order to make ends meet for the year and I got it. Then with a colored classmate, Clement Morgan, who was also a Boylston prize-man I made a tour of the summer resorts of New England. We gave readings in hotels, parlors and churches and did in this way much toward making our expenses. In my senior year the death of my last near relative, my grandfather, left me a fortune of $400.

41-7-123

In 1890, I took my bachelor's degree from Harvard and was one of the six commencement speakers, taking as my subject Jefferson Davis. On the platform of Sanders Theatre were President Eliot, the governor of Massachusetts and the Bishop of New York. I am glad that the New York Nation could say ~~said~~ July 3, 1890, that I handled the theme "with absolute good taste, great moderation, and almost contemptuous fairness."

I was graduated just at the beginning of the term of President Harrison when the trusts were dominating industry and the McKinley tariff making that domination easier. The understanding between the industrial North and the new South was being perfected and in 1890 a series of disfranchising laws were passed by the Southern States destined in the next six years to make voting by Southern Negroes practically impossible. Already I had received more education than most young white men, having been continuously in school from the age of six to the age of twenty-two. But I did not yet feel prepared. I knew that to cope with the new and extraordinary situation then building in the United States I needed to go further and that as a matter of fact I had just well begun ~~in~~ my training and ~~in~~ my knowledge of social conditions. AP On the other hand, I was quite penniless with no resources in wealth or friends. I applied for a fellowship in the graduate school. If I had not gotten it I should have had to go to work; but I was appointed Henry Bromfield Roger's fellow for a year and later the appointment was renewed so that from 1890-1892 I was a fellow in Harvard University studying in history and what would have been social science if Harvard had then recognized such a field.

41-7-124

I worked on my thesis, "The Suppression of the Slave Trade," taking my master's degree in 1891 and hoping to get my doctor's degree in another two years. Then came one of those tricks of fortune which seems partly due to chance, but in this case undoubtedly due to a good deal of stubborn persistence. In 1882 the Slater Fund for the education of Negroes had been established and the board was ~~now~~ in 1892 headed by ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes. President Hayes at John Hopkins University talked frankly in 1890 about the plans of the fund. He said among other things that they had wanted to find some young colored men to whom they could give a chance for graduate training but they had only been able to find "orators."

The statement was brought to my attention at a card party one evening and it not only made me good and mad but also set me thinking. I wrote President Hayes. I received a pleasant reply saying that they did not have any present plans for such scholarships. That really aroused me. I proceeded to get letters from every person I knew in the Harvard Yard and places outside and literally deluged the unfortunate chairman of the Slater Fund. He wrote again and said that he was sorry but the plan had been given up; that they might otherwise have given me some attention.

41-7-125

It has been my experience that most of my small successes have been due to steps that I have taken after all hope ~~was~~ seemed lost. I sat down and proceeded to write Mr. Hayes a letter that could be described as nothing less than impudent. I intimated plainly that somebody ~~was~~ seemed lying. I reiterated my plans and adhered to my written references. President Hayes was undoubtedly ~~aroused~~ disturbed and almost apologized to me, reiterating his good faith and promising to take up the matter the next year with the board. Whereupon promptly the next year I proceeded to write the board: "At the close of the last academic year at Harvard, I received the degree of master of arts, and was reappointed to my fellowship for the year 1891-92. I have spent most of the year in the preparation of my doctor's thesis on the suppression of the slave trade in America. I prepared a preliminary paper on this subject and read it before the American Historical Association at its annual meeting at Washington during the Christmas holidays. The paper will shortly be published in their proceedings and a preliminary report of it may be seen in the Independent of January 7, 1892, pp. 10, 11; also in Congregationalist of about the same date. The first draft of the larger thesis was completed 28 March and it will be formally finished May 1, and, I hope, eventually published; besides this I have worked on a number of general studies. Properly to finish my education, a careful training in an European university for at least a year is in my mind and the minds of my professors, absolutely indispensable. I therefore desire, respectfully to lay these suggestions before you: First, that the board grant me aid to study at least a year abroad under the direction of the graduate department of Harvard or other reputable auspices. Second, if this be not practicable, that the board loan a sufficient sum for this purpose."

The Trustees of the Slater Fund granted my request and gave me $750, half gift and half loan, to study in Europe. I shall never forget my interview with ex-President Hayes in the old Astor House in New York, nor the extravagant shirt I immediately bought in celebration.

In the summer I sailed for Europe, saw Holland and the Rhine and lived in a fine German family in Eisenach with a group of gay young folk who made me realize that white folk were human.

1

Then In the fall I went up to Berlin, I wrote in my diary: "The fact is that after some years spent in American universities, I, God, and other folk have rendered it possible for me to study here. Whereof I am glad. Now it has chanced that to me Europe has ever been surrounded with a certain veil of mystery and fancy; a trimming of history and fairy tales, of culture and crowns, had always made it a bit difficult for me to realize the existence of a hard dry sod underneath it all. I take it that we Americans are very fortunate in having a great sea between us and this other world."

and Registered in the University, ~~the story which I set down at the time is perhaps worth repeating~~. In groups of one hundred we were ushered into a room. "It was a large room, with high ceiling, and a row of four windows on one side in the deep recesses of which stood busts of Berlin's famous professors. The centre of the room was occupied by chairs, in which the students seated themselves; at the upper end was a long table about which perhaps a dozen officials were grouped. Near the left end was the present year's rector magnificus, the widely famous Rudolf Virchow, doctor of medicine, laws and philosophy, city councillor and member of the Reichstag. He is a meek and calm looking little man, white haired and white-bearded, with a kindly face and a pleasant voice. At smaller tables ranged before the windows, were the deans of the various faculties. The method of procedure was thoroughly, and, I think I may say, painfully, German. First the chief secretary at the side of the magnificent rector was invested with the pile of gymnasium diplomas and passports we had surrendered in the ante-room. Then he slowly read out the names, and as a student heard his name he disentangled himself and approached the table. Recognizing with some difficulty my Germanicized name I presented myself with trepidation at the bar. The stiff secretary

41-7-126

(it's quite the thing to be stiff in new Germany) with my help more clearly deciphered my name, ascertained under which faculty I wished to study, firmly declined to examine any of my sheepskins, and passed me over to the rector; Rector Virchow smiled benignantly, made some remark as to my faculty, and after filling out the blanks with some remarkably poor writing, presented me with a large 24 by 18 inch sheet of paper: this stated that a certain Guilelmus, II, had in the general goodness of his heart endowed the present Mr. Virchow with various powers; among these was that of making me (who was described with some infelicity of phrase as a "most ornamented young man") a legalized and licensed student of the University of Berlin."

~~Afterwards I was inscribed in the philosophical faculty and finally shook hands with the great Virchow.~~ I had again at Berlin as at Harvard unusual opportunity. Although a foreigner I was admitted my first semester to two semesters under Schmoller and Wagner both of them the most distinguished men in their line; and I received eventually from both of them pleasant testimony of my work. My work was in economics, history and sociology. I sat under the voice of the fire-casting Von Treitschke and heard him assert the general inferiority of mulattoes and mixed races; I wrote on American agriculture for Schmoller and discussed social conditions in Europe with teachers and students. But more especially I travelled; living cheaply I saved good sums for the numerous vacations. I went to the Hansa cities; I made the celebrated Hartzreise up to the Brocken in the spring. "My Christmas vacation I spent in making a trip through south Germany along with a German-American and an Englishman. We visited Weimar, Frankfort, Heidelberg and Mannheim. During Christmas and New Years we stopped in a little German dorf in the Rheinfalz where I had an excellent opportunity of studying the peasant life closely and comparing it with country life in the South. We visited perhaps twenty different families, talked, ate and drank with them; listened to their gossip and history, attended their assemblies, etc. We then went to Strassborg, Stuttgart, Ulm, München, Nürnburg, Prague and Dresden. In those places we stayed from one to five days, following our Baedeker closely, and paying much attention to the Munchner and Dresden art galleries. The Christmas trip cost about $80." Later I went down to Italy, to Genoa, Rome and Naples and over to Venice and Vienna and Budapest and finally up to Krakau where the father of a fellow student was the head of the Polish library and where I learned of the race problems of the Poles and came by Breslau back to Berlin.

121-7-14

41-7-128

I have a curious document of a birthday which came in Berlin in 1893. "Today I am a quarter of a century old. It seems so strange - my boyhood and youth are but memories now and I am a full grown man. I wonder what the next quarter of a century will bring me - if it will be as rich in work and happiness as the past - as awfully full of fulfilled plans . . . . These twenty-five years of mine have been rich in personal history. I remember school days, the brook by Sumner's house, the attic rooms where we lived, the little stove that used to fall down and the window I proudly called a bay window. I remember little sorrows of life when I found no companions to play with and busied myself in making great plans for a toy with which I could play alone. I remember the gate where I looked into the great town - wonderful world to me then."

I returned to the United States by way of Paris where I stayed as long as possible and then having reduced myself almost to the last cent took passage to the United States in the steerage, quite penniless. It was by no means a pleasant trip but perhaps it was a good introduction to the new life because now at last at twenty-six years of age and after twenty years of study I was coming home to look for a job and to begin work. I need not dwell on the difficulties of landing that job. It was a disturbed world in which I landed; 1892 saw the high tide of lynching in the United States; 235 untried Negroes being slaughtered in that one year. Cleveland had entered his second term in 1893 and the Chicago Exposition had taken place. The Dreyfus case had opened in France with his conviction and imprisonment and he was destined for twelve years to suffer martyrdom. The war between China and Japan broke out the year of my return and Nicholas II was ruling in Russia.

41-7-17

wrote everywhere offering my services and at last
I received three offers for work ~~eventually~~. On August 17, 1894, the chair of Latin and Greek at Wilberforce University, Ohio, with a salary of $800 was offered, which I immediately accepted with gratitude. A little later there came an offer of a position at Lincoln Institute in Missouri at $1050 but I stuck to my first promise; and finally August 25 I received this telegram from Tuskegee, "Can give you mathematics if terms suit. Will you accept. Booker T. Washington." It would be interesting to speculate just what would have happened if I had accepted the last offer instead of the first.

Wilberforce was a small denominational colleged married to a state normal school. The church was too poor to run the college , the State did not want the normal school, and there were consequently enormous difficulties in both church and state politics. Into this situation I landed with the cane and gloves of my German student days; with my rather inflated ideas of what an university ought to be and with a terrible plainness of speech that was continually getting me into difficulty; when, for instance, very suddenly and without warning the student leader of a prayer meeting announced that

Professor DuBois would lead us in prayer. I simply answered, "No, he won't," and as a result nearly lost my job. It took a good deal of explaining to the board of bishops why a professor in Wilberforce should not be able anytime to lead in extemporaneous prayer. I was really saved by the fact that I was so willing to do endless work when the work seemed to me worth doing. My program for a day at Wilberforce looked almost as long as a week's program today. I taught Latin, Greek, German and English and wanted to add sociology to it but the college demurred. I had charge of the most unpleasant of the duties of discipline and did outside work in study and investigation; I met many new friends: First of all, my wife; then my good friend Charles Young, not long graduated from West Point; Charles Burroughs was a student in my classes; Paul Lawrence Dunbar who came over from Dayton to read to us. I had known his work but was astonished to find that he was a Negro.

We younger teachers had a hard team fight at Wilberforce and soon saw that we were licked. It was impossible for me especially to stay for I had talked too plainly and acted too independently. When, therefore, a temporary appointment came from the University of Pennsylvania it was a message from heaven. I was offered work for one year as "assistant instructor" for $600. I accepted forthwith and in addition to that showed my faith in life by getting married. My wife was one of the Wilberforce students and lived in Iowa where the marriage took place in the fateful year 1896. In that year the great battle of Adua occurred, when Abyssinia overthrew Italy and when England suddenly seeing two black nations in ascendency threw her army back into the Sudan and recaptured Khartoum. The next year year when my son was born, there burst in the United States the free silver controversy of Bryan and McKinley and it was that year that President Bumstead of Atlanta University asked me to come ~~here~~ to Atlanta and take charge of the work in sociology and of the new conferences on the Negro problem which the University was inaugurating.

Fourth Decade - Research and Propaganda - 1898-1908 - 30-40 years of age.- This fourth decade was the real beginning of my life work. My education was finished and I had travelled in the world. The two years at Wilberforce being a sort of uneasy prelude, and I began with my advent into the University of Pennsylvania a planned career which had an unusual measure of success and yet was in the end pushed partly aside by forces which, if not beyond my control, were certainly of tremendous weight. My vision was in the beginning clear. The Negro problem called for systematic investigation and intelligence. The world was thinking wrong about races because it did not know. The ultimate evil was ignorance and its child, stupidity. The cure for it was Knowledge based on Study. The opportunity opened at the University of Pennsylvania was exactly what I wanted. I had tried to teach social science at Wilberforce outside my overloaded program but they did not want it. At the University of Pennsylvania I ignore the pitiful stipend. It made no difference to me that I was put down as an "assistant instructor" and even at that my name never actually got into the catalogue; it goes without saying that I did no instructing and rather to my dismay I found as much jealously and politics in this great white institution as in the smaller black one. But here at least I had a clear cut job. The city of Philadelphia at that time had a social theory, and the theory was that this great, rich and famous municipality, founded by godly Quakers, was going to the dogs because of the crime and venality of its Negro citizens. These Negroes lived largly centered in a slum at the lower end of the seventh ward. Philadelphia wanted to prove

41-7-131

41-7-282

all this by figures and I was the man they picked to do it. Of this thought and plan I neither knew nor cared. I was simply asked to study, know and tell. I saw here a chance to study an historic group of black folk and to show exactly what their place was in the community. I did the work despite extraordinary difficulties both within and without the group. The Negroes resented being studied at all and especially by a colored stranger; the whites endured the study as a gesture toward an answer which they already knew. I made a study of the Philadelphia Negro so thorough that it has withstood the criticism for forty years. It was as complete a scientific answer as could have been given under the limitations of time and money; it showed the Negro group as a symptom and not a cause; as a striving, palpitating human group and not an inert, sick body of crime; it traced, analized, charted and counted. It left few untouched queries. At the end of that study I announced with a certain pride my general plan of studying the Negro problem and published papers on the matter in the Annals of the American Academy in 1898.

With this program clearly in mind I came to Atlanta University. There was at the last moment a curious little hitch based on that old matter of extemporaneous public prayer. Dr. Bumstead and I compromised on the Episcopal prayer book and afterward I added certain prayers of my own. I am not sure that they reached heaven but they certainly reached my audience. Without thought or consultation I rather preemptorily changed the plans of the first two Atlanta Conferences. They had been conceived as conferences on city problems contrasting with the increasingly popular conferences on rural problems held at Tuskegee. But I was not thinking of mere conferences. I was thinking of a comprehensive plan for studying a human group and if I could have carried it out as completely as I conceived it, the American Negro would have contributed to the development of social science in this country an unforgettable body of work. Social scientists were at that time thinking in terms of theory and of vast and tenuous laws; while I had for study a concrete group of living beings set off by themselves and capable of almost laboratory experiment. I laid down a program of a hundred years, in which taking annually aspect after aspect of the group life of Negroes for a decade, we could repeat and broaden and concentrate our attention; sharpen our tools of investigation and improve our methods, so that we would accumulate an increasing living body of scientifically ascertained fact to make the so-called Negro problems and through them the problems of all social living clearer and surer and more definite.

Something of this was accomplished. For thirteen years we poured forth a series of studies limited, incomplete, only partially conclusive, and yet so much better done than any other attempt at such work anywhere else in the world that they gained attention in America, Europe, Asia and Africa. Nevertheless, at the very time when they were beginning to achieve widening success there cut across this plan of science a red ray of emotion which could not be ignored.

41-7-133

I remember when it first, as it were, pulled me off my feet.

A poor Negro in central Georgia, Sam Hose, had killed his landlord in a wage dispute. He could not be found for days; then at last a new cry was raised that he had raped the landlord's wife. It was obviously and clearly a trumped-up charge to arouse the worst passions of the countryside and the mob roared. I wrote out a careful and reasoned statement concerning the evident facts and started down to the Constitution carrying in my pocket a letter of introduction which I had to Joel Chandler Harris. I did not get there. On the way the news met me. Sam Hose had been lynched and they said that his knuckles were on exhibition at a grocery store on Mitchell Street. I turned back to the University. I suddenly saw that complete scientific detachment in the midst of such a South was impossible. Nevertheless, I tried to keep my mounting indignation without bounds. I went on with my studies but together with other black Georgians: W. J. White, John Hope, H. R. Butler and others I sent out memorials and petitions and protests. One in 1899 which I wrote said, "Race antagonism and hatred have gone too far in this State; let us stop here; let us insist that they go no further; let us countenance no measure or movement calculated to increase that deep and terrible sense of wrong under which so many today labor. May the Twentieth century of the Prince of Peace dawn upon an era of generous sympathy and forbearance between these two great races in Georgia, and not upon a season of added injustice and antipathy." Another, a year or so later, said, "'From each according to his ability - to each according to his needs' is the ideal of modern society, and in the light of this dictum, there is not a boy in Georgia today so poor or so black as not to deserve from the State free common school training." And a third which came out of a great Macon mass meeting: "Popular government in the United States is not a failure, but it is having in these days a severe and critical trial. Its success in the future depends upon the ability of great classes of men to rise above prejudice and do strict justice to their fellowmen. And today strict justice in Georgia demands free common school training for every single child of the State."

41-7-134

With all this I stuck to my scientific work. I helped prepare in 1900 a sociological exposition of the American Negro ~~an exhibit~~ for the Paris Exposition which gained a grand prize for the ~~school~~ exhibit and a gold medal for myself. I attended at that time a first Pan-African Conference in London with Bishop Walters where I met the Colensos and Samuel Coleridge Taylor. I was elected a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1900 and made a fellow in 1904. I not only published the conference reports yearly but wrote magazine articles in the World's Work, and in the Atlantic Monthly where I was fellow contributor with Woodrow Wilson in a symposium. I testified before Congressional Commissions in Washington and appeared on the lecture platform with Walter Page afterwards war ambassador to England. I had wide correspondence with men of prominence in America and Europe: Lyman Abbott of the Outlook; E. D. Morel, the English expert on Africa; Max Weber of Heidelberg; Professor Wilcox of Cornell; Bliss Perry of the Atlantic Monthly; Horace Traubel, the great protagonist for Walt Whitman; Charles Eliot Norton and Talcott Williams. I began to be regarded by some as having definite information on the Negro to which they might listen with profit.

41-7-135

At the same time, however, there was cause for increasing apprehension. First of all, and for me most astonishing, we could not get money for our work in the Atlanta Conferences and our studies of the Negro problem. My theory had been that just as soon as the world saw the value of our studies the raising of funds would be the easiest thing in the world. I received for the whole thirteen years that I was then at Atlanta University an annual salary of only $1,200. The whole cost of the conference and studies never exceeded $5,000 a year and usually it was considerably less. The work was done at first in a spare bedroom of my apartment and finally in the attic of Stone Hall where adequate but rather inaccessible rooms were provided. I had no skilled assistants and yet my dream was still splendid. If in a properly equipped institution I could have gathered four or five well equipped young students, some tabulating machines and a small corps of traveling investigators we could at a cost of $10,000 to $25,000 a year have absolutely reconstituted the bases of fact and argument concerning the American Negro. But we could not get $5,000 even; and then to make the situation worse there came the controversy with Booker T. Washington which turned from me and from Atlanta University the sympathy of most men who had money to give.

It was no controversy of my seeking; quite the contrary. I was in my imagination a scientist and neither a leader nor an agitator; I had nothing but the greatest admiration for Mr. Washington and Tuskegee and I had applied in 1894 at both Tuskegee and Hampton for work; if the telegram from Tuskegee had reached me before the Wilberforce bid I should doubtless have gone there. Certainly I knew no less about Mathematics than I did about Latin and Greek. But no sooner was my work at Atlanta University under way than pressure began to be placed upon me to leave here and go to Tuskegee. There again I was not adverse in principle to Tuskegee, except that I had started a job and wanted to continue it; surely if my work was worth support it was worth support at Atlanta University as much if not more than elsewhere. I remember that a letter came from Wallace Buttrick late in 1902 asking that I attend a private conference in New York with Felix Adler and William H. Baldwin, Jr., George Foster Peabody and Robert Ogden. The object of the conference was ostensibly the condition of the Negro in New York City. I went to the conference and I did not like it. Most of the more distinguished persons were not present. The conference itself amounted to little, but I was whisked over to William H. Baldwin's Long Island home and there what seemed to me to be the real object of my coming was disclosed. Mr. Baldwin was at that time slated to be president of the Pennsylvania Railway, and was the rising industrial leader of America; also he was a prime mover of the Tuskegee board of trustees. Both he and his wife insisted that my place was at Tuskegee; that

41-7-136

Tuskegee needed the kind of development that I had been trained to give. I could not help being impressed and I promised to think the matter over. Later I had two personal interviews with Mr. Washington. He encouraged me to talk but he said very little himself. I could get no clear understanding of just what I was going to do at Tuskegee if I went. I was given to understand that the salary and accomodations would be satisfactory. Later in the year I went to Bar Harbor for a series of speeches in behalf of Atlanta University and while there met Jacob Schiff, the Scheffelins and Merriam of Webster's dictionary. I had dinner with the Scheffelins and their mother the daughter of John Jay; and again was urged to go to Tuskegee.

41-7-137

But by that time my mind was made up. I was growing increasingly uncomfortable under Mr. Washington's various statement of his program; his depreciation of the value of the vote; his evident dislike of Negro colleges and his general attitude which seemed to place the onus of blame for the race problems upon the Negro himself rather than upon the whites. I attended several conferences at Hampton and found myself consenting by silence to a systematic attack on Negro colleges. I determined on a decisive step. I had been asked sometime before by A. C. McClurg and Company of Chicago if I did not have material for a book and I suggested a social study which should be perhaps a summing up of the work of the Atlanta Conferences or at any rate a broad scientific treatise which required some time. They asked, however, if I did not have some essays that they might put together and issue immediately and they instanced the articles in the Atlantic Monthly and other places. I demurred because essays usually fall so flat. Nevertheless, I got together a series of my fugitive pieces and added a frank evaluation of Booker T. Washington and sent them on. The Souls of Black Folk was published in 1903 and in 1938 it is still selling. It settled definitely any further question of my going to Tuskegee, but it also aroused apprehension. Various friends of the Negro desired to keep Negro thought from splitting into a pro-Washington and an anti-Washington camp. After all, Mr. Washington had accomplished much and a new basis of understanding on the Negro seemed to most white people in sight. Every effort must be made to preserve unity of effort. I was asked in 1903 to join Mr. Washington and his friends in a conference to be held in New York to talk of a common program. I assented and as I wrote to Kelly Miller: "I think this will be a chance for a heart to heart talk with Mr. Washington. I propose to stand on the following platform:

41-7-138

1. Full political rights on the same terms as other Americans.
2. Higher education of selected Negro youth.
3. Industrial education for the masses.
4. Common school training for every Negro child.
5. A stoppage to the campaign of self-depreciation.
6. A careful study of the real condition of the Negro.
7. A national Negro periodical.
8. A thorough and efficient federation of Negro societies and activities.
9. The raising of a defense fund.
10. A judicious fight in the courts for civil rights.

"Finally, the general watch word must be, not to put further dependence on the help of the whites but to organize for self help, encouraging "manliness without defiance, conciliation without servility."

The matter dragged on with some argument as to who should be invited. The general invitation to the conference went out in October, 1903, when Mr. Washington sent out the following circular letter: "You will perhaps recall that about the middle of last February I addressed you a letter concerning a private conference to be attended by about fifteen or eighteen of our most prominent men, representing various sections of the country and various race interests, for the purpose of considering quietly all the weighty matters that now confront us as a race. The meeting was not called at the time hoped for in my last correspondence for the reason that there was delay and some disappointment in providing funds for the expenses of the meeting. That feature has now been provided for in a way that will not make those who attend the conference feel obligated to any individual or organization and leave them free for open and frank discussion.

"I very much hope that you can now see your way clear to attend such a conference in New York City to be held, if possible, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of January, 1904."

The conference took place in Carnegie Hall, New York, ~~January 6, 7, 8, 1904~~. There was some plain speaking but it was overborne by almost fullsome praise of Mr. Washington from the lips of various invited guests like Andrew Carnegie and Lyman Abbott. It ended in the appointment of a committee of three, of which I was one, who were to select a sort of racial steering committee called the Committee of Twelve. Nothing really came from this. The two other members of the committee organized it in my absence, placed the full power in the hands of Mr. Washington who was to carry on the work with funds whose source I did not know. I resigned forthwith and was pretty roundly condemned for my lack of "cooperation", but I was indignant at what seemed to me an effort to buy agreement and smother dissent under a dictatorship.

41-7-139

Things now began to move swiftly. In Boston a new colored weekly newspaper, the Boston Guardian was organized by two young radicals: Monroe Trotter and George Forbes. They were bitter in their attacks upon Mr. Washington and I got myself in hot water by publishing a statement in the Guardian concerning the venality of certain Negro papers whom I charged had sold out and were viciously attacking every Negro who did not agree with Mr. Washington. It was a charge which I could not support by concrete facts but it was true in the sense that there had been organized at Tuskegee a literary bureau to emphasize Mr. Washington's ideas in the Negro press and to stop the widespread criticism against him. The methods used are common today: distribution of advertising; sending out of special correspondence and distributing other favors; but it seemed to me then that this kind of propaganda was monstrous and dishonest and I resented it. On the other hand, the public expression of this resentment caused many people to think that I was wild and unfair in my statements and beyond that it undoubtedly made it increasingly difficult for Dr. Bumstead to raise funds for Atlanta University. In the fall of 1904 the printing of our conference report was postponed by the trustees until special funds could be secured. I did not at the time see the handwriting on the wall. I did not realize how strong the forces were back of Tuskegee and how they might interfere with my plan of scientific study of the Negro.

My first thought was in order to state our case and honest criticism we needed a journal. I had already helped an A. U. graduate to establish a printing press in Memphis. Out of this might arise a vehicle for both opinion and fact which would help me carry on my scientific work and at the same time be a forum of reform less radical than the Guardian and more rational than the rank and file of Negro papers now so largely arrayed with Tuskegee. I wrote to Jacob Schiff reminding him of having met him in Bar Harbor in 1903. "I want to lay before you a plan which I have and ask you if it is of sufficient interest to you for you to be willing to hear more of it and possibly to assist in its realization. The Negro race in America is today in a critical condition. Only united concerted effort will save us from being crushed. This union must come as a matter of education and long continued effort. To this end there is needed a high class journal to circulate among the intelligent Negroes, tell them of the deeds of themselves and their neighbors, interpret the news of the world to them and inspire them toward definite ideals. Now we have many small weekly papers and one or two monthlies and none of them fill the great need I have outlined. I want to establish therefore for the nine million American Negroes and eventually for the whole Negro world a monthly journal."

41-2-140

Mr. Schiff wrote back courteously saying: "Your plans to establish a high class journal to circulate among the intelligent Negroes is in itself interesting and on its face has my sympathy. But before I could decide whether I can become of advantage in carrying your plans into effect, I would wish to advise with men whose opinion in such a matter I consider of much value.

Nothing came of this because, as I might have known most of Mr. Schiff's friends were strong and sincere advocates of Tuskegee. Then came a new and surprising turn to the whole situation which in the end quite changed my life. In the early summer of 1905 Mr. Washington went to Boston and arranged to speak in a colored church to colored people, a thing which he did not often do in the North. Trotter and Forbes, editors of the Guardian determined to heckle him and make him answer certain questions with regard to his attitude toward voting and education. William H. Lewis, a lawyer whom I had introduced to Mr. Washington, had charge of the meeting and the result was a disturbance magnified by the newspapers into a riot which resulted in the arrest of Mr. Trotter and eventually he served a term in jail. Later I explained to Mr. George Foster Peabody in answer to a query, my own connection with and attitude toward this occurrence. "I did not arrive in Boston until after the Zion Church disturbance. Before seeing the account in the morning papers, I had no inkling or suspicion in any way of the matter. I did not know Mr. Washington was in Boston or intending to go there as I had just left him at Tuskegee. I had had no correspondence with Mr. Trotter for six months save in regard to a boarding place. When I arrived in Boston and heard of the meeting I told Mr. Trotter and Mr. Forbes in plain terms my decided disapproval of the unfortunate occurrence and my conviction that it would do harm. Although I was unable at that time to defend Mr. Washington's position as I once had, I nevertheless took occasion to address a meeting of men at Mr. Trotter's home and remind them of the vast difference between criticizing Mr. Washington's policy and attacking him personally. Nevertheless, brought into close contact with Mr. Trotter for the first time my admiration for his unselfishness, pureness of heart and indomitable energy even when misguided, grew."

41-7-141

Trotter was headstrong but sincere. He must not be made a martyr.

However when Mr. Trotter was jailed my indignation overflowed. I sent out from Atlanta in June, 1905, "a call to a few selected persons 'for organized determination and aggresive action on the part of men who believe in Negro freedom and growth.' I propose a conference during that summer 'to oppose firmly present methods of strangling honest criticism, to organize intelligent and honest Negroes, and to support organs of news and public opinion." Fifty-nine men from seventeen different states signed a Call for a meeting near Buffalo, New York, during the week of July 9, 1905. I went to Buffalo and hired a little hotel on the Canada side of the river at Fort Erie and waited for the men to attend the meeting called for July 11, 12, 13 and 14. If sufficient men had not come to pay for the hotel, I should certainly have been in bankruptcy and perhaps in jail; but as a matter of fact, twenty-nine men, representing fourteen states, came. The Niagara Movement was organized January 31, 1906, and was incorporated in the District of Columbia with the following principles:

41-7-142

1. Freedom of speech and criticism.
2. Unfettered and unsubsidized press.
3. Manhood suffrage.
4. The abolition of all caste distinctions based simply on race and color.
5. The recognition of the principles of human brotherhood as a practical present creed.
6. The recognition of the highest and best human training as the monopoly of no class or race.
7. A belief in the dignity of labor.
8. United effort to realize these ideals under wise and courageous leadership."

41-2-143

The Niagara Movement created furor and the most disconcerting criticism. I was accused of acting from motives of envy of a great leader and being ashamed of the fact that I was a member of the Negro race. The leading weekly of the land, The New York Outlook, pilloried me with scathing articles and the Negro weeklies, with few exceptions, went mad. But the movement went forward. The next year, 1906, instead of meeting in secret we met publicly at Harper's Ferry, the scene of John Brown's raid and had, in significance if not numbers, one of the greatest meetings that American Negroes have ever held. We made pilgrimage at dawn barefooted to the scene of Brown's martyrdom and we talked some of the plainest English that had been given voice by Black men in America.

Now the fat was in the fire and my career as a scientist was beginning to be swallowed up in my role as master of propaganda. This was not at all to my liking. I was no natural leader of men. I could not slap people on the back and make friends of strangers. I could not easily break down an inherited reserve and a cold, biting, critical streak. Nevertheless, having put my hand to the plow I could not turn back. The Niagara movement met with less momentum in Boston in 1907 and in Oberlin in 1908 and then practically became merged into a new and enveloping movement which started with a conference in 1909 and was incorporated as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1911.

41-7-144

While now I was being swept on in this current to a new and different mode of expression, I continued to cling to my scientific work. In 1906, I outlined that work to Andrew Carnegie hoping to interest him in the Atlanta Conferences and reminding him that I had been presented to him and Carl Schurz some years before. I said: "I enclose herewith a report on Negro Crime, which is the ninth annual report published by the conference. The object of this Conference is the systematic and exhaustive study of the American Negro, in order that in the future philanthropists and others who seek to solve this serious set of problems may have before them a carefully gathered body of scientifically arranged facts to guide them.

"The studies mentioned above have been widely used; they are in all the large libraries of the world including the British Museum, the Library of Congress, Harvard University, etc. They have been commended by periodicals like the Outlook, The Nation, The London Times, the Spectator, and the Manchester Guardian; they have been favorably spoken of by men like G. Stanley Hall, Walter F. Willcox, Tallcot Williams, and most of the teachers of economics and sociology in American Colleges." There was no response but still I pushed on.

I approached the United States Commissioner of Labor in 1906 with proposal for a study of Lowmes County, Alabama. I was going to take a single county of a former slave state with a large majority of Negroes and make a social and economic study from the earliest times where documents were available, down to the present; supplemented by studies of official records and a house to house individual canvas. I plied Commissioner Neill with plans and specifications until at last he authorized the study. Helped by Monroe Work now at Tuskegee Institute and R. R. Wright now a bishop of the A. M. E. Church and a dozen or more local employees I settled at the Calhoun School and began the study. It was carried on with all sorts of difficulties including the greeting of my agents with shot guns in certain parts of the county; but it was eventually finished. The difficult schedules were tabulated and I think myself that it was the most complete study of the sort that has ever been made. It included maps of the chronological division of the land; studies of the distribution of labor; investigations of the relation of landlord and tenant; a review of the political organization and of the family life and distribution of the population. I went to Washington and I spent some weeks there revising and perfecting it. It was accepted by the government and $2,000 paid for it, most of which went back to Atlanta University in repayment of funds which it had kindly furnished me to carry on the work. But the study was not published. I finally approached the bureau and tried to find out when it would be published and was told that the bureau had decided not to publish the manuscript since it "touched on political matters". I was astonished and disappointed but after a year I went back to them again and asked if they would allow me to have the manuscript published since they were not going to use it. They told me it had been destroyed.

41-2-145

And to complete this strange picture while I was down in Lowndes County finishing this study there came the news of the Atlanta riot. I took the next train for Atlanta and my family. On the way I wrote the Litany of Atlanta.

Meantime I had started in Memphis with the help of two graduates of Atlanta University the little printing shop that I have mentioned and from this was published a weekly paper called The Moon beginning in 1906. The Moon was in some sort precursor of the Crisis. It was published for a year in Memphis and then the printing office given up and in 1907 in conjunction with two friends in Washington there was issued a minature monthly called the Horizon. The Horizon was published from 1907 to 1910 and in the fall of 1910 the Crisis was born.

41-7-46

~~And~~ So my work in Atlanta and my dream of the settlement of the Negro problem by science faded. I began to be acutely conscious of the difficulty which my attitudes and beliefs were making for Atlanta University. I thought that my withdrawal would unloose funds from the General Education Board and other sources which would make the University secure and perhaps even permit the carrying on of the conference in other hands. For a while I thought of withdrawing in 1906 when I was offered the position of assistant superintendent of schools of Washington, D. C. But even there, fear of my "radicalism" took the matter up even to President Theodore Roosevelt and the offer while never withdrawn was not pressed. Finally after the conference of 1909 in New York the new organization of The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was formed and I was asked to come as Director of Publications and Research ~~with the idea that something of my research work was to go on and thus the other idea, that my activities would be so held in check that the Association would not develop as an organ of attack upon Tuskegee~~.

The Fifth Decade - Editor - 1908-1918 - 40-50 years of age.- The span of my life from 1908-1918 is chiefly the story of the Crisis Magazine under my editorship but it had also an astonishing variety of subsidiary interests and activities.

Beginning a little before this period I continued my visits to Europe. I went in 1900 and again by the grace of an English friend in 1907; I took part in the great Races Congress in 1911 and went again in December, 1918, just after the Armistice. This close touch with Europe and European developments had much to do with my understanding of social problems and trends of the world. I followed the development of English imperialism and the forces in England, France, Italy and Germany which resulted in the Balkan War, the World War and eventually the Russian Revolution. In the United States I studied the political developments from the free silver controversy led by Bryan, through the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and Taft and especially the Bull Moose campaign and the election of Wilson.

I kept on writing and publishing not with as much concentration of effort as I ought to have, but with some effectiveness. In 1907 appeared "The Negro in the South" - from lectures, two by myself and two by Mr. Washington. In 1909 I published "John Brown," one of the best written of my books, but one which arouse unfortunate ~~antagonism~~ jealousy. In 1915 I published my little volume on "The Negro". To this must be added part of a bulletin in the twelfth census and several magazine articles; and, of course, eight years of the Crisis.

I was active in the organization of the new National Association for the Advancement of Colored People but carefully avoided the temptation of becoming its executive head. I still clung to my idea of investigation in lines which would temper and guide my exposition of a racial philosophy and for that reason I determined from the beginning to make my work of the Association not that of executive secretary but editor of an official organ to be established. There was opposition to this from the first. First of all, organs of this sort were known to be usually costly and the organization had no money. Secondly, organs were of doubtful efficiency. My good friend, Albert E. Pillsbury, Attorney-General of Massachusetts, wrote and said feelingly: "If you have not decided upon a periodical for heaven's sake don't. They are as numerous as flies" and he meant to conclude about as useful. I came to New York to occupy a bare office; ~~occupied~~ associated with a treasurer who said frankly, "I don't know who is going to pay your salary. I have no money;" with a secretary who was scared of her job and jealous of her power; and with a generally critical if not hostile public which expected the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to launch upon a bitter attack upon Booker T. Washington and Tuskegee.

41-7-147

41-7-14

My first job was to get the Crisis going; and arriving in August I finally got the first copy off the press in November, 1910. It came at the psychological moment and its success was phenomenal. From the one thousand which I ventured to publish first it went up a thousand a month until by 1918 (due, of course, to special circumstances) we published and sold over a hundred thousand copies.

With this organ of propaganda and defense we were able to organize one of the most effective assaults of liberalism upon reaction that the modern world has seen. We secured extraordinary helpers: great lawyers like Moorfield Storey and Louis Marshall; earnest liberals like Villard, Milholland, John Haynes Holmes, Mary Ovington, Jane Addams, the Spingarns,

Charles Edward Russell and William English Walling. We gained a series of court victories before the highest courts of the land which perhaps never have been equalled, beginning with the overthrow of the vicious Grandfather Clauses in 1915 and the breaking of the backbone of segregation in 1917. Above all we could, through the Crisis and our officers, our secretaries and friends, place consistently and continuously before the country a clear cut statement of the legitimate aims of the American Negro and the facts concerning his condition. We organized his political power and made it ~~effective~~ felt and we started a campaign against lynching and mob law which was the most effective ever organized and ~~eventually brought~~ at long last seemed to bring the end of the evil in sight.

41-7-149

With these efforts came other activities. I lectured widely in nearly every state in the Union. ~~I promoted literature and art through pageants, a little theatre movement and prizes offered by the Crisis~~. I furnished information to people everywhere on all sorts of subjects closely and remotely connected with race problems, and carried on from time to time studies and investigations. ~~On the whole I should criticize this period of my life for too great dissipation of energy; too little concentration upon main objectives; and yet I suppose that under the circumstances this was impossible~~. I was held more responsible for the success of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People than I cared to confess to myself; than most other people wanted to admit. I had to spread myself over a whole field of activities when I should have done great deal better work if I could have confined myself to writing and study.

The development of the Crisis where most of my writing was done was interesting and difficult. It was impaired first and last by lack of trained business management. For the most part I was my own business manager which meant the loss of much time in learning and details. Then there was the delicate matter of policy; of how far I should express my own ideas and reactions in the Crisis or the studied judgment of the organization. From first to last I thought strongly and as I still think rightly, to make the opinion expressed in the Crisis a personal opinion; because as I argued, no organization can express definite and clear cut opinions; so far as this organization comes to conclusions it states them in its annual resolutions but the Crisis states openly the opinion of its editor so long as that opinion is in general agreement with that of the organization.

41-7-158

This of course was a dangerous and delicate matter bound eventually to break down in case there was any considerable divergence of opinion between the organization and editor. It was perhaps rather unusual that for two decades the two lines of thinking ran so largely together. If on the other hand the Crisis had not been in a sense a personal organ and the expression of myself, it could not possibly have attained its popularity and effectiveness. It would have been the dry kind of organ that so many societies support for purposes of reference and not for reading. It took, on the part of the organization, a great deal of patience and faith to allow me the latitude that they did for so many years; and on the other hand I was enabled to lay down for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a clear, strong and distinct body of doctrine that could not have been built up by majority vote. It was probably inevitable that in the end a distinct and clear cut difference of opinion on majority policies should lead to the dissolution of this interesting partnership.

One of the first difficulties that the National Association met was the case of its attitude toward Mr. Washington. I carefully tried to avoid any exaggeration of differences of thought; but to discuss the Negro question in 1910 was to discuss Booker T. Washington and almost before we were conscious of the inevitable trends we were challenged from Europe. Mr. Washington was in Europe in 1910 and made some speeches in England in his usual conciliatory lines. John Milholland who had been so dominant in the organization of the National Association immediately wrote me and said that American Negroes must combat the idea that they were satisfied with conditions. I, therefore, wrote an appeal to England and Europe.

41-7-151

"If Mr. Booker T. Washington, or any other person, is giving the impression abroad that the Negro problem in America is in process of satisfactory solution, he is giving an impression which is not true. We say this without personal bitterness toward Mr. Washington. He is a distinguished American and has a perfect right to his opinions. But we are compelled to point out that Mr. Washington's large financial responsibilities have made him dependent on the rich charitable public and that, for this reasons, he has for years been compelled to tell, not the whole truth, but that part of it which certain powerful interests in America wish to appear as the whole truth. In flat contradition, however, to the pleasant pictures thus pointed out, let us not forget that the consensus of opinion among eminent European scholars who know the race problem in America from De Tocqueville down to Von Halle, De Laveleys, Archer and Johnston, is that it forms the gravest of American problems. We Black men who live and suffer under present conditions, and who have no reason, and refuse to accept reasons, for silence, can substantiate this unanimous testimony."

In furtherance of this statement and in anticipation of the meeting of the Races Congress Mr. Milholland arranged that I should go early to the conference and make some addresses. The plan simmered down to a proposed address before the Lyceum Club, the leading woman's group of London and there it ran against the opposition of an American woman who wrote: "I think there is serious objection to entertaining Dr. DuBois at the Lyceum." The result was a rather acrimonious controversy, in which I tried gently to withdraw but was unable to and finally led by Her Highness the Ranée of Sarawak and Dr. Etta Sayre a luncheon was held at the Lyceum Club with a bishop and two countesses and several knights and ladies and with Maurice Hewlett and Sir Harry Johnston.

111-7-152

The Races Congress would have marked an epoch in the racial history of the world if it had not been for the World War. As it was, it was a great and inspiring occasion bringing together representatives of numerous ethnic and cultural groups and bringing new and frank conceptions of scientific bases of racial and social relations of people. I had a chance twice to address the Congress and to write one of the two poems which greeted the assembly.

Returning to the United States I was plunged into the Bull Moose campaign. I thought I saw a splendid chance for a third party movement on a broad platform of votes for Negroes and industrial democracy. Sitting in the office of the Crisis I wrote out a proposed plank for the Progressives to adopt at their Chicago meeting: "The Progressive party recognizes that distinctions of race or class in political life have no place in a democracy. Especially does the party realize that a group of 10,000,000 people who have in a generation changed from a slave to a free labor system, re-established family life, accumulated $1,000,000,000 of real property, including 20,000,000 acres of land, and reduced their illiteracy from 80 to 30 per cent., deserve and must have justice, opportunity and a voice in their own government. The party, therefore, demands for the American of Negro descent the repeal of unfair discriminatory laws and the right to vote on the same terms on which other citizens vote."

41-7-153

This was ~~taken~~ taken to Chicago by Joel E. Spingarn and advocated by two other directors of the Association, Dr. Henry Moskowitz and Jane Addams. They worked in vain for its adoption. Theodore Roosevelt would have none of it. He told Mr. Spingarn frankly that he should be "careful of that man DuBois" who was in ~~his~~ Roosevelt's opinion a dangerous person. The Bull Moose ~~Campaign~~ Convention not only refused to adopt a plank anything like this but refused to seat most of the colored delegates; elected a Southern "lily white" to run on the ticket with Mr. Roosevelt and finally succeeded in making Woodrow Wilson president of the United States.

Immediately Bishop Walters and myself conceived the idea that Mr. Wilson might be approachable. I proposed to throw the weight of the Crisis against Roosevelt and Taft and for Wilson, and Bishop Walters went to see him. He secured from Woodrow Wilson a categorical expression over his signature "of his earnest wish to see justice done the colored people in every matter; and not mere grudging justice, but justice executed with liberality and cordial good feeling". "I want to assure them that should I become President of the United States they may count upon me for absolute fair dealing, for everything by which I could assist in advancing the interests of their race in the United States." In this effort to divide the Negro vote which was successful to an unusual degree, we were cruelly disappointed when the democratic Congress met. There was the greatest flood of discriminatory bills both in Congress and among the states that has probably ever been introduced since the Civil War. Only united and determined effort defeated bills against intermarriage and for other discriminations in eight states and while most of the proposed legislation in Congress was kept from the statute books, the administration carried out a segregation by color in the various departments which we had to fight for years and vestiges of which even remain today.

4/- 7-154

In other respects our lines were cast in difficult places. The Socialists began to consider the color question and to discriminate against the membership of colored people in the South, lest whites should not be attracted. Mr. Villard tried to get the President to appoint a National Race Commission to be privately financed to the extent of $50,000 but nothing could be done; and suddenly war and revolution struck the world: the Chinese Revolution in 1912; the Balkan War in 1913 and finally in 1914 the World War.

In that very year the National Council of Social Agencies met in Memphis without daring to discuss the color question but Spingarn and I went down to Memphis and held open meetings advertising "for all who dared hear the truth." We had an interesting time. Finally the World War touched America; with it and in anticipation of it came a sudden increasing of lynching including the horrible burning at Dyersburg; there cam renewed efforts at segregation; the refusal to let Negroes volunteer; the whole extraordinary difficulties of the draft and the question of Negro officers. The Association itself hesitated. It did not want openly to advocate segregation but Spingarn, chairman of the board of the Crisis, went ahead and the students of Howard and other schools backed our efforts. We finally succeeded in arranging for an officers camp at Des Moines where seven hundred officers were eventually given commissions. At the same time there was the increased migration of Negroes

This success and the death of Booker T. Washington in 1915 led to the first Amenia Conference and united the American Negro in one program of advance.

41-7-155

to the North, the riots at East St. Louis and the rebellion of Negro soliders at Houston; the shelving of Colonel Young and the alleged German plots. ~~It was in 1918 that I was fifty years of age and had my first experience of birthday celebration.~~ The Crisis had reached a monthly circulation of 68,000 and during the year I had a little dinner with Glendowen Evans, Margaret DeLand and William James.

The Sixth Decade - Editor and Traveler - 1918-1928 - 50-60 years of age.- I review the sixth decade of my life with some misgivings and difficulties of judgment. It was in many respects a culmination and yet again it represented as it seems to me now, a vast dissipation of energy which might to better purpose have been concentrated in fewer lines. I am not altogether sure of this. There were so many things to do; so many paths that presented themselves as duties which must be followed that I was perhaps more or less helpless in the grasp of forces mightier than my will. Because after all the decade following the War was a time of tremendous crises and changes and no single life could escape the paradox and confusion to which all life, and especially life in culture lands, was subjected.

My career had at this time a certain sense of drama. I had never before seen Theodore Roosevelt but in November, 1918, I presided at a meeting in Carnegie Hall where he made his last public speech, appearing together with Irwin Cobb and a representative of the French High Commission. I remember my introduction "I have the honor to present Theodore Roosevelt." Then on my fiftieth birthday there was a public celebration and many kindly messages. John Hope wrote: "How glad I am that your fiftieth birthday is going to be such a happy one because you can look back on so much good work done. But not the good work alone. What you may look back upon with greatest comfort is good intention."

41-7-152

And Albert Bushnell Hart wrote a word which one quotes with a certain diffidence: "Out of his fifty years of life I have followed a good thirty - and have counted him always among the ablest and keenest of our teacher-scholars, an American who viewed his country broadly."

~~And~~ Finally I prize most highly the tribute of President Bumstead: "First of all, let me express the keen satisfaction I take in having been the one chiefly responsible, perhaps, for bringing Doctor DuBois to Atlanta University." "I cannot but smile when I think of the objections and misgivings of some of our trustees and other friends when he came." "We wanted a professor of sociology with special reference to investigating conditions concerning the Negro; and I said that Doctor DuBois was the one man, white or black, far and away best fitted for the position. But how about his religion - he's studied in Germany - perhaps if you scratch him, you'll find an agnostic. Now it is true that Atlanta University has always had a pronounced religious, though undenominational, life - a life ... ~~inherited from the New England people represented by its founders; and it has always looked to its teachers, so far as possible, to help to maintain it~~ - so I must needs have some assurances on this point. But, as Doctor DuBois will remember, they were not very easy to get. He seemed to be one of those persons who, when asked about their religion, reply that they "have none to speak of". But though reluctant to speak of his religion or to say what he would do at Atlanta, I observed that at the time of my interview with him he was living with his newly wedded bride in the centre of the Negro slums of Philadelphia, doing the beneficent work to which Provost Harrison had called him, and I thought there were some indications of genuine religion in that fact."

"So, in spite of objections and misgivings, Doctor DuBois came to Atlanta University, and we held him there for thirteen years notwithstanding several offers to go elsewhere and get double the salary that we could afford to pay him. His work became a memorable part of the history of the Institution."

The most important work of the decade as I now look back upon it was my travel. Before 1918 I had made three tripts to Europe; but now between 1918 and 1928 I made four trips of extraordinary meaning: to France directly after the close of the war and during the Congress of Versailles; to England, Belgium, France and Geneva in the earliest days of the League of Nations; to Spain, Portugal and Africa in 1923 and 1924; and to Germany, Russia, and Constantinople in 1927. I could scarcely have encompassed a more vital part of the modern world picture than in those stirring journeys. They gave me a depth of knowledge and a breadth of view which was of incalculable value for realizing and judging modern conditions, and above all the problem of race in America.

41-7-157

But this was only part of my work: in the United States I was still fighting the battle of liberalism against race prejudice; trying to adjust war and post-war problems to the questions of racial justice; trying to show from the injustices of war time what the new vision must encompass; fighting mobs and lynchings; encouraging Negro migration; helping woman suffrage; encouraging the new rush of young blacks to college; watching and explaining the political situation and traveling and lecturing thousands of miles and in hundreds of centers. In addition to this I was encouraging the writing of others and trying to help develop Negro art and literature. Beside editing the Crisis continuously, I published ~~The Negro in 1915~~; "~~Dark Water~~" in 1920; "Darkwater"

"The Gift of Black Folk" in 1924; the article on Georgia "In These United States" in 1924, and the concluding chapter in The New Negro in 1925 beside a number of magazine articles. Most of the young writers who began what was called the renaissance of Negro literature in the twenties, began ~~from~~ their first publication in the Crisis magazine.

Above all in these days I made two efforts toward which I look back with infinite satisfaction: the two year attempt in the Brownie's book to furnish a little magazine for Negro children in which my efforts were ably seconded by Augustus Dill and Jessie Fausett; and most especially my single handed production of the pageant "The Star of Ethiopia". The pageant was an attempt to put into dramatic form for the benefit of large masses of people, a history of the Negro race. It was first attempted in the New York celebration of Emancipation in 1913; it was repeated with magnificent and breathtaking success in Washington with 1200 participants; it was given again in Philadelphia in 1916; and in Los Angeles in 1924.

41-7-158

Finally in New York I attempted a little theatre movement which went far enough to secure for our little group ~~, helped by the acting of Ira Reid~~ second prize in an international competition. In 1918 I was asked rather suddenly by the N. A. A. C. P. to go to Europe right after the Armistice, to investigate the treatment of Negro soldiers and keep the record straight; and then ~~secondly~~ at the behest of a group of American Negroes I considered that the interests of Africa ought to be represented during the peace efforts following the war. With infinite difficulty and through the cooperation of Blaise Diagne the French Deputy from Senegal I succeeded in gathering in February, 1919, at the Grand Hotel in Paris a Pan-African congress of fifty-seven delegates including sixteen American Negroes, twenty West

Indians and twelve Africans. Both France, Belgium and Portugal were represented by officials. This was to my mind but a beginning and in 1921 I returned and held a Second Pan-African Congress in London, Brussels and Paris from August 28 to September 6. There were 113 accredited delegates from twenty-six different groups including thirty-five from the United States, thirty-nine from Africa and the rest from the West Indies and Europe. Among the speakers were Sir Sidney now Lord Olivier; Florence Kelly; Bishop Hurse; Paul Otlet often called the father of the League of Nations; Senator La Fontaine of Belgium; Dr. Vitellian, former physician of Menelik of Abyssinia; General Sorelas; Blaise Diagne; Norman Leys and others. The attention which the congress evoked all over Europe was astonishing. It was discussed in the London Times, Observer and Daily Graphic; in the Paris Petit Parisian, Matin and Temps; in the Manchester Guardian and in practically all the daily papers of Belgium. It led to heated debate in Brussels touching the rights of these delegates to discuss the relation of colonies and it emphasized in the minds of all of us the consequent importance of such discussions.

41-7-159

Two of us visited the League of Nations and the International Labor Office with petitions and suggestions. In 1923 a third Pan African Congress, less broadly representative than the second, but nevertheless of some importance was held in London, Paris and Lisbon; and thence I went to Africa and for the first time saw the homeland of the black race.

It was the time when the U. S. had disappointed Liberia by not granting her a promised loan and a gesture of good will was in order. At the suggestion of William H. Lewis I was therefore designated by cable as special minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to represent President Coolidge at the inauguration of President King. In the presence of the diplomatic and consular representatives of England, France, Germany, Spain, Belgium,

Holland and Panama I had the honor to tell the President of Liberia: "Your Excellency:. . . I am sure that in this special mark of the President's favor, he has had in mind the wishes and hopes of Negro Americans. He knows how proud they are of the hundred years of independence which you have maintained by force of arms and by brawn and brain upon the edge of this might continent; he knows that in the great battle against color caste in America; the ability of Negroes to rule in Africa has been and ever will be a great and encouraging reinforcement."

At the London meeting of the third Pan African Congress, Harold Laski, H. G. Wells, and Sir Sidney Olivier spoke, and Ramsey McDonald ~~had~~ promised to speak to us but was hindered by the sudden opening of the campaign which eventually made him prime minister of England. Among other efforts, at this time we held conferences with members of the Labor Party of England at which Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mr. Clynes and others were present. We emphasized the importance of labor solidarity between white and black labor in England, America and elsewhere. In Portugal our meeting was attended by cabinet ministers and deputies and though small was of great interest.

41-7-160

To return again to the fight in the United States, there arose early in this decade the case of Marcus Garvey. I heard of him first when I was in Jamaica in 1915 when he sent a letter "presenting his compliments" and giving me "a hearty welcome to Jamaica, on the part of the United Improvement and Conservation Association". Later he came to the United States. In his case, as in the case of others, I have repeatedly been accused of enmity and jealously, which have been so far from my thought that the accusations have been a rather bitter experience. In 1920 when his movement was beginning to grow in America I said in the Crisis that he was "an extraordinary leader of men" and declared that he had "with singular success capitalized and made vocal the great and long suffering grievances and spirit of protest among the West Indian peasantry." On the other hand, I noted his difficulties of temperament and training, inability to get on with his fellow workers and denied categorically that I had ever interferred in any way with his work. Later when he began to collect money for his steamship I characterized him as a sincere and hard working idealist but called his methods bombastic, wasteful, illogical and almost illegal and begged his friends not to allow him foolishly to overwhelm with bankruptcy and disaster one of the most interesting spiritual movements of the modern world. But he went ahead, wasted his money, got in trouble with the authorities and was deported. As I said at the time: "When Garvey was sent to Atlanta, no word or action of ours accomplished the result. His release and deportation was a matter of law which no deed or wish of ours influenced in the slightest degree. We have today, no enmity against Marcus Garvey. He has a great and worthy dream. We wish him well. He is free; he has a following; he still has a chance to carry on his work in his own home and among his own people and to accomplish some of his ideas. Let him do it. We will be the first to applaud any success that he may have."

41-2-161

I felt for a moment during the war that I could be without reservation a patriotic American. The government was making sincere efforts to meet our demands. It had commissioned over seven hundred Negro officers; I had had a personal interview with Newton Baker, Secretary of War, and he had made categorical promises; Wilson had spoken out against lynching; and I had myself been offered a captaincy in the Intelligence Service, afterwards to be sure rather incontinently withdrawn as the higher command realized just who I was. Nevertheless, I tried to stand by the country and wrote the widely discussed editorial "Close Ranks" in which I said to the Negroes: Forget your grievances for the moment and stand by your country.

I am not sure that I was right but certainly my intentions were. I did not believe in war, but I thought that in a fight with America against militarism and for democracy we would be fighting for the emancipation of the Negro race. With the Armistice came disillusion. I saw the mud and dirt of the trenches; I heard from the mouths of soldiers the kind of treatment that black men got in the American army; I was convinced and said that American white officers fought more valiantly against Negroes within our ranks than they did against the Germans. I still believe this was largely true. I collected some astonishing documents of systematic slander and attack upon Negroes and demands upon the French for insulting attitudes toward them, and when I published these documents in America the government started to interfere by refusing the Crisis mailing facilities; then realizing that this was an admission of guilt, they quickly withdrew their prohibition.

U1-7-162

I was especially upset by the mobs and lynchings during this time: by that extraordinary upheaval wherein for several hours black men fighting against a mob practically held the city of Washington in their hands; then the ~~horrible~~ riot and murders in Chicago. We fought back through the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the columns of the Crisis, through lectures and articles with every force at hand. Mary Talbert started the Anti-Lynching Crusaders and with her help and that of the secretary, James Weldon Johnson, we raised a defense funde of $70,000 and put the Dyer Lynch Bill through the House of Representatives and on to the floor of the Senate. It was not until years after that I knew what killed that anti-lynching bill. It was a bargain between the South and the West by which lynching was permitted on condition that the Japanese were excluded.

Court cases kept pressing upon us: there were the Elaine riots and the Arkansas cases; there was the Sweet case in Detroit and equally significant to my mind but to few other Negroes the Sacco-Venzetti case in Massachusetts. We continued winning court victories and yet somehow, despite them, we did not seem to be getting far. We added to the Grandfather Case of 1915 and the Segregation Case of 1917 the victories in the Arkansas cases, the white primary case and another segregation case in the high courts, in addition to the eventual freeing of Dr. Sweet and his family. Still injustice prevailed. In the case of the Mississippi flood the Red Cross allowed the Negroes to be treated as slaves and peons, and in Okolona the Episcopal church refused to prosecute a white murderer on its own school grounds. Above all there came disquieting situations among Negro students: a strike at Hampton, disturbed conditions at Wilberforce, turmoil at Howard and an uprising at Fisk which had to end with the deposition of a president. Into this latter battle I had to throw myself; to resurrect and republish the Fisk Herald and to fight until Fisk was free.

41-7-163

It was thus a decade of infinite effort and discouraging turmoil. I suppose it had to be. I suppose that with the best will, it would have been impossible for me to concentrate on a few great lines of creative effort. I had to be a part of the revolution through which the world was going and to feel in my own soul the scars of its battle. Two things made a sort of finale to the decade: the fourth Pan African Congress held in New York in 1927 with Dantes Bellegarde, George Sylvain and other speakers; and there ~~was~~ news of the Congress of British West Africa which began its meetings in 1920 and forced the British government to the greatest step toward democratic method ever taken in black colonies. And finally to my surprise and quite against my best judgment there was given for me upon my return from Africa at the Cafe Savarin in New York, a dinner. Among the speakers were Heyward Broun, Walter Hampden and Mrs. Bethune and tributes were sent by Witter Bynner, Zona Gale and Eugene O'Neil. It was a very beautiful and touching tribute.

41-7-164

Seventh Decade - The Teacher and Writer - 1928-1938 - 60-70 years of age.- Gradually in the last ten years of my life it has dawned upon me with increasing clarity just what the essential change in the world has been since the era of war and depression and how the tactics of those who live for the widest development of men must change accordingly. It is not a matter of change in ideals but of decisive change in the methods by which ideals are to be approximated. As I now look back, I see in the crusade waged by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from 1910 to 1930 one of the finest efforts of liberalism to achieve human emancipation; and much was accomplished. But the essential difficulty with liberalism of the twentieth century was not to realize the fundamental change brought about by the world wide organization of work and trade and commerce. Karl Marx had emphasized in the 19th century the overwhelming influence of the economic activities of men upon their thought and action; but it was not until the 20th century that it became clearer and clearer to those who observed and thought, that modern business enterprise organized for private profit was throttling democratic government, choking art and literature and making work and industry a paradox by systematically increasing the number of unemployed and dislocating industry itself by periodic depressions.

During the decade, 1918-1928, the world tried to "recover" from the disaster of the World War. We strove to "restore prosperity", to "get back to normalcy" and to return to the same sort of world as the one that had just committed suicide. After ten years of confused effort, it became increasingly clear that the disaster was far greater and deeper than most men dreamed, and that not recovery but fundamental change in the very bases of government and civilization faced us. With the world-wide depression, even the dullest began to conceive the size of the disaster that had overwhelmed mankind.

41-7-165

Moreover the words of the prophets who for nearly a century had been warning mankind now began to sound clear: Freedom, that fine dream of the 18th century, had been during the 19th persistently interpreted as license for business enterprise, until it had not only reforged shackles for the human spirit, but actually re-established human slavery, first by transporting labor and then by making world-wide the domination of transporting capital. Armed rivalry for monopolizing wealth and services had led to commercial imperialism, world war and universal poverty. We were now faced with the enormously difficult task of reconstructing the economic foundations of civilization and building thereon a new heaven and a new earth for the free and creative spirit of man.

The first answer was the practically universal abandonment of democratic control in government and social development for oligarchy. This proved unexpectedly easy because already before the war, democracy was ~~already~~ so widely a form of words and pious belief and not a practical reality. We held to the forms of voting and popular election, but did not believe nor practice the substance. Throughout European culture, government had passed into the hands of industry, and industry was not controlled by democratic methods. When now the realities of the situation were posed to men, two radical solutions were suddenly resorted to: Russian communism and Fascism. They both did away with democracy, and substituted oligarchic control of government and industry of though and action. Communism ~~did this in accordance~~ aimed at eventual democracy and even elimination of the state, but sought this

41-7-164

by
~~with~~ a dogmatic program, laid down 90 years ago by a great thinker, but largely invalidated by nearly a century of extraordinary social change. Fascism sought to take complete control of the state, ostensibly for the good of all the people, but practically for the good of the dominant classes. Both dictatorships were forced to consolidate their power by ~~force~~, assassination and mass propaganda of every sort.

All this in the years since the war I had been observing in every part of the world, and I had been trying desperately and unremittingly, to spy out in the Universal gloom a path for the American Negro. One thing I knew and knew well: we could not afford to sit and wait; we must actively and intelligently press forward toward goals consistent with the new ways of ~~the~~ a world about to be reborn ~~world~~. The problem of a minority group in a world torn by old and new national and racial division was of enormous difficulty: it was idle for us simply to repeat the old slogans of democracy in an oligarchic world; no matter how strongly, we with all forward looking thinkers, might envisage a rebirth of democracy, we knew or should know, that at present, our problem was economic rather than political reform; this economic reconstruction was now in progress -- amid turmoil and contradiction, beclouded by a thousand irrelevances and bedeviled by every art of selfishness, but nevertheless clearly in progress. My problem was How can American Negroes joing this movement and intelligently reenforce it, for their own good and the good of all men.

In the organization whose leadership I then shared, I saw few allies impressed as I was to an ever increasing degree, ~~of~~ as to the immediate necessity of a reorientation of objectives in order to make our original and unshakable ideals realizable. It was a problem not of change of goal but of method. I looked about for allies and looked where man ever looks in such crisis -- to Youth. I thought that just as a quarter century earlier, the N. A. A. C. P.

was recruited from clear-eyed and courageous young folk, so to day, a reorganization of our aims could be led by a similar group.

For this reason the Second Amenia Conference was called, seventeen years after the first. The first Amenia conference in 1916, met at a strategic time. It brought together on the beautiful farm of Joel Spingarn, where once John Burroughs had studied and dreamed men and women representing all elements of leadership in the Negro race, together with white friends of prominence and influence. It was an unusually successful effort and there on the old farm and around the dark still lake while there was war in Europe and unrest in the United States a hundred or more Negroes came together and a half dozen whites with messages from three presidents of the United States and other distinguished persons and we agreed upon a liberal program which included a plea for education, a warning against factionalism, a need for interracial understanding and a forward movement. Our essential agreement on a program of advance was gratifying and epoch-making. But as I now see, we did not then sufficiently appreciate the spade-work which had gone before and which for 10 years had been preparing the minds of Americans, black and white for a new deal in race relations and renewed effort toward racial equality.

41-7-167

In 1933, the situation was different. We met at the beginning rather than at the end of a period of preparatory discussion. We were still mentally whirling in a sea of inconclusive world discussion. We could not really reach agreement as a group, because so many of us as individuals had not made up our minds on the essentials of coming social change. The attendance was sifted--perhaps too much so; outside of four of the Elder Statesmen, the median age was thirty--persons just out of college, their life work begun but not settled. They were teachers, social workers, professional men and two artisans. The discussion was indeterminate and the resolutions contradictory; it was agreed that "The primary problem is economic" but the conclusion was that this problem could not be approached from the point of view of Race, but only from that of a united group of laborers cutting across racial lines. This was of course the intrusion of communisitic dogma--ideally right, and practically unworkable. If the workers of the world would unite in unselfish cooperation to uplift the laboring mass, the millenium would be in sight. But we cannot expect of the age-long under-privileged worker, that which the educated and advanced have not envisaged; namely, the ignoring of race prejudice at just the era when it is being artificially stimulated by every human device.

41-7-168

Our program then must begin at home. Whatever just objection there be to racial efforts in a day when biologic races have been proven a myth, the reality of cultural groups like the American Negro, whether called "races" or what not, not only must be admitted but used as units of social uplift. I began then, despite the fact that the most courageous of the Negro youth seemed rushing down steep places into the sea of communistic dogma, without stopping to ask how far this dogma applied to our situation --I began advocating a program of economic organization within the Negro group, designed to prepare us for effective citizenship in the new industrial democracy which the world is slowly but surely approaching.

No sooner had I come to this conclusiong than I knew that I was out of touch with my organization and that the question of leaving it was only a matter of time. This was no easy decision; to give up the Crisis was like giving up a child; to leave the National Association was leaving the friends of a quarter of a century. But on the other hand staying meant silence and a repudiation of what I was thinking and planning. My cutting away, therefore, from this work did not conform to any of the ordinary patterns. A good many of my friends and most onlookers are still puzzled. They tried to classify this break of ties as a question of dismissal, of quarrel, or incompatability of age and youth or other classifications of the sort. It was none of these. I could have stayed with the National Association to the end of my working days or at least as long as it continued to exist. There was no greater friction within its organization than is inevitable to every human machine; but there was a clear difference of point of view. The Association in the matter of segregation emphasized a part of its program more than it emphasized before. We had recognized and used segregation in the matter of schools and colleges, in matter of religion, in the matter of the officers' camp; but we had fought its further spread, ~~then advocated as the next best thing~~. At this point I came advocating a new segregation in economic lines; in precisely the lines of business and industry whither the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was not prepared to go. It was not an absolute difference of principle, but it was a grave difference of further procedure, and therefore I gave up my connection with the Association saying: "In thirty-five years of public service my contribution to the settlement of the Negro problem has been mainly candid criticism based on a careful effort to know the facts. I have not always been right, but I have been sincere, and I am unwilling at this late day to be limited in the expression of my honest opinions in the way in which the Board proposes. . . . I am, therefore, resigning from my position as Director of Publications and Research, Editor of the Crisis, member of the Board of Directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and member of the Spingarn Medal Committee, - this resignation to take effect immediately." The Association was good enough to express in return appreciation of the work I had done while associated with it.

41-7-169

In the meantime I had already been turning to work which was in a sense a renewal of my early work and research from 1908-1918. Already as early as 1909 I had planned an Encyclopaedia of the Negro, had secured on my board of advisers Flinders Petrie, Sir Harry Johnston, Giusseppi Sergi, Dr. J. Deniker, William James and Franz Boaz; and on my proposed board of editors I had practically all the leading Negroes of the United States who were inclined toward research. But my change to New York and the work of starting the Crisis and then the World War put this quite out of my mind. The project was renewed by the Phelps Stokes Funds and today, backed by anthropologists all over the world, we are seeking a quarter of a million dollars to realize this dream. On the other hand was my interest in Reconstruction which had begun in 1910 was renewed. In that year I had read a paper on "Reconstruction and its Benefits" before the American Historical Association. At the suggestion of the president, Albert Bushnell Hart, and others like Dunning of Columbia this paper was published. Finally in 1932 I asked the Rosenwald Fund to give me funds by which I could finish it. They did and the book Black Reconstruction in America was published in 1935.

By that time I was teaching at Atlanta University. There again I was carrying out the thread of a long dream. Back as early as 1905 I had proposed to the several colored colleges of Atlanta the beginning of efforts toward uniting these various institutions into one university. We actually had a meeting in Rockefeller Hall but Miss Packard was definitely opposed.

She said crisply that if her head was going to be ~~taken~~ bitten off she would prefer to ~~bite~~ do it ~~off~~ herself. I turned then in 1909 to President Hope and we worked out an interchange of lectures. He wrote me February 16, 1910 "I hope and believe this is the beginning of new and larger things in an educational way among our Colored institutions." and later April 21, 1910 he added: "I feel a downright enthusiasm over the beginning that our two schools made this year and hope that, now that we have made a start and have some slight idea of what can be accomplished, the two schools may next year do larger things".

41-7-171

John Hope and I had long been intimate and sympathetic friends and in the earlier part of this same year he had written me quite frankly a letter which I can now without betraying confidence quote:

"My impression is that friendship - not acquaintanceship or perfunctory intercourse but real friendship - is based not so much on agreement in opinion and policies and methods but upon downright confidence, upon simple faith, no matter what the view or appearances. You and I for nearly ten years have been friends. . . . You may remember that in the early and bitterly misunderstood efforts of the Niagara Movement, I was the only college president that ventured to attend the Harper's Ferry meeting to take part in its deliberations. You may remember, too, that while some may have answered the call to that seemingly radical meeting in New York last May, I was the only president, colored or white, of our colleges that took part in the deliberations of that meeting. I cite this to show that I have dared to live up to my views even when they threw me in the midst of the most radical. Furthermore, every man on our faculty does the same and will as long as I am head of the institution. . . . I write to ask you whether you have me in your heart - not on your calling list or your mailing list but in your heart - on your list of friends."

Years before I had resigned from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Hope had offered me a position in Atlanta University whenever I might wish to come and when the actual consolidation of these schools took place, he repeated the offer at various times. So that finally when the break came I returned to the renewed Atlanta University to carry out my independent lines of thought and express them in such writing and teaching as I might wish. In 1936, I seemed confirmed in the wisdom of my way by the panorama of the world which swept before me, in London and Paris, Berlin and Vienna; Moscow and Mukden; Peiping and Shanghai, Kyoto and Tokyo; and heavenly Hawaii.

41-2-14-72

Finally I suppose upon a seventieth birthday one is presumed to have accumulated enough wisdom on the art of living to leave a wise word. There is not much that I feel moved to say; that little is this: I am especially glad of the divine gift of laughter; it has made the world human and lovable, despite all its pain and wrong. I am glad that the partial Puritanism of my upbringing, has never made me afraid of life. I have lived completely, testing every normal appetite, feasting on sunset, sea and hill, and enjoying wine, women and song. I have seen the face of beauty from the Grand Canyon to Capri, from the Alps to Lake Baikal; from the African bush to the Venus of Milo. Perhaps above all I am proud of a straightforward clearness of reason, in part a gift of the gods, but also to no little degree due to scientific training and inner discipline. By means of this I have met life face to face, I have loved a fight over and I have realized that the main fact of life is age and death.

This makes it the more incomprehensible for me to see persons quite panic stricken at the approach of their thirtieth birthday and prepared for and above all I have done the work which I wanted to do and not merely that which men wished to pay me for. This is, I ween, the essential difference between Heaven and Hell.

Finally,

U1-7-173

dissolution at forty. Few of my friends have celebrated their fiftieth birthdays, and near none their sixtieth. Of course one sees some reasons: the disappointment at meagre accomplishment which all to some extent must share; the haunting shadow of possible physical decline; the fear of death. I have been fortunate in having health and wise in keeping it. I have never shared what seems to me the essentially childish desire to live forever. Life has its pain and evil -- its bitter disappointments; but in healthful length of days there is triumphal fulness of experience and infinite joy in seeing the most interesting of continued stories unfold. Not eternity but time is for the living:

"Mein Vermaechtniss, mein Vermaechtniss,
"Wie herrlich weit und breit!
"Die Zeit ist mein Vermaechtniss--
"Mein Acker ist die Zeit!"

A PAGEANT IN SEVEN DECADES, 1868-1938

by

W. E. B. DuBois

I have been asked to review my life and I have chosen to essay this from the aspect of an historical pageant of human kind in which I have been a more or less active spectator, and whose end and meaning I have sought to see. It is not easy to do this; deeds, facts and fancies flow so ceaselessly and, with occasional whirlpools, so smoothly on, that one grasps and arranges them and views them with difficulty. Temptation to topical treatment is barred by the alchemy of time which not simply prolongs life but successively changes all perspective and interpretation. I find it better then to group my years in decades from childhood to today; seeking in each term of ten years the more or less elusive unity that may lie therein and checking somewhat my present memory by such documents and remains as may partially recreate the past.

The First Decade - Childhood from 1868-1878 - 0-10 years.- The year of my birth was the year that the freedmen of the South were enfranchised and for the first time as a mass took part in government. Conventions with black delegates voted new constitutions all over the South; and two groups of laborers - freed slaves and poor whites - dominated the former slave states. It was an extraordinary experiment in democracy. Thaddeus Stevens, the clearest headed leader of this attempt at industrial democracy, made his last speech impeaching Andrew Johnson on February 16 and on February 23 I was born.

I had ~~in these first years~~ a pleasant childhood. I can remember no poverty although my family was certainly poor. I represented the third generation from three small land holding brothers on my mother's side and the fourth generation from a West Indian planter on my father's. The outstanding thing in my earliest memory was the school. In a letter which I began to my grandmother in 1877, after conventional thanks for some present, I plunged right into the real subject "My school house stands a little way from Main Street." I remember it vividly; down a lane with a great choke-cherry tree on the right; on the left the wooden primary and grammar school and further on the right, the brick grammar and high school. I attended these schools regularly from five or six years of age until I was sixteen with hardly a day's absence.

The town and its surroundings were a boy's paradise: there were mountains to climb and rivers to wade and swim in; lakes to freeze and hills for coasting. There were orchards and caves and wide green fields; and all of it was the free property apparently of the children of the town. My family were pleasant and miscellaneous: the father was dead before I can remember; the mother brown and quietly persistent; the aunts and one uncle a bit consorious but not difficult to get on with; and then an endless vista of approving cousins. The town was shut in my its mountains and provincialism - cut off both from Boston and New York state.

My first glimpse of the outher and wider world was through Johnnie Morgan's news shop which occupied the front end of the post office. There newspapers and books were on display and I remember very early seeing pictures of "U. S." Grant and Tweed who was beginning his extraordinary career in New York state; and later of Hayes and the smooth and rather cruel face of Tilden. Of the great things happening in the United States at that time, we were touched only by the Panic of 1873; when my uncle came home from the little town east of us where he was the leading barber, he brought me, I remember, a silver dollar which was an extraordinary thing; Up to that time I had seen nothing but paper money. I do not remember hearing anything said about the Fifteenth Amendment which became law in 1870; but there were a few new colored people, "contrabands," who came to town. One family particularly I liked, they were so jolly and darkly handsome.

Charles Sumner died and the Freedmen's Bank closed when I was but six years old, and when I was eight there came the revolution of 1876. But I hardly ~~comprehended~~ knew of it. On the other hand, of the world overseas: the Franco-Prussian War; the ups and downs of D'israeli and Gladstone; the opening of the Suez Canal; --of these things my little village said nothing nor did they mention the fact that the Medji Emperors of Japan ascended to new and ever growing power in the year I was born.

The Second Decade - Youth, from 1878-1888 - 10-20 year of age.- The United States in the decades 1870-1890 was an extraordinary country. Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur and Grover Cleveland were presidents. James G. Blaine was an aspirant who barely missed the highest office, and the country was reckless and prosperous; squandering its seemingly endless resources; tying east and west with railways; exploiting iron and coal and oil and making fortunes for a new and ruthless caste of business men who were cashing in on the cost of Civil War. The results of this I could easily see in my town. I grew up in the midst of definite ideas as to wealth and poverty; work and charity. Wealth was the result of work and saving and the rich rightly inherited the earth. The poor, on the whole, were to be blamed. They were lazy or unfortunate and if unfortunate their fortunes could easily be mended ~~with care.~~ by thrift and saving.

There were ~~as great~~ some differences of wealth in Great Barrington; there were mills and mill-owners; there were German and Irish factory hands. Singularly enough I knew the mill owners and their children much better than

I knew the workers. I was no flunky for the rich. My people always had a certain ~~singular~~ independence. They were by occupation small farmers, servants, laborers, barbers and waiters. They earned their way. I early came to understand that to be "on the town", the recipient of public charity, was the depth not only of misfortune but of a certain guilt. I presume some of my folk sank to that but not to my knowledge. We earned our way. I have a little post card dating from 1883 in which "Miss Smith," September 19, writes, "We would like to have you come certainly next Saturday as you did last week to do some splitting for us." This was a matter of splitting up kindling for two maiden ladies and was one of my ways of beginning financial independence. I remember well my first regular work as a high school lad: I went early of mornings and filled one or two of the so-called "base-burning" stoves with coal in a little millinery shop. I received twenty-five cents a week which represented the beginning of affluence. From then on, all through my high school course I worked after school and on Saturdays, mowing lawns, doing errands, and for a few months through the good will of Johnnie Morgan, I rose to be local correspondent of the Springfield Republican. For some time, too, I sent weekly letters to the New York Age, and before the A and P stores dealt in groceries and simply were selling tea I was one of their local agents. Thus in all sorts of little ways I managed to earn some money and never asked nor thought of gifts save in one case: my school principal suggested, quite as a matter of fact, that I ought to take the college preparatory course in High School which involved Latin and Greek. This meant a considerable expenditure for books but the wife of one of the mill owners, or rather I ought to describe her as the mother of one of my playmates, offered to furnish all the necessary high school books, which became my one charity.

The other class of rich folk with whom I came in contact were summer boarders who made yearly incursions from New York. I think I was most impressed by their clothes. Outside of that there was little reason so far as I could see to envy them. The children were not very strong and rather too well-dressed to have a good time playing. There were few slum areas in my town and almost no crime. The one ~~excess~~ indulgence was liquor drunkenness and there my mother quietly took a firm stand. I was never to enter a saloon. I never did. ~~It~~ Alcohol was ~~perhaps~~ almost the one reaction that this pleasant but rather drab little town had against the monotony of life, and rich and poor got drunk more or less regularly. I have seen ~~one of the~~ a mill owners staggering; and my own dignified ~~de~~ uncle used to come home now and then walking ~~exceedingly~~ very straight.

In one respect my training in this town has had rather momentous results. It was not good form in New England or in Great Barrington to express yourself volubly, to give way to ~~excitement~~ emotion; - people held themselves in. They were sparing even of their greetings. There was only on the street a curt "Good Morning" to those whom you know and no greetings at all for others. The result was that, because of this and probably from growing rare consciousness, I was early thrown in upon myself. I found it difficult and even unnecessary to approach other people and by that same token my own inner life grew perhaps the ~~more~~ richer. Later But the habit of repression often returned to plague me in after years for so early a habit could not easily be unlearned.

I entered the high school at the age of twelve and was graduated at the age of sixteen in 1884. I had during that time ~~some~~ my first chance to travel and to get little glimpses of the world. I was sent, for instance, by my mother across the state to see my grandmother and grandfather in New Bedford. I wrote back about this in 1883, "The house is white with green blinds. The

yard is full of flowers. Grandma is about my color and taller than I thought. I like her very much. Grandpa is short and rather thick set. I like him better than I thought I would. He says very little but speaks civilly when I say anything to him. Grandma says by and by he will talk more."

When I graduated from the high school we all had ~~orations~~ speeches and mine was on Wendell Phillips. He had died in February and I spoke in June, fired by new and unusual knowledge of his sort of man. Then there came in my life the first great change. My mother died and it was decided that I was too young to go to college. I suspect that money matters had something to do with it. At any rate instead of being able to go to Harvard, as I had fondly hoped, in the fall of 1884 ~~in the fall of 1884~~ I was given a job and promised that the next fall I should begin my college work.

The job brought me in curious touch with the world. There was a great uncle of mine, Tom Burghardt, whose tombstone I had seen often in the village graveyard. My family used to say in undertones that the money of Tom Burghardt helped to build the Pacific Railway and that it came in this wise: Nearly all his life Tom Burghardt was a servant in the Kellogg family, only the Kelloggs forgot to pay him but did give him a handsome burial. Then Mark Hopkins married into the family, presumably my uncle's unpaid wage, with other assets, and used ~~and~~ made millions in railways. His widow came back to Great Barrington and planned a mansion out of the beautiful blue granite which formed our hills. A host of workmen, masons, stonecutters, and carpenters were assembled and in the summer of 1884 I was made timekeeper for the contractors receiving the fabulous wage of a dollar ~~=~~ each day.

It was a most interesting experience and had bits of romance. There was the English architect who appeared on the scene and the colored steward who committed suicide when the architect married the widow; then came the death of the widow and the passing of the Hopkin's millions into foreign hands. In the meantime the fabrication and growth of this marvelous palace proceeded, beautiful beyond anything that Great Barrington had seen; and always I could sit and watch it grow and handle delegated powers in dismissing workmen and rewarding them.

Finally in the fall of 1885 there came a proposal which made all my cousins and aunts raise their eyebrows. I was to have a scholarship to go South to Fisk University. The South had an unholy name in my village and the family was not at all sure that I ought to go. Only one black Burghardt had ever gone South since a Union soldier. But, ~~of course,~~ I never hesitated ~~but~~ I started out and went into Tennessee at the age of seventeen to become a sophomore at Fisk University. It was to me an extraordinary experience. I was thrilled to be for the first time among so many people of my own color or rather of such various and such extraordinary colors, which I had not seen before, but who seemed close bound to me by new and exciting ties. I had never seen such beautiful girls in my life or men who gave themselves such marked airs.

The three years here were years of growth and strength and expanding ambition. I learned new things about the world. I came in contact for the first time with a sort of violence that I had never realized in New England. I remember going down and looking wide-eyed at the door of a public building filled with buckshot where the white editor of the leading daily paper had been publicly murdered the day before. I was astonished to find many of my fellow students carrying firearms and to hear their stories of adventure. I suddenly determined that I was going out to teach during the summer vacations. It was not necessary. My scholarship would have supported me but it was adventure. I walked ~~out~~ into east Tennessee ten or more miles a day until at last in a little valley I found a place where they had had a Negro public school only once since the Civil War and there for two successive terms ~~during the summer~~ summer I taught at $28 and $30 a month; paid immediately in promises and in cash three or four months later.

I began my writing and public speaking at Fisk. I wrote an article which the Century Magazine said, "We shall be glad to print 'The New Negro' if we may take our time and we are afraid we shall have to take a great deal." It did, for it hasn't been printed yet. For three years I was on the editorial staff of the Fisk Herald; as editor-in-chief the last year; contributing essays and one novel. I became a considerable orator and for a long time the older student of Fisk took deep joy in remembering the debate where in the very midst of impassioned periods I forgot my lines. The persistence, however, which I had learned in New England stood me now in good stead. The interlude at Fisk did not turn me from it. When I heard that Harvard was offering scholarships in various parts of the country I immediately wrote and to the astonishment of teachers and fellow students, not to mention myself, received Price Greenleaf aid of $300. I was graduated from Fisk in 1888 and took as my subject Bismarck. It showed my already growing interest in the wider world. I knew of the great jubilee of Queen Victoria, of the aftermath of the Franco-Prussian War and the triumph of the Madhi in Khartoum. I had followed the fortunes of Gladstone and Salisbury and was filled with enthusiasm at the rise of the new German empire under Bismarck. So I talked of Bismarck and then turned back to the North. I was thinking, too, during those days of political developments and have a speech which I delivered in 1887 which has a certain present validity: Today the Democratic and Republican parties are virtually without principles. In spite of the vast number of vitally important issues before the country there is not one in regard to which they are not on the fence! The elections are disgraceful scrambles for office, and the most unblushing bribery is carried on at the polls. This, by our votes, we are aiding and abetting. Having come forth from a personal slavery, we have voluntarily thrown ourselves into political serfdom. Instead of asking a man his conviction on the Blaine Bill, the Tariff, Lynch Law, or Civil Rights, you ask his party, and if he's got Republican pasted across his forehead, the legal representatives of seven millions of human beings will vote for him, be he Tom, Dick, or the Devil.

Third Decade - Education, from 1888-1898 - 20-30 years of age.- This decade covered the years of my education at Harvard and at Berlin and the beginning of my teaching career. The members of the Fisk Glee Club went to Lake Minnetonka, a resort in Minnesota, for the summer of 1888 with the idea of working in the dining room and giving concerts. I was to act as their business manager. During college I had developed rather as the executive and planner, the natural secretary of affairs rather than the ornamental president and chairman. The only difficulty about the Minnesota excursion was that I had never worked in a hotel in my life; I did not know how wait on table and therefore became one of the bus boys. It was so unusual a pageant to watch the dining room that I made no tips and for a long time had difficulty in getting enough to eat, not realizing that servants in great hotels are not systematically fed. But after the season I went on ahead and succeeded in making a respectable number of concerts for the students who followed me down all the way to Chicago; while I went on to Harvard to enter the junior class in the fall of 1888.

The Harvard of 1888 was an extraordinary aggregation of great men. Not often if ever since that day have so many distinguished teachers been together in one place and at one time. There was William James, the psychologist; Palmer in ethics; Royce and Santayanya in philosophy; Shaler in Geology and Hart in history. The president was the cold, precise but exceedingly efficient Charles William Eliot and there were a doozen lesser lights. By extraordinary good fortune I was thrown into contact with most of these men. I was repeatedly a guest in the house of William James; of all teachers, he was my closest friend. I was a member of the philosophical club; I talked often with Royce and Shaler; I sat alone in an upper room and read Kant's Critique with Santayana; I became one of Hart's favorite pupils and was afterwards guided by him through my graduate course and started on my work in Germany. It was an extraordinary opportunity for a young man and I think I realized it. I evolved habits of work rather different from those of most of the other students. I burned no midnight oil. I did my studying in the daytime and had my day planned out almost to the minute. I spent a great deal of time in the library and did my assignments with persistent thoroughness and with a rather interesting pre-vision of the kind of work I wanted to do later. I have before me a theme which I wrote October 3, 1890, for Barrett Wendell, the great pundit of Harvard English. I said: "Spurred by my circumstances I have always been given to systematically planning my future, not indeed without many mistakes and frequent alterations, but always with what I now conceive to have been a strangely early and deep appreciation of the fact that to live is a serious thing. I determined while in the high school to go to college - partly because other men went, partly because I foresaw that such discipline would best fit me for life. I believe foolishly perhaps but sincerely that I have something to say to the world, and I have taken English 12, in order to say it well." Barrett Wendell rather liked that last sentence, and read it to the class.

I tried to take culture out into the colored community of Boston; I visited, joined clubs, lectured, and once actually gave the Birds of Aristophanes in a colored church on Thanksgiving night. The matter of meeting my college expenses presented some difficulties. I had scholarships for $300 for both college years but that was not enough. One year after careful calculation I found that I needed $50 more and noted with interest that this was exactly the stipend of the Boylston Prize in oratory. I had to have one of the prizes in order to make ends meet for the year and I got it. Then with a colored classmate, Clement Morgan, who was also a Boylston prize-man I made a tour of the summer resorts of New England. We gave readings in hotels, parlors and churches and did in this way much toward making our expenses. In my senior year the death of my last near relative, my grandfather, left me a fortune of $400. In 1890, I took my bachelor's degree from Harvard and was one of the six commencement speakers, taking as my subject Jefferson Davis. On the platform of Sanders Theatre were President Eliot, the governor of Massachusetts and the Bishop of New York. I am glad that the New York Nation could say July 3, 1890, that I handled the theme "with absolute good taste, great moderation, and almost contemptuous fairness."

I was graduated just at the beginning of the term of President Harrison when the trusts were dominating industry and the McKinley tariff making that domination easier. The understanding between the industrial North and the new South was being perfected and in 1890 a series of disfranchising laws were passed by the Southern States destined in the next six years to make voting by Southern Negroes practically impossible. Already I had received more education than most young white men, having been continuously in school from the age of six to the age of twenty-two. But I did not yet feel prepared. I know that to cope with the new and extraordinary situation then building in the United States I needed to go further and that as a matter of fact I had just well begun in my training and in my knowledge of social conditions. On the other hand, I was quite penniless with no resources in wealth or friends. I applied for a fellowship in the graduate school. If I had not gotten it I should have had to go to work; but I was appointed Henry Bramfield Roger's fellow for a year and later the appointment was renewed so that from 1890-1892 I was a fellow in Harvard University studying in history and what would have been social science if Harvard had then recognized such a field.

I worked on my thesis, "The Suppression of the Slave Trade," taking my master's degree in 1891 and hoping to get my doctor's degree in another two years. Then came one of those tricks of fortune which seems partly due to chance but in this case undoubtedly due to a good deal of stubborn persistence. In 1882 the Slater Fund for the education of Negroes had been established and the board was in 1897 headed by ex-President Rutherford B. Hayes. President Hayes at John Hopkins University talked frankly in 1890 about the plans of the fund. He said among other things that they had wanted to find some young colored men to whom they could give a chance for graduate training but they had only been able to find "orators."

The statement was brought to my attention at a card party one evening and it not only made me good and mad but also set me thinking. I wrote President Hayes. I received a pleasant reply saying that they did not have any present plans for such scholarships. That really aroused me. I proceeded to get letters from every person I know in the Harvard Yard and places outside and literally deluged the unfortunate chairman of the Slater Fund. He wrote again and said that he was sorry but the plan had been given up;

that they might otherwise have given me some attention.

It has been my experience that most of my small successes have been due to steps that I have taken after all hope seemed was lost. I sat down and proceeded to write Mr. Hayes a letter that could be described as nothing less than impudent. I extended my plans and added to my written references. I intimated plainly that somebody was lying. President Hayes was undoubtedly disturbed aroused and almost apologized to me, reiterating his good faith and promising to take up the matter the next year with the board. Whereupon promptly the next year I proceeded to write the board: "At the close of the last academic year at Harvard, I received the degree of master of arts, and was reappointed to my followship for the year 1891-92. I have spent most of the year in the preparation of my doctor's thesis on the suppression of the slave trade in America. I prepared a preliminary paper on this subject and read it before the American Historical Association at its annual meeting at Washington during the Christmas holidays. The paper will shortly be published in their proceedings and a preliminary report of it may be seen in the Independent of January 7, 1892, pp. 10, 11; also in Congregationalist of about the same date. The first draft of the larger thesis was completed 28 March and it will be formally finished May 1, and, I hope, eventually published; besides this I have worked on a number of general studies. Properly to finish my education, a careful training in an European university for at least a year is in my mind and the minds of my professors, absolutely indispensable. I therefore desire, respectfully to lay these suggestions before you: First, that the board grant me aid to study at least a year abroad under the direction of the graduate department of Harvard or other reputable auspices. Second, if this be not practicable, that the board loan a sufficient sum for this purpose."

The Trustees of the Slater Fund granted my request and gave me $750, half gift and half loan, to study in Europe. I shall never forget my interview with ex-President Hayes in the old Astor House in New York, nor the extravagant shirt I immediately bought in celebration.

In the summer I sailed for Europe, saw Holland and the Rhine and lived in a fine German family in Eisenach with a group of gay young folk who made me realize that white folk were human.

Then In the fall I went up to Berlin. I wrote in my diary: "The fact is that after some years spent in American universities, I, God, and other folk have rendered it possible for me to study here. Whereof I am glad. Now it has chanced that to me Europe has ever been surrounded with a certain veil of mystery and fancy; a trimming of history and fairy tales, of culture and crowns, had always made it a bit difficult for me to realize the existence of a hard dry sod underneath it all. I take it that we Americans are very fortunate in having a great sea between us and this other world."

30-3-14

and Registered in the University, ~~the story which I set down at the time is perhaps worth repeating.~~ In groups of one hundred we were ushered into a room. "It was a large room, with high ceiling, and a row of four windows on one side in the deep recesses of which stood busts of Berlin's famous professors. The centre of the room was occupied by chairs, in which the students seated themselves; at the upper end was a long table about which perhaps a dozen officials were grouped. Near the left end was the present year's rector magnificus, the widely famous Rudolf Virchow, doctor of medicine, laws and philosophy, city councillor and member of the Reichstag. He is a meek and calm looking little man, white haired and white-bearded, with a kindly face and a pleasant voice. At smaller tables ranged before the windows, were the deans of the various faculties. The method of procedure was thoroughly, and, I think I may say, painfully, German. First the chief secretary at the side of the magnificent rector was invested with the pile of gymnasium diplomas and passports we had surrendered in the ante-room. Then he slowly read out the names, and as a student heard his name he disentangled himself and approached the table. Recognizing with some difficulty my Germanicized name I presented myself with trepidation at the bar. The stiff secretary

(it's quite the thing to be stiff in new Germany) with my help more clearly deciphered my name, ascertained under which faculty I wished to study, firmly declined to examine any of my sheepskins, and passed me over to the rector; Rector Virchow smiled benignantly, made some remark as to my faculty, and after filling out the blanks with some remarkably poor writing, presented me with a large 24 by 18 inch sheet of paper: this stated that a certain Guilelmus, (two i's,) had in the general goodness of his heart endowed the present Mr. Virchow with various powers; among these was that of making me (who was described with some infelicity of phrase as a "most ornamented young man") a legalized and licensed student of the University of Berlin."

~~Afterwards I was inscribed in the philosophical faculty and finally shook hands with the great Virchow.~~ I had again at Berlin as at Harvard unusual opportunity. Although a foreigner I was admitted my first semester to two semesters under Schmoller and Wagner both of them the most distinguished men in their line; and I received eventually from both of them pleasant testimony of my work. My work was in economics, history and sociology. I sat under the voice of the fire-casting Von Treitschke and heard him assert the general inferiority of mulattoes and mixed races; I wrote on American agriculture for Schmoller and discussed social conditions in Europe with teachers and students. But more especially I travelled; living cheaply I saved good sums for the numerous vacations. I went to the Hansa cities; I made the celebrated Hartzreise up to the Brocken in the spring. My Christmas vacation I spent in making a trip through south Germany along with a German-American and an Englishman. We visited Weimar, Frankfort, Heidelberg and Mannheim. During Christmas and New Years we stopped in a little German dorf in the Rheinfalz where I had an excellent opportunity of studying the peasant life closely and comparing it with country life in the South. We visited perhaps twenty different families, talked, ate and drank with them; listened to their gossip and history, attended their assemblies, etc. We then went to Strassberg, Stuttgart, Ulm, München, Nürnburg, Prague and Dresden. In those places we stayed from one to five days, following our Baedeker closely, and paying much attention to the Munchner and Dresden art galleries. The ~~Christmas~~ trip cost about $80." Later I went down to Italy, to Genoa, Rome and Naples and over to Venice and Vienna and Budapest and finally up to Krakau where the father of a fellow student was the head of the Polish library and where I learned of the race problems of the Poles and then came by Breslau back to Berlin.

36-3-16

I have a curious document of a birthday which came in Berlin in 1893. "Today I am a quarter of a century old. It seems so strange - my boyhood and youth are but memories now and I am a full grown man. I wonder what the next quarter of a century will bring me - if it will be as rich in work and happiness as the past - as awfully full of fulfilled plans . . . . These twenty-five years of mine have been rich in personal history. I remember school days, the brook by Sumner's house, the attic rooms where we lived, the little stove that used to fall down and the window I proudly called a bay window. I remember little sorrows of life when I found no companions to play with and busied myself in making great plans for a toy with which I could play alone. I remember the gate where I looked into the great town - wonderful world to me then."

I returned to the United States by way of Paris where I stayed as long as possible and then having reduced myself almost to the last cent took passage to the United States in the steerage, quite penniless. It was by no means a pleasant trip but perhaps it was a good introduction to the new life

because now at last at twenty-six years of age and after twenty years of study I was coming home to look for a job and to begin work. I need not dwell on the difficulties of landing that job. It was a disturbed world in which I landed; 1892 saw the high tide of lynching in the United States; 235 untried Negroes being slaughtered in that one year. Cleveland had entered his second term in 1893 and the Chicago Exposition had taken place. The Dreyfus case had opened in France with his conviction and imprisonment and he was destined for twelve years to suffer martyrdom. The war between China and Japan broke out the year of my return and Nicholas II was ruling in Russia. I wrote everywhere offering my services and at last received three offers for work ~~eventually~~. On August 17, the chair of Latin and Greek at Wilberforce University, Ohio, with a salary of $800 was offered which I immediately accepted with gratitude. A little later there came an offer of a position at Lincoln Institute in Missouri at $1050 but I stuck to my first promise; and finally August 25 I received this telegram from Tuskegee, "Can give you mathematics if terms suit. Will you accept. Booker T. Washington." It would be interesting to speculate just what would have happened if I had accepted the last offer instead of the first.

Wilberforce was a small denominational colloged married to a state normal school. The church was too poor to run the college, the State did not want the normal school, and there were consequently enormous difficulties in both church and state politics. Into this situation I landed with the cane and gloves of my German student days; with my rather inflated ideas of what an university ought to be and with a terrible plainness of speech that was continually getting me into difficulty; when, for instance, very suddenly and without warning the student leader of a prayer meeting announced that

Professor DuBois would lead us in prayer. I simply answered, "No, he won't," and as a result nearly lost my job. It took a good deal of explaining to the board of bishops why a professor in Wilberforce should not be able anytime to lead in extemporaneous prayer. I was really saved by the fact that I was so willing to do endless work when the work seemed to me worth doing. My program for a day at Wilberforce looked almost as long as a week's program today. I taught Latin, Greek, German and English and wanted to add sociology to it but the college demurred refused. I had charge of the most unpleasant of the duties of discipline and did outside work in study and investigation; I met many new friends: First of all, my wife; then my good friend Charles Young, not long graduated from West Point; Charles Burroughs was a student in my classes; Paul Lawrence Dunbar who came over from Dayton to read to us. I had known his work but was astonished to find that he was a Negro.

We younger teachers had a hard team fight at Wilberforce and soon saw that we were licked. It was impossible for me especially to stay for I had talked too plainly and acted too independently. When, therefore, a temporary appointment came from the University of Pennsylvania it was a message from heaven. I was offered work for one year as "assistant instructor" for $600. I accepted forthwith and in addition to that showed my faith in life by getting married. My wife was one of the Wilberforce students and lived in Iowa where the marriage took place in the fateful year 1896. In that year the great battle of Adua occurred when Abyssinia overthrew Italy and when England suddenly seeing two black nations in ascendency threw her army back into the Sudan and recaptured ~~after thirteen years~~ Khartoum. The next year year when my ~~little boy~~ son was born there burst in the United States the free silver controversy of Bryan and McKinley and it was that year that President Dunstead of Atlanta University asked me to come to Atlanta and take charge of the work in sociology and of the new conferences on the Negro problem which the University was inaugurating.

Fourth Decade - Research and Propaganda - 1898-1908 - 30-40 years of age.- This fourth decade was the real beginning of my life work. My education was finished and I had travelled in the world. The two years at Wilberforce being a sort of uneasy prelude, and I began with my advent into the University of Pennsylvania a planned career which had an unusual measure of success and yet was in the end pushed partly aside by forces which, if not beyond my control, were certainly of tremendous weight. My vision was in the beginning clear. The Negro problem called for systematic investigation and intelligence. The world was thinking wrong about races because it did not know. The ultimate evil was ignorance and its child, stupidity. The cure for it was Knowledge based on Study. The opportunity opened at the University of Pennsylvania was exactly what I wanted. I had tried to teach social science at Wilberforce outside my overloaded program but they did not want it. At the University of Pennsylvania I ignore the pitiful stipend. It made no difference to me that I was put down as an "assistant instructor" and even at that my name never actually got into the catalogue; it goes without saying that I did no instructing and rather to my dismay I found as much jealously and politics in this great white institution as in the smaller black one. But here at least I had a clear cut job. The city of Philadelphia at that time had a social theory, and the theory was that this great, rich and famous municipality, founded by godly Quakers, was going to the dogs because of the crime and venality of its Negro citizens. These Negroes lived largly centered in a slum at the lower end of the seventh ward. Philadelphia wanted to prove

all this by figures and I was the man they picked to do it. Of this thought and Plan I neither knew nor cared, I was simply asked to study, know and tell. I saw here a chance to study an historic group of black folk and to show exactly what their place was in the community. I did the work despite extraordinary difficulties both within and without the group. The Negroes resented being studied at all and especially by a colored stranger; the whites endured the study as a gesture toward an answer they already knew. I made a study of the Philadelphia Negro so thorough that it has withstood the criticism for forty years. It was as complete a scientific answer as could have been given under the limitations of time and money; it showed the Negro group as a symptom and not a cause; as a striving, palpitating human group and not an inert, sick body of crime; it traced, analized, charted and counted. It left few untouched queries. At the end of that study I announced with a certain pride my general plan of studying the Negro problem and published papers on the matter in the Annals of the American Academy in 1898.

With this program clearly in mind I came to Atlanta University. There was at the last moment a curious little hitch based on that old matter of extemporaneous public prayer. Dr. Dunstead and I compromised on the Episcopal prayer book and afterward I added certain prayers of my own. I am not sure that they reached heaven but they certainly reached my audience. Without thought or consultation I rather preemptorily changed the plans of the first two Atlanta Conferences. They had been conceived as conferences on city problems contrasting with the increasingly popular conferences on rural problems held at Tuskegee. But I was not thinking of more conferences. I was thinking of a comprehensive plan for studying a human group and if I could have carried it out as completely as I conceived it, the American Negro would have contributed to the development of social science in this country an unforgettable body of work. Social scientists were at that time thinking in terms of theory and of vast and tenuous laws; while I had for study a concrete group of living beings set off by themselves and capable of almost laboratory experiment. I laid down a program of a hundred years, in which taking annually aspect after aspect of the group life of Negroes for a decade, we could repeat and broaden and concentrate our attention; sharpen our tools of investigation and improve our methods, so that we would accumulate an increasing living body of scientifically ascertained fact to make the so-called Negro problems and through them the problems of all social living clearer and surer and more definite.

Something of this was accomplished. For thirteen years we poured forth a series of studies limited, incomplete, only partially conclusive, and yet so much better done than any other attempt at such work anywhere else in the world that they gained attention in America, Europe, Asia and Africa. Nevertheless, at the very time when they were beginning to achieve widening success there cut across this plan of science a red ray of emotion which could not be ignored.

I remember when it first, as it were, pulled me off my feet.

A poor Negro in central Georgia, Sam Hose, had killed his landlord in a wage dispute. He could not be found for days; then at last a new cry was raised that he had raped the landlord's wife. It was obviously and clearly a trumped-up charge to arouse the worst passions of the countryside and the mob roared. I wrote out a careful and reasoned statement concerning the evident facts and started down to the Constitution carrying in my pocket a letter of introduction which I had to Joel Chandler Harris. I did not get

there. On the way the news met me. Sam Hose had been lynched and they said that his knuckles were on exhibition at a grocery store on Mitchell Street. I turned back to the University. I suddenly saw that complete scientific detachment in the midst of such a South was impossible. Nevertheless, I tried to keep my mounting indignation without bounds. I went on with my studies but together with other black Georgians, W. J. White, John Hope, H. R. Butler and others, I sent out memorials and petitions and protests. One in 1899 said, "Race antagonism and hatred have gone too far in this State; let us stop here; let us insist that they go no further; let us countenance no measure or movement calculated to increase that deep and terrible sense of wrong under which so many today labor. May the Twentieth century of the Prince of Peace dawn upon an era of generous sympathy and forbearance between these two great races in Georgia, and not upon a season of added injustice and antipathy." Another, a year or so later, said, "'From each according to his ability - to each according to his needs' is the ideal of modern society, and in the light of this dictum, there is not a boy in Georgia today so poor or so black as not to deserve from the State free common school training." And a third which came out of a great Macon mass meeting: "Popular government in the United States is not a failure, but it is having in these days a severe and critical trial. Its success in the future depends upon the ability of great classes of men to rise above prejudice and do strict justice to their followmen. And today strict justice in Georgia demands free common school training for every single child of the State."

With all this I stuck to my scientific work. I helped prepare in 1900 a sociological exposition of the American Negro ~~an exhibit~~ for the Paris Exposition which gained a grand prize for the exhibit and a gold medal for myself. I attended at that time a first Pan-African

Conference in London with Bishop Walters where I met the Colensos and Samuel Coleridge Taylor. I was elected a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in 1900 and made a fellow in 1904. I not only published the conference reports yearly but wrote magazine articles in the World's Work, and in the Atlantic Monthly where I ~~had as~~ was fellow contributor with Woodrow Wilson. I testified before Congressional Commissions in Washington and appeared on the lecture platform with Walter Page, afterwards war ambassador to England. I had wide correspondence with men of prominence in America and Europe: Lyman Abbott of the Outlook; E. D. Morel, the English expert on Africa; Max Weber of Heidelberg; Professor Wilcox of Cornell; Bliss Perry of the Atlantic Monthly; Horace Traubel, the great protagonist for Walt Whitman; Charles Eliot Norton and Talcott Williams. I began to be regarded by some as having definite information on the Negro to which they might listen with profit.

At the same time, ~~however,~~ there was cause for increasing apprehension. First of all, and for me most astonishing, we could not get money for our work in the Atlanta Conferences and our studies of the Negro problem. My theory had been that just as soon as the world saw the value of our studies the raising of funds would be the easiest thing in the world. I received for the whole thirteen years that I was then at Atlanta University an annual salary of only $1,200. The whole cost of the conference and studies never exceeded $5,000 a year and usually it was considerably less. The work was done at first in a spare bedroom of my apartment and finally in the attic of Stone Hall where adequate but rather inaccessible rooms were provided. I had no skilled assistants and yet my dream was still splendid. If in a properly equipped institution I could have gathered four or five well equipped young students, some tabulating machines and a small corps of traveling investigators we could at a cost of $10,000 to $25,000 a year have absolutely reconstituted the bases of fact and argument concerning the American Negro. But we could not get $5,000 even; and then to make the situation worse there came the controversy with Booker T. Washington which turned from me and from Atlanta University the sympathy of most men who had money to give.

It was no controversy of my seeking; quite the contrary. I was in my imagination a scientist and neither a leader nor an agitator; I had nothing but the greatest admiration for Mr. Washington and Tuskegee and I had applied in 1894 at both Tuskegee and Hampton for work; if the telegram from Tuskegee had reached me before the Wilberforce bid I should doubtless have gone there. Certainly I knew no less about Mathematics than I did about Latin and Greek. But no sooner was my work at Atlanta University under way than pressure began to be placed upon me to leave here and go to Tuskegee. There again I was not adverse in principle to Tuskegee, except that I had started a job and wanted to continue it; surely if my work was worth support it was worth support at Atlanta University as much if not more than elsewhere. I remember that a letter came from Wallace Buttrick late in 1902 asking that I attend a private conference in New York with Felix Adler and William H. Baldwin, Jr., George Foster Peabody and Robert Ogden. The object of the conference was ostensibly the condition of the Negro in New York City. I went to the conference and I did not like it. Most of the more distinguished persons were not present. The conference itself amounted to little, but I was whisked over to William H. Baldwin's Long Island home and there what seemed to me to be the real object of my coming was disclosed. Mr. Baldwin was at that time slated to be president of the Pennsylvania Railway; he was the rising industrial leader of America; also he was a prime mover of the Tuskegee board of trustees. Both he and his wife insisted that my place was at Tuskegee; that

Tuskegee needed the kind of development that I had been trained to give. I could not help being impressed and I promised to think the matter over. Later I had two personal interviews with Mr. Washington. He encouraged me to talk but he said very little himself. I could get no clear understanding of just what I was going to do at Tuskegee if I went. I was given to understand that the salary and accomodations would be satisfactory. Later in the year I went to Bar Harbor for a series of speeches in behalf of Atlanta University and while there met Jacob Schiff, the Scheffelins and Morriam of Webster's dictionary. I had dinner with the Scheffelins and their mother the daughter of John Jay and again was urged to go to Tuskegee.

But by that time my mind was made up. I was growing increasingly uncomfortable under Mr. Washington's various statement of his program; his depreciation of the value of the vote; his evident dislike of Negro colleges and his general attitude which seemed to place the onus of blame for the race problems upon the Negro himself rather than upon the whites. I attended several conferences at Hampton and found myself consenting by silence to a systematic attack on Negro colleges. I determined on a decisive step. I had been asked sometime before by A. C. McClurg and Company of Chicago if I did not have material for a book and I suggested a social study which should be perhaps a summing up of the work of the Atlanta Conferences or at any rate a broad scientific treatise which required some time. They asked, however, if I did not have some essays that they might put together and issue immediately and they instanced the articles in the Atlantic Monthly and other places. I demurred because essays usually fall so flat. Nevertheless, I got together a series of my fugitive pieces and added a frank evaluation of Booker T. Washington and sent them on. The Souls of Black Folk was published in 1903 and in 1938 it is still selling. ~~It~~ settled definitely any further question of my going to Tuskegee, but it also aroused apprehension. Various friends of the Negro desired to keep Negro thought from splitting into a pro-Washington and an anti-Washington camp. After all, Mr. Washington had accomplished much and a new basis of understanding on the Negro seemed to most white people in sight. Every effort must be made to preserve unity of effort. I was asked in 1903 to join Mr. Washington and his friends in a conference to be held in New York to talk of a common program. I assented and as I wrote to Kelly Miller: "I think this will be a chance for a heart to heart talk with Mr. Washington. I propose to stand on the following platform:

1. Full political rights on the same terms as other Americans.
2. Higher education of selected Negro youth.
3. Industrial education for the masses.
4. Common school training for every Negro child.
5. A stoppage to the campaign of self-depreciation.
6. A careful study of the real condition of the Negro.
7. A national Negro periodical.
8. A thorough and efficient federation of Negro societies and activities.
9. The raising of a defense fund.
10. A judicious fight in the courts for civil rights.

"Finally, the general watch word must be, not to put further dependence on the help of the whites but to organize for self help, encouraging "manliness without defiance, conciliation without servility."

The matter dragged on with some argument as to who should be invited. The general invitation to the conference went out in October, 1903, when Mr. Washington sent out the following circular letter: "You will perhaps recall that about the middle of last February I addressed you a letter concerning a private conference to be attended by about fifteen or eighteen of our most prominent men, representing various sections of the country and various race interests, for the purpose of considering quietly all the weighty matters that now confront us as a race. The meeting was not called at the time hoped for in my last correspondence for the reason that there was delay and some disappointment in providing funds for the expenses of the meeting. That feature has now been provided for in a way that will not make those who attend the conference feel obligated to any individual or organization and leave them free for open and frank discussion.

"I very much hope that you can now see your way clear to attend such a conference in New York City to be held, if possible, on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of January, 1904."

The conference took place in Carnegie Hall, New York, ~~January 6, 7, 8, 1904~~. There was some plain speaking but it was overborne by almost fulsome praise of Mr. Washington from the lips of various invited guests like Andrew Carnegie and Lyman Abbott. It ended in the appointment of a committee of three, of which I was one, who were to select a sort of racial steering committee called the Committee of Twelve. Nothing really came ~~from~~ of this. The two other members of the committee organized it in my absence, placed the full power in the hands of Mr. Washington who was to carry on the work with funds whose source I did not know. I resigned forthwith and was pretty roundly condemned for my lack of "cooperation", but I was indignant at what seemed to me an effort to buy agreement and smother dissent under a dictatorship.

Things now began to move swiftly. In Boston a new colored weekly newspaper, the Boston Guardian was organized by two young radicals: Monroe Trotter and George Forbes. They were bitter in their attacks upon Mr. Washington and I got myself in hot water by publishing a statement in the Guardian concerning the venality of certain Negro papers whom I charged had sold out and were viciously attacking every Negro who did not agree with Mr. Washington. It was a charge which I could not support by concrete facts but it was true in the sense that there had been organized at Tuskegee a literary bureau to emphasize Mr. Washington's ideas in the Negro press and to stop the widespread criticism against him. The methods used are common today: distribution of advertising; sending out of special correspondence and distributing other favors; but it seemed to me then that this kind of propaganda was monstrous and dishonest and I resented it. On the other hand, the public expression of this resentment caused many people to think that I was wild and unfair in my statements and beyond that it undoubtedly made it increasingly difficult for Dr. Bumstead to raise funds for Atlanta University. In the fall of 1904 the printing of our conference report was postponed by the trustees until special funds could be secured. I did not at the time see the handwriting on the wall. I did not realize how strong the forces were back of Tuskegee and how they might interfere with my plan of scientific study of the Negro.

My first thought was in order to state our case and honest criticism we needed a journal. I had already helped an A. U. graduate to establish a printing press in Memphis. Out of this might arise a vehicle for both opinion and fact which would help me carry on my scientific work and at the same time be a forum of reform less radical than the Guardian and more rational than the rank and file of Negro papers now so largely arrayed with Tuskegee. I wrote to Jacob Schiff reminding him of having met him in Bar Harbor in 1903. "I want to lay before you a plan which I have and ask you if it is of sufficient interest to you for you to be willing to hear more of it and possibly to assist in its realization. The Negro race in America is today in a critical condition. Only united concerted effort will save us from being crushed. This union must come as a matter of education and long continued effort. To this end there is needed a high class journal to circulate among the intelligent Negroes, tell them of the deeds of themselves and their neighbors, interpret the news of the world to them and inspire them toward definite ideals. Now we have many small weekly papers and one or two monthlies and none of them fill the great need I have outlined. I want to establish therefore for the nine million American Negroes and eventually for the whole Negro world a monthly journal."

Mr. Schiff wrote back courteously saying: "Your plans to establish a high class journal to circulate among the intelligent Negroes is in itself interesting and on its face has my sympathy. But before I could decide whether I can become of advantage in carrying your plans into effect, I would wish to advise with men whose opinion in such a matter I consider of much value.

Nothing came of this because, as I might have known most of Mr. Schiff's friends were strong and sincere advocates of Tuskegee. Then came a new and surprising turn to the whole situation which in the end quite changed my life. In the early summer of 1905 Mr. Washington went to Boston and arranged to speak in a colored church to colored people, a thing which he did not often do in the North. Trotter and Forbes, editors of the Guardian determined to heckle him and make him answer certain questions with regard to his attitude toward voting and education. William H. Lewis, a lawyer whom I had introduced to Mr. Washington, had charge of the meeting and the result was a disturbance magnified by the newspapers into a riot which resulted in the arrest of Mr. Trotter and eventually he served a term in jail. Later I explained to Mr. George Foster Peabody in answer to a query, my own connection with and attitude toward this occurrence. "I did not arrive in Boston until after the Zion Church disturbance. Before seeing the account in the morning papers, I had no inkling or suspicion in any way of the matter. I did not know Mr. Washington was in Boston or intending to go there as I had just left him at Tuskegee. I had had no correspondence with Mr. Trotter for six months save in regard to a boarding place. When I arrived in Boston and heard of the meeting I told Mr. Trotter and Mr. Forbes in plain terms my decided disapproval of the unfortunate occurrence and my conviction that it would do harm." Although I was unable at that time to defend Mr. Washington's position as I once had, I nevertheless took occasion to address a meeting of men at Mr. Trotter's home and remind them of the vast difference between criticizing Mr. Washington's policy and attacking him personally. Nevertheless, brought into close contact with Mr. Trotter for the first time my admiration for his unselfishness, pureness of heart and indomitable energy even when misguided, grew."

Trotter was headstrong but sincere. He must not be made a martyr.

However, when Mr. Trotter was jailed my indignation overflowed. I sent out from Atlanta in June, 1905, "a call to a few selected persons 'for organized determination and aggresive action on the part of men who believe in Negro freedom and growth.' I propose a conference during that summer 'to oppose firmly present methods of strangling honest criticism, to organize intelligent and honest Negroes, and to support organs of news and public opinion." Fifty-nine men from seventeen different states signed a Call for a meeting near Buffalo, New York, during the week of July 9, 1905. I went to Buffalo and hired a little hotel on the Canada side of the river at Fort Erie and waited for the men to attend the meeting called for July 11, 12, 13 and 14. If sufficient men had not come to pay for the hotel, I should certainly have been in bankruptcy and perhaps in jail; but as a matter of fact, twenty-nine men, representing fourteen states, came. The Niagara Movement was organized January 31, 1906, and was incorporated in the District of Columbia with the following principles:

1. Freedom of speech and criticism.
2. Unfettered and unsubsidized press.
3. Manhood suffrage.
4. The abolition of all caste distinctions based simply on race and color.
5. The recognition of the principles of human brotherhood as a practical present creed.
6. The recognition of the highest and best human training as the monopoly of no class or race.
7. A belief in the dignity of labor.
8. United effort to realize these ideals under wise and courageous leadership."

The Niagara Movement created furor and the most disconcerting criticism. I was accused of acting from motives of envy of a great leader and being ashamed of the fact that I was a member of the Negro race. The leading weekly of the land, The New York Outlook, pilloried me with scathing articles and the Negro weeklies, with few exceptions, went mad. But the movement went forward. The next year, 1906, instead of meeting in secret we met publicly at Harper's Ferry, the scene of John Brown's raid and had, in significance if not numbers, one of the greatest meetings that American Negroes have ever held. We made pilgrimage at dawn barefooted to the scene of Brown's martyrdom and we talked some of the plainest English that has been given voice to by Black men in America.

Now the fat was in the fire and my career as a scientist was beginning to be swallowed up in my role as master of propaganda. This was not at all to my liking. I was no natural leader of men. I could not slap people on the back and make friends of strangers. I could not easily break down an inherited reserve and a cold, biting, critical streak. Nevertheless, having put my hand to the plow I could not turn back. The Niagara movement met with less momentum in Boston in 1907 and in Oberlin in 1908 and then practically became merged into a new and enveloping movement which started with a conference in 1909 and was incorporated as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in 1911.

While now I was being swept on in this current to a new and different mode of expression, I continued to cling to my scientific work. In 1906, I outlined that work to Andrew Carnegie hoping to interest him in the Atlanta Conferences and reminding him that I had been presented to him and Carl Schurz some years before. I said: "I enclose herewith a report on Negro Crime, which is the ninth annual report published by the conference. The object of this Conference is the systematic and exhaustive study of the American Negro, in order that in the future philanthropists and others who seek to solve this serious set of problems may have before them a carefully gathered body of scientifically arranged facts to guide them.

"The studies mentioned above have been widely used; they are in all the large libraries of the world including the British Museum, the Library of Congress, Harvard University, etc. They have been commended by periodicals like the Outlook, The Nation, The London Times, the Spectator, and the Manchester Guardian; they have been favorably spoken of by men like G. Stanley Hall, Walter F. Willcox, Talcot Williams, and most of the teachers of economics and sociology in American Colleges." There was no response but still I pushed on.

I approached the United States Commissioner of Labor in 1906 with proposal for a study of Lowndes County, Alabama. I was going to take a single county of a former slave state with a large majority of Negroes and make a social and economic study from the earliest times where documents were available, down to the present; supplemented by studies of official records and a house to house individual canvas. I plied Commissioner Neill with plans and specifications until at last he authorized the study. Helped by Monroe Work now at Tuskegee Institute and R. R. Wright now a bishop of the A. M. E. Church and a dozen or more local employees I settled at the Calhoun School and began the study. It was carried on with all sorts of difficulties including the greeting of my agents with shot-guns in certain parts of the county; but it was eventually finished. The difficult schedules were tabulated and I think myself that it was the most complete study of the sort that has ever been made. It included maps of the chronological division of the land; studies of the distribution of labor; investigations of the relation of landlord and tenant; a review of the political organization and of the family life and distribution of the population. I went to Washington and I spent some weeks there revising and perfecting it. It was accepted by the government and $2,000 paid for it, most of which went back to Atlanta University in repayment of funds which it had kindly furnished me to carry on the work. But the study was not published. I finally approached the bureau and tried to find out when it would be published and was told that the bureau had decided not to publish the manuscript since it "touched on political matters". I was astonished and disappointed but after a year I went back to them again and asked if they would allow me to have the manuscript published since they were not going to use it. They told me it had been destroyed.

And to complete this strange picture while I was down in Lowndes County finishing this study there came the news of the Atlanta riot. I took the next train for Atlanta and my family. On the way I wrote the Litany of Atlanta.

Meantime I had started in Memphis with the help of two graduates of Atlanta University the little printing shop that I have mentioned and from this was published a weekly paper called The Moon beginning in 1906. The Moon was in some sort precursor of the Crisis. It was published for a year in Memphis and then the printing office given up and in 1907 in conjunction with two friends in Washington there was issued a minature monthly called the Horizon. The Horizon was published from 1907 to 1910 and in the fall of 1910 the Crisis was born.

And so my work in Atlanta and my dream of the settlement of the Negro problem by science faded. I began to be acutely conscious of the difficulty which my attitudes and beliefs were making for Atlanta University. I thought that my withdrawal would unloose funds from the General Education Board and other sources which would make the University secure and perhaps even permit the carrying on of the conference in other hands. For a while I thought of withdrawing in 1906 when I was offered the position of assistant superintendent of schools of Washington, D. C. But even there fear of my "radicalism" took the matter up even to President Theodore Roosevelt and the offer while never withdrawn was not pressed. Finally after the conference of 1909 in New York the new organization of The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was formed and I was asked to come as Director of Publications and Research. ~~with the idea that something of my research work was to go on and thus the other idea, that my activities would be so held in check that the Association would not develop as an organ of attack upon Tuskegee.~~

The Fifth Decade - Editor - 1908-1918 - 40-50 years of age.- The span of my life from 1908-1918 is chiefly the story of the Crisis Magazine under my editorship but it had also an astonishing variety of subsidiary interests and activities.

Beginning a little before this period I continued my visits to Europe. I went in 1900 and again by the grace of an English friend in 1907; I took part in the great Races Congress in 1911 and went again in December, 1918, just after the Armistice. This close touch with Europe and European developments had much to do with my understanding of social problems and trends of the world. I followed the development of English imperialism and the forces in England, France, Italy and Germany which resulted in the Balkan War, the World War and eventually the Russian Revolution. In the United States I studied the political developments from the free silver controversy led by Bryan, through the administrations of Theodore Roosevelt and Taft and especially the Bull Moose campaign and the election of Wilson.

I kept on writing and publishing not with as much concentration of effort as I ought to have, but with some effectiveness. In 1907 appeared "The Negro in the South" - from lecturers, two by myself and two by Mr. Washington. In 1909 I published "John Brown", one of the best written of my books, but one which arouse unfortunate ~~antagonism~~ jealousy. In 1915 I published my little volume on "The Negro". To this must be added part of a bulletin in the twelfth census and several magazine articles; and, of course, eight years of the Crisis.

I was active in the organization of the new National Association for the Advancement of Colored People but carefully avoided the temptation of becoming its executive head. I still clung to my idea of investigation in lines which would temper and guide my exposition of a racial philosophy and for that reason I determined from the beginning to make my work of the Association not that of executive secretary but editor of an official organ to be established. There was opposition to this from the first. First of all, organs of this sort were known to be usually costly and the organization had no money. Secondly, organs were of doubtful efficiency. My good friend, Albert E. Pillsbury, Attorney-General of Massachusetts, wrote and said feelingly: "If you have not decided upon a periodical for heaven's sake don't. They are as numerous as flies" and he meant to conclude about as useful. I came to New York to occupy a bare office; ~~occupied~~ associated with a treasurer who said frankly, "I don't know who is going to pay your salary. I have no money;" with a secretary who was scared of her job and jealous of her power; and with a generally critical if not hostile public which expected the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to launch upon a bitter attack upon Booker T. Washington and Tuskegee.

My first job was to get the Crisis going and arriving in August I finally got the first copy off the press in November, 1910. It came at the psychological moment and its success was phenomenal. From the one thousand which I ventured to publish first it went up a thousand a month until by 1918 (due, of course, to special circumstances) we published and sold over a hundred thousand copies.

With this organ of propaganda and defense we were able to organize one of the most effective assaults of liberalism upon reaction that the modern world has seen. We secured extraordinary helpers: great lawyers like Moorfield Storey and Louis Marshall; earnest liberals like Villard, Milholland, John Haynes Holmes, Mary Ovington, Jane Addams, the Spingarns,

Charles Edward Russell and William English Walling. We gained a series of court victories before the highest courts of the land which perhaps never have been equalled, beginning with the overthrow of the vicious Grandfather Clauses in 1915 and the breaking of the backbone of segregation in 1917. Above all we could, through the Crisis and our officers, our secretaries and friends, place consistently and continuously before the country a clear-cut statement of the legitimate aims of the American Negro and the facts concerning his condition. We organized his political power and made it ~~effective~~ felt and we started a campaign against lynching and mob law which was the most effective ever organized and ~~eventually brought~~ at long last seemed to bring the end of the evil in sight.

With these efforts came other activities. I lectured widely in nearly every state in the Union. ~~I promoted literature and art through pageants, a little theatre movement and prizes offered by the Crisis.~~ I furnished information to people everywhere on all sorts of subjects closely and remotely connected with race problems, and carried on from time to time studies and investigations. ~~On the whole I should criticize this period of my life for too great dissipation of energy; too little concentration upon main objectives; and yet I suppose that under the circumstances this was impossible.~~ I was held more responsible for the success of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People than I cared to confess to myself; than most other people wanted to admit. I had to spread myself over a whole field of activities when I should have done great deal better work if I could have confined myself to writing and study.

The development of the Crisis where most of my writing was done was interesting and difficult. It was impaired first and last by lack of trained business management. For the most part I was my own business manager which meant the loss of much time in learning and details. Then there was the delicate matter of policy; of how far I should express my own ideas and reactions in the Crisis or the studied judgment of the organization. From first to last I thought strongly, and as I still think rightly, to make the opinion expressed in the Crisis a personal opinion; because as I argued, no organization can express definite and clear cut opinions; so far as this organization comes to conclusions it states them in its annual resolutions but the Crisis states openly the opinion of its editor so long as that opinion is in general agreement with that of the organization.

This of course was a dangerous and delicate matter bound eventually to break down in case there was any considerable divergence of opinion between the organization and editor. It was perhaps rather unusual that for two decades the two lines of thinking ran so largely together. If on the other hand the Crisis had not been in a sense a personal organ and the expression of myself, it could not possibly have attained its popularity and effectiveness. It would have been the dry kind of organ that so many societies support for purposes of reference and not for reading. It took, on the part of the organization, a great deal of patience and faith to allow me the latitude that they did for so many years; and on the other hand I was enabled to lay down for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a clear, strong and distinct body of doctrine that could not have been built up by majority vote. It was probably inevitable that in the end a distinct and clear cut difference of opinion on majority policies should lead to the dissolution of this interesting partnership.

One of the first difficulties that the National Association met was the case of its attitude toward Mr. Washington. I carefully tried to avoid any exaggeration of differences of thought; but to discuss the Negro question in 1910 was to discuss Booker T. Washington and almost before we were conscious of the inevitable trends we were challenged from Europe. Mr. Washington was in Europe in 1910 and made some speeches in England in his usual conciliatory lines. John Milholland who had been so dominant in the organization of the National Association immediately wrote me and said that American Negroes must combat the idea that they were satisfied with conditions. I, therefore, wrote an appeal to England and Europe.

"If Mr. Booker T. Washington, or any other person, is giving the impression abroad that the Negro problem in America is in process of satisfactory solution, he is giving an impression which is not true. We say this without personal bitterness toward Mr. Washington. He is a distinguished American and has a perfect right to his opinions. But we are compelled to point out that Mr. Washington's large financial responsibilities have made him dependent on the rich charitable public and that, for this reasons, he has for years been compelled to tell, not the whole truth, but that part of it which certain powerful interests in America wish to appear as the whole truth. In flat contradition, however, to the pleasant pictures thus pointed out, let us not forget that the consensus of opinion among eminent European scholars who know the race problem in America from De Tocqueville down to Von Halle, De Laveleys, Archer and Johnston, is that it forms the gravest of American problems. We Black men who live and suffer under present conditions, and who have no reason, and refuse to accept reasons, for silence, can substantiate this unanimous testimony."

In furtherance of this statement and in anticipation of the meeting of the Races Congress Mr. Milholland arranged that I should go early to the conference and make some addresses. The plan simmered down to an proposed address before the Lyceum Club, the leading woman's group of London and there it ran against the opposition of an American woman who wrote: "I think there is serious objection to entertaining Dr. DuBois at the Lyceum." The result was a rather acrimonious controversy, in which I tried gently to withdraw but was unable to and finally led by Her Highness the Ranee of Sarawak and Dr. Etta Sayre a luncheon was held at the Lyceum Club with a bishop and two countesses and several knights and ladies and with Maurice Hewlett and Sir Harry Johnston.

The Races Congress would have marked an epoch in the racial history of the world if it had not been for the World War. As it was, it was a great and inspiring occasion bringing together representatives of numerous ethnic and cultural groups and bringing new and frank conceptions of scientific bases of racial and social relations of people. I had a chance twice to address the Congress and to write one of the two poems which greeted the assembly.

Returning to the United States I was plunged into the Bull Moose campaign. I thought I saw a splendid chance for a third party movement on a broad platform of votes for Negroes and industrial democracy. Sitting in the office of the Crisis I wrote out a proposed plank for the Progressives to adopt at their Chicago meeting: "The Progressive party recognizes that distinctions of race or class in political life have no place in a democracy. Especially does the party realize that a group of 10,000,000 people who have in a generation changed from a slave to a free labor system, re-established family life, accumulated $1,000,000,000 of real property, including 20,000,000 acres of land, and reduced their illiteracy from 80 to 30 per cent., deserve and must have justice, opportunity and a voice in their own government. The party, therefore, demands for the American of Negro descent the repeal of unfair discriminatory laws and the right to vote on the same terms on which other citizens vote."

36-3-41

This was taken to Chicago by Joel E. Spingarn and advocated by two other directors of the Association, Dr. Henry Moskowitz and Jane Addams. They worked in vain for its adoption. Theodore Roosevelt would have none of it. He told Mr. Spingarn frankly that he should be "careful of that man DuBois" who was in Roosevelt's opinion a dangerous person. The Bull Moose Convention not only refused to adopt a plank anything like this but refused to seat most of the colored delegates; elected a Southern "lily white" to run on the ticket with Mr. Roosevelt and finally succeeded in making Woodrow Wilson president of the United States.

Immediately Bishop Walters and myself conceived the idea that Mr. Wilson might be approachable. I proposed to throw the weight of the Crisis against Roosevelt and Taft and for Wilson, and Bishop Walters went to see him. He secured from Woodrow Wilson a categorical expression over his signature "of his earnest wish to see justice done the colored people in every matter; and not more grudging justice, but justice executed with liberality and cordial good feeling". "I want to assure them that should I become President of the United States they may count upon me for absolute fair dealing, for everything by which I could assist in advancing the interests of their race in the United States." In this effort to divide the Negro vote which was successful to an unusual degree, we were cruelly disappointed when the democratic Congress met. There was the greatest flood of discriminatory bills

both in Congress and among the states that has probably ever been introduced since the Civil War. Only united and determined effort defeated bills against intermarriage and for other discriminations in eight states and while most of the proposed legislation in Congress was kept from the statute books, the administration carried out a segregation in the various departments which we had to fight for years and vestiges of which even remain today.

In other respects our lines were cast in difficult places. The Socialists began to consider the color question and to discriminate against the membership of colored people in the South, lest whites should not be attracted. Mr. Villard tried to get the President to appoint a National Race Commission to be privately financed to the extent of $50,000 but nothing could be done; and suddenly war and revolution struck the world: the Chinese Revolution in 1912; the Balkan War in 1913 and finally in 1914 the World War.

In that very year the National Council of Social Agencies met in Memphis without daring to discuss the color question but Spingarn and I went down to Memphis and held open meetings advertising "for all who dared hear the truth." We had an interesting time. Finally the World War touched America; with it and in anticipation of it came a sudden increasing of lynching including the horrible burning at Dyersburg; there ran renewed efforts at segregation; the refusal to let Negroes volunteer; the whole extraordinary difficulties of the draft and the question of Negro officers. The Association itself hesitated. It did not want openly to advocate segregation but Spingarn, chairman of the board of the Crisis, went ahead and the students of Howard and other schools backed our efforts. We finally succeeded in arranging for an officers camp at Des Moines where seven hundred officers were eventually given commissions. At the same time there was the increased migration of Negroes to the North, the riots at East St. Louis and the rebellion of Negro soliders at Houston; the shelving of Colonel Young and the alleged German plots. It ~~was in 1918 that I was fifty years of age and had my first experience of birthday celebration.~~ The Crisis had reached a monthly circulation of 68,000 and during the year I had a little dinner with Glendowen Evans, Margaret DeLand and William James.

This success and the death of Booker T. Washington in 1915 led to the first Amenia Conference and united the American Negro in one program of advance.

30-3-43

The Sixth Decade - Editor and Traveler - 1918-1928 - 50-60 years of age.- I review the sixth decade of my life with some misgivings and difficulties of judgment. It was in many respects a culmination and yet again it represented as it seems to me now, a vast dissipation of energy which might to better purpose have been concentrated in fewer lines. I am not altogether sure of this. There were so many things to do; so many paths that presented themselves as duties which must be followed that I was perhaps more or less helpless in the grasp of forces mightier than my will. Because after all the decade following the War was a time of tremendous crises and changes and no single life could escape the paradox and confusion to which all life, and especially life in culture lands, was subjected.

My career had at this time a certain sense of drama. I had never before seen Theodore Roosevelt but in November, 1918, I presided at a meeting in Carnegie Hall where he made his last public speech, appearing together with Irwin Cobb and a representative of the French High Commission. I remember my introduction "I have the honor to present Theodore Roosevelt." Then on my fiftieth birthday there was a public celebration and many kindly messages. John Hope wrote: "How glad I am that your fiftieth birthday is going to be such a happy one because you can look back on so much good work done. But not the good work alone. What you may look back upon with greatest comfort is good intention."

And Albert Bushnell Hart wrote a word which one quotes with a certain diffidence: "Out of his fifty years of life I have followed a good thirty - and have counted him always among the ablest and keenest of our teacher-scholars, an American who viewed his country broadly."

~~And~~ Finally I prized most highly the tribute of President Bumstead: "First of all, let me express the keen satisfaction I take in having been the one chiefly responsible, perhaps, for bringing Doctor DuBois to Atlanta University." "I cannot but smile when I think of the objections and misgivings of some of our trustees and other friends when he came." "We wanted a professor of sociology with special reference to investigating conditions concerning the Negro; and I said that Doctor DuBois was the one man, white or black, far and away best fitted for the position. But how about his religion - he's studied in Germany - perhaps if you scratch him, you'll find an agnostic. Now it is true that Atlanta University has always had a pronounced religious, though undenominational, life - a life ... ~~inherited from the New England people represented by its founders; and it has always looked to its teachers, so far as possible, to help to maintain it~~ - so I must needs have some assurances on this point. But, as Doctor DuBois will remember, they were not very easy to get. He seemed to be one of those persons who, when asked about their religion, reply that they "have none to speak of". But though reluctant to speak of his religion or to say what he would do at Atlanta, I observed that at the time of my interview with him he was living with his newly wedded bride in the centre of the Negro slums of Philadelphia, doing the beneficent work to which Provost Harrison had called him, and I thought there were some indications of genuine religion in that fact."

"So, in spite of objections and misgivings, Doctor DuBois came to Atlanta University, and we held him there for thirteen years notwithstanding several offers to go elsewhere and get double the salary that we could afford to pay him. His work became a memorable part of the history of the Institution."

36-3-45

The most important work of the decade as I now look back upon it was my travel. Before 1918 I had made three trips to Europe; but now between 1918 and 1928 I made four trips of extraordinary meaning: to France directly after the close of the war and during the Congress of Versailles; to England, Belgium, France and Geneva in the earliest days of the League of Nations; to Spain, Portugal and Africa in 1923 and 1924; and to Germany, Russia, and Constantinople in 1927. I could scarcely have encompassed a more vital part of the modern world picture than in these stirring journeys. They gave me a depth of knowledge and a breadth of view which was of incalculable value for realizing and judging modern conditions, and above all the problem of race in America.

But this was only part of my work: in the United States I was still fighting the battle of liberalism against race prejudice; trying to adjust war and post-war problems to the questions of racial justice; trying to show from the injustices of war time what the new vision must encompass; fighting mobs and lynchings; encouraging Negro migration; helping women suffrage; encouraging the new rush of young blacks to college; watching and explaining the political situation and traveling and lecturing thousands of miles and in hundreds of centers. In addition to this I was encouraging the writing of others and trying to help develop Negro art and literature. Beside editing the Crisis continuously I published ~~The Negro in 1915~~; ~~Dark Water~~ "Darkwater" in 1920;

The Gift of Black Folk in 1924; the article on Georgia "In These United States" in 1924, and the concluding chapter in The New Negro in 1925 beside a number of magazine articles. Most of the young writers who began what was called the renaissance of Negro literature in the twenties, began from their first publication in the Crisis magazine.

Above all in these days I made two efforts toward which I look back with infinite satisfaction: the two year attempt in the Brownie's book to furnish a little magazine for Negro children in which my efforts were ably seconded by Augustus Dill and Jessie Fausett; and most especially my single handed production of the pageant "The Star of Ethiopia". The pageant was an attempt to put into dramatic form for the benefit of large masses of people, a history of the Negro race. It was first attempted in the New York celebration of Emancipation in 1913; it was repeated with magnificent and breath-taking success in Washington with 1200 participants; it was given again in Philadelphia in 1916; and in Los Angeles in 1924.

Finally in New York I attempted a little theatre movement which went far enough to secure for our little group ~~helped by the acting of Ira Reid~~ second prize in an international competition. In 1918 I was asked rather suddenly by the N. A. A. C. P. to go to Europe right after the Armistice, to investigate the treatment of Negro soldiers and keep the record straight; and then ~~secondly~~ at the behest of a group of American Negroes I considered that the interests of Africa ought to be represented during the peace efforts following the war. With infinite difficulty and through the cooperation of Blaise Diagne the French Deputy from Senegal I succeeded in gathering in February, 1919, at the Grand Hotel in Paris a Pan-African congress of fifty-seven delegates including sixteen American Negroes, twenty West

Indians and twelve Africans. Both France, Belgium and Portugal were represented by officials. This was to my mind but a beginning and in 1921 I returned and held a Second Pan-African Congress in London, Brussels and Paris from August 28 to September 6. There were 115 accredited delegates from twenty-six different groups including thirty-five from the United States, thirty-nine from Africa and the rest from the West Indies and Europe. Among the speakers were Sir Sidney now Lord Olivier; Florence Kelly; Bishop Burse; Paul Otlet often called the father of the League of Nations; Senator La Fontaine of Belgium; Dr. Vitellian, former physician of Menelik of Abyssinia; General Sorolas; Blaise Diagne; Norman Leys and others. The attention which the congress evoked all over Europe was astonishing. It was discussed in the London Times, Observer and Daily Graphic; in the Paris Petit Parisian, Matin and Temps; in the Manchester Guardian and in practically all the daily papers of Belgium. It led to heated debate in Brussels touching the rights of these delegates to discuss the relation of colonies and it emphasized in the minds of all of us the consequent importance of such discussions.

Two of us visited the League of Nations and the International Labor Office with petitions and suggestions. In 1923 a third Pan African Congress, less broadly representative than the second, but nevertheless of some importance was held in London, Paris and Lisbon; and thence I went to Africa and for the first time saw the homeland of the black race.

It was the time when the U. S. had disappointed Liberia by not granting her a promised loan and a gesture of good will was in order. At the suggestion of William H. Lewis I was therefore designated by cable as special minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to represent President Coolidge at the inauguration of President King. In the presence of the diplomatic and consular representatives of England, France, Germany, Spain, Belgium,

Holland and Panama I had the honor to tell the President of Liberia: "Your Excellency:. . . I am sure that in this special mark of the President's favor, he has had in mind the wishes and hopes of Negro Americans. He knows how proud they are of the hundred years of independence which you have maintained by force of arms and by brawn and brain upon the edge of this might continent; he knows that in the great battle against color caste in America; the ability of Negroes to rule in Africa has been and ever will be a great and encouraging reinforcement."

At the London meeting of the third Pan African Congress, Harold Laski, H. G. Wells, and Sir Sidney Olivier spoke, and Ramsey MacDonald had promised to speak to us but was hindered by the sudden opening of the campaign which eventually made him prime minister of England. Among other efforts, at this time we held conferences with members of the Labor Party of England at which Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mr. Cleynes and others were present. We emphasized the importance of labor solidarity between white and black labor in England, America and elsewhere. In Portugal our meeting was attended by cabinet ministers and deputies and though small was of great interest.

To return again to the fight in the United States, there arose early in this decade the case of Marcus Garvey. I heard of him first when I was in Jamaica in 1915 when he sent a letter "presenting his compliments" and giving me "a hearty welcome to Jamaica, on the part of the United Improvement and Conservation Association". Later he came to the United States. In his case, as in the case of others, I have repeatedly been accused of enmity and jealously, which have been so far from my thought that the accusations have been a rather bitter experience. In 1920 when his movement was beginning to grow in America I said in the Crisis that he was "an extraordinary leader of men" and declared that he had "with singular success capitalized and made vocal the great and long suffering grievances and spirit of protest among the West Indian peasantry." On the other hand, I noted his difficulties of temperament and training, inability to get on with his fellow workers and denied categorically that I had ever interferred in any way with his work. Later when he began to collect money for his steamship I characterized him as a sincere and hard working idealist but called his methods bombastic, wasteful, illogical and almost illegal and begged his friends not to allow him foolishly to overwhelm with bankruptcy and disaster one of the most interesting spiritual movements of the modern world. But he went ahead, wasted his money, got in trouble with the authorities and was deported. As I said at the time: "When Garvey was sent to Atlanta, no word or action of ours accomplished the result. His release and deportation was a matter of law which no deed or wish of ours influenced in the slightest degree. We have today, no enmity against Marcus Garvey. He has a great and worthy dream. We wish him well. He is free; he has a following; he still has a chance to carry on his work in his own home and among his own people and to accomplish some of his ideas. Let him do it. We will be the first to applaud any success that he may have."

I felt for a moment during the war that I could be without reservation a patriotic American. The government was making sincere efforts to meet our demands. It had commissioned over seven hundred Negro officers; I had had a personal interview with Newton Baker, Secretary of War, and he had made categorical promises; Wilson had spoken out against lynching; and I had myself been offered a captaincy in the Intelligence Service, afterwards to be sure rather incontinently withdrawn as the higher command realized just who I was. Nevertheless, I tried to stand by the country and wrote the widely discussed editorial "Close Ranks" in which I said to the Negroes: Forget your grievances for the moment and stand by your country.

I am not sure that I was right but certainly my intentions were. I did not believe in war, but I thought that in a fight with America against militarism and for democracy we would be fighting for the emancipation of the Negro race. With the Armistice came disillusion. I saw the mud and dirt of the trenches; I heard from the mouths of soldiers the kind of treatment that black men got in the American army; I was convinced and said that American white officers fought more valiantly against Negroes within our ranks than they did against the Germans. I still believe this was largely true. I collected some astonishing documents of systematic slander and attack upon Negroes and demands upon the French for insulting attitudes toward them, and when I published these documents in America the government started to interfere by refusing the Crisis mailing facilities; then realizing that this was an admission of guilt they quickly withdrew their prohibition.

I was especially upset by the mobs and lynchings during this time: by that extraordinary upheaval wherein for several hours black men fighting against a mob practically held the city of Washington in their hands; then the horrible riot and murders in Chicago. We fought back through the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the columns of the Crisis, through lectures and articles with every force at hand. Mary Talbert started the Anti-Lynching Crusaders and with her help and that of the secretary, James Weldon Johnson, we raised a defense funds of $70,000 and put the Dyer Lynch Bill through the House of Representatives and on to the floor of the Senate. It was not until years after that I knew what killed that anti-lynching bill. It was a bargain between the South and the West by which lynching was permitted on condition that the Japanese were excluded.

Court cases kept pressing upon us: there were the Elaine riots and the Arkansas cases; there was the Sweet case in Detroit and equally significant to my mind, but to few other Negroes the Sacco-Venzetti case in Massachusetts. We continued winning court victories and yet somehow, despite them, we did not seem to be getting far. We added to the Grandfather Case of 1915 and the Segregation Case of 1917 the victories in the Arkansas cases, the white primary case and another segregation case in the high courts, in addition to the eventual freeing of Dr. Sweet and his family. Still injustice prevailed. In the case of the Mississippi flood the Red Cross allowed the Negroes to be treated as slaves and peons, and in Okolona the Episcopal church refused to prosecute a white murderer on its own school grounds. Above all there came disquieting situations among Negro students: a strike at Hampton, disturbed conditions at Wilberforce, turmoil at Howard and an uprising at Fisk which had to end with the deposition of a president. Into this latter battle I had to throw myself; to resurrect and republish the Fisk Herald and to fight until Fisk was free.

It was thus a decade of infinite effort and discouraging turmoil. I suppose it had to be. I suppose that with the best will, it would have been impossible for me to concentrate on a few great lines of creative effort. I had to be a part of the revolution through which the world was going and to feel in my own soul the scars of its battle. Two things made a sort of finale to the decade: the fourth Pan African Congress held in New York in 1927 with Dantes Bellegarde, George Sylvain and other speakers; and there was news of the Congress of British West Africa which began its meetings in 1920 and forced the British government to the greatest step toward democratic method ever taken in black colonies. And finally to my surprise and quite against my best judgment there was given for me upon my return from Africa at the Cafe Saverin in New York, a dinner. Among the speakers were Heyward Broun, Walter Hampden and Mrs. Bethune and tributes were sent by Witter Bynner, Zona Gale and Eugene O'Neil. It was a very beautiful and touching tribute.

Seventh Decade - The Teacher and Writer - 1928-1938 - 60-70 years of age.- Gradually in the last ten years of my life it has dawned upon me with increasing clarity just what the essential change in the world has been since the era of war and depression and how the tactics of those who live for the widest development of men must change accordingly. It is not a matter of change in ideals but of decisive change in the methods by which ideals are to be approximated. As I now look back, I see in the crusade waged by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People from 1910 to 1930 one of the finest efforts of liberalism to achieve human emancipation; and much was accomplished. But the essential difficulty with liberalism of the twentieth century was not to realize the fundamental change brought about by the world wide organization of work and trade and commerce. Karl Marx had emphasized in the 19th century the overwhelming influence of the economic activities of men upon their thought and action, but it was not until the 20th century that it became clearer and clearer to those who observed and thought, that modern business enterprise organized for private profit was throttling democratic government, choking art and literature and making work and industry a paradox by systematically increasing the number of unemployed and dislocating industry itself by periodic depressions.

During the decade, 1918-1928, the world tried to "recover" from the disaster of the World War. We strove to "restore prosperity", to "get back to normalcy" and to return to the same sort of world as the one that had just committed suicide. After ten years of confused effort, it became increasingly clear that the disaster was far greater and deeper than most men dreamed, and that not recovery but fundamental change in the very bases of government and civilization faced us. With the world-wide depression, even the dullest began to conceive the size of the disaster that had overwhelmed mankind.

Moreover the words of the prophets who for nearly a century had been warning mankind now began to sound clear: Freedom, that fine dream of the 18th century, had been during the 19th persistently interpreted as license for business enterprise, until it had not only reforged shackles for the human spirit, but actually re-established human slavery, first by transporting labor and then by making world-wide the dominion of transporting capital. Armed rivalry for monopolizing wealth and services had led to commercial imperialism, world war and universal poverty. We were now faced with the enormously difficult task of reconstructing the economic foundations of civilization and building thereon a new heaven and a new earth for the free and creative spirit of man.

The first answer was the practically universal abandonment of democratic control in government and social development for oligarchy. This proved unexpectedly easy because already before the war, democracy was ~~already~~ so widely a form of words and pious belief and not a practical reality. We held to the forms of voting and popular election, but did not believe nor practice the substance. Throughout European culture, government had passed into the hands of industry, and industry was not controlled by democratic methods. When now the realities of the situation were posed to men, two radical solutions were suddenly resorted to: Russian communism and Fascism. They both did away with democracy, and substituted oligarchic control of government and industry of though and action. Communism ~~did this in accordance~~ aimed at eventual democracy and even elimination of the state, but sought this

by
with a dogmatic program, laid down 90 years ago by a great thinker, but largely invalidated by nearly a century of extraordinary social change. Fascism sought to take complete control of the state, ostensibly for the good of all the people, but practically for the good of the dominant classes. Both dictatorships were forced to consolidate their power by force, assassination and mass propaganda of every sort.

All this in the years since the war I had been observing in every part of the world, and I had been trying desperately and unremittingly, to spy out in the Universal gloom a path for the American Negro. One thing I knew and knew well: we could not afford to sit and wait; we must actively and intelligently press forward toward goals consistent with the new ways of a world about to be reborn world. The problem of a minority group in a world torn by old and new national and racial division was of enormous difficulty: it was idle for us simply to repeat the old slogans of democracy in an oligarchic world; no matter how strongly we, with all forward looking thinkers, might envisage a rebirth of democracy, we knew or should know, that at present, our problem was economic rather than political reform; this economic reconstruction was now in progress — amid turmoil and contradiction, beclouded by a thousand irrelevances and bedeviled by every art of selfishness, but nevertheless clearly in progress. My problem was How can American Negroes joing this movement and intelligently reenforce it, for their own good and the good of all men.

In the organization whose leadership I then shared, I saw few allies impressed as I was to an ever increasing degree, as to the immediate necessity of a reorientation of objectives in order to make our original and unshakable ideals realizable. It was a problem not of change of goal but of method. I looked about for allies and looked where man ever looks in such crisis — to Youth. I thought that just as a quarter century earlier, the N. A. A. C. P.

was recruited from clear-eyed and courageous young folk, so to day, a reorganization of our aims could be led by a similar group.

30-3-55

For this reason the Second Amonia Conference was called, seventeen years after the first. The first Amonia conference in 1916, not at a strategic time. It brought together on the beautiful farm of Joel Spingarn, where once John Burroughs had studied and dreamed men and women representing all elements of leadership in the Negro race, together with white friends of prominence and influence. It was an unusually successful effort and there on the old farm and around the dark still lake while there was ware in Europe and unrest in the United States a hundred or more Negroes came together and a half dozen whites with messages from three presidents of the United States and other distinguished persons and we agreed upon a liberal program which included a plea for education, a warning against factionalism, a need for interracial understanding and a forward movement. Our essential agreement on a program of advance was gratifying and epoch-making. But as I now see, we did not then sufficiently appreciate the spade-work which had gone before and which for 10 years had been preparing the minds of Americans, black and white, for a new deal in race relations and renewed effort toward racial equality.

In 1933, the situation was different. We met at the beginning rather than at the end of a period of preparatory discussion. We were still mentally whirling in a sea of inconclusive world discussion. We could not really reach agreement as a group, because so many of us as individuals had not made up our minds on the essentials of coming social change. The attendance was sifted--perhaps too much so; outside of four of the Elder Statesmen, the median age was thirty--persons just out of college, their life work begun

but not settled. They were teachers, social workers, professional men and two artisans. The discussion was indeterminate and the resolutions contradictory; it was agreed that "The primary problem is economic" but the conclusion was that this problem could not be approached from the point of view of Race, but only from that of a united group of laborers cutting across racial lines. This was of course the intrusion of communisitic dogma--idoally right, and practically unworkable. If the workers of the world would unite in unselfish cooperation to uplift the laboring mass, the millenium would be in sight. But we cannot expect of the age-long under-privileged worker, that which the educated and advanced have not envisaged; namely, the ignoring of race prejudice at just the era when it is being artificially stimulated by every human device.

Our program then must begin at home. Whatever just objection there be to racial efforts in a day when biologic races have been proven a myth, the reality of cultural groups like the American Negro, whether called "races" or what not, not only must be admitted but used as units of social uplift. I began then, despite the fact that the most courageous of the Negro youth seemed rushing down steep places into the sea of communistic dogma, without stopping to ask how far this dogma applied to our situation --I began advocating a program of economic organization within the Negro group, designed to prepare us for effective citizenship in the new industrial democracy which the world is slowly but surely approaching.

No sooner had I come to this conclusiong than I knew that I was out of touch with my organization and that the question of leaving it was only a matter of time. This was no easy decision; to give up the Crisis was like giving up a child; to leave the National Association was leaving the friends of a quarter of a century. But on the other hand staying meant silence and

a repudiation of what I was thinking and planning. My cutting away, therefore, from this work did not conform to any of the ordinary patterns. A good many of my friends and most onlookers are still puzzled. They tried to classify this break of ties as a question of dismissal, of quarrel, or incompatability of age and youth, or other classifications of the sort. It was none of these. I could have stayed with the National Association to the end of my working days or at least as long as it continued to exist. There was no greater friction within its organization than is inevitable to every human machine; but there was a clear difference of point of view. The Association in the matter of segregation emphasized a part of its program more than it emphasized before. We had recognized and used segregation in the matter of schools and colleges, in matter of religion, in the matter of the officers' camp; but we had fought its further spread, ~~then advocated as the next best thing~~. At this point I came advocating a new segregation in economic lines; in precisely the lines of business and industry whither the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was not prepared to go. It was not an absolute difference of principle, but it was a grave difference of further procedure, and therefore I gave up my connection with the Association saying: "In thirty-five years of public service my contribution to the settlement of the Negro problem has been mainly candid criticism based on a careful effort to know the facts. I have not always been right, but I have been sincere, and I am unwilling at this late day to be limited in the expression of my honest opinions in the way in which the Board proposes. . . . I am, therefore, resigning from my position as Director of Publications and Research, Editor of the Crisis, member of the Board of Directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and member of the Spingarn Medal Committee, - this resignation to take effect immediately." The Association was good enough to express in return appreciation of the work I had done while associated with it.

In the meantime I had already been turning to work which was in a sense a renewal of my early work and research from 1908-1918. Already as early as 1909 I had planned an Encyclopaedia of the Negro, had secured on my board of advisors Flinders Petrie, Sir Harry Johnston, Giusseppi Sergi, Dr. J. Deniker, William James and Franz Boas; and on my proposed board of editors I had practically all the leading Negroes of the United States who were inclined toward research but my change to New York and the work of starting the Crisis and then the World War put this quite out of my mind. The project was reviewed by the Phelps Stokes Funds and today, backed by anthropologists all over the world, we are seeking a quarter of a million dollars to realize this dream. On the other hand was my interest in Reconstruction which had begun in 1910 was renewed. In that year I had read a paper on "Reconstruction and its Benefits" before the American Historical Association. At the suggestion of the president, Albert Bushnell Hart, and others like Dunning of Columbia this paper was published. Finally in 1932 I asked the Rosenwald Fund to give me funds by which I could finish it. They did and the book Black Reconstruction in America was published in 1935.

By that time I was teaching at Atlanta University. There again I was carrying out the thread of a long dream. Back as early as 1905 I had proposed to the several colored colleges of Atlanta the beginning of efforts toward uniting those various institutions into one university. We actually had a meeting in Rockefeller Hall but Miss Packard was definitely opposed.

She said crisply that if her head was going to be taken off she would prefer to bite it off herself. I turned then in 1909 to President Hope and we worked out an interchange of lectures. He wrote me February 16, 1910 "I hope and believe this is the beginning of new and larger things in an educational way among our Colored institutions." and later April 21, 1910 he added: "I feel a downright enthusiasm over the beginning that our two schools made this year and hope that, now that we have made a start and have some slight idea of what can be accomplished, the two schools may next year do larger things".

John Hope and I had long been intimate and sympathetic friends and in the earlier part of this same year he had written me quite frankly a letter which I can now without betraying confidence quote:

"My impression is that friendship - not acquaintanceship or perfunctory intercourse but real friendship - is based not so much on agreement in opinion and policies and methods but upon downright confidence, upon simple faith, no matter what the view or appearances. You and I for nearly ten years have been friends. . . . You may remember that in the early and bitterly misunderstood efforts of the Niagara Movement, I was the only college president that ventured to attend the Harper's Ferry meeting to take part in its deliberations. You may remember, too, that while some may have answered the call to that seemingly radical meeting in New York last May, I was the only president, colored or white, of our colleges that took part in the deliberations of that meeting. I cite this to show that I have dared to live up to my views even when they threw me in the midst of the most radical. Furthermore, every man on our faculty does the same and will as long as I am head of the institution. . . . I write to ask you whether you have me in your heart - not on your calling list or your mailing list but in your heart - on your list of friends."

Years before I had resigned from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, Hope had offered me a position in Atlanta University whenever I might wish to come and when the actual consolidation of these schools took place he repeated the offer at various times. So that finally when the break came I returned to the renowned Atlanta University to carry out my independent lines of though and express them in such writing and teaching as I might wish. In 1936, I seemed confirmed in the wisdom of my way by the panorama of the world which swept before me, in London and Paris, Berlin and Vienna; Moscow and Muksden; Peiping and Shanghai, Kyoto and Tokyo; and heavenly Hawaii.

Finally I suppose upon a seventieth birthday one is presumed to have accumulated enough wisdom on the art of living to leave a wise word. There is not much that I feel moved to say; that little is this: I am especially glad of the divinte gift of laughter; it has made the world human and lovable, despite all its pain and wrong. I am glad that the partial Puritanism of my upbringing, has never made me afraid of life. I have lived completely, testing every normal appetite, feasting on sunset, sea and hill, and enjoying wine, women and song. I have seen the face of beauty from the Grand Canyon to Capri, from the Alps to Lake Baikal; from the African bush to the Venus of Milo. Perhaps above all I am proud of a straightforward clearness of reason, in part a gift of the gods, but also to no little degree due to scientific training and inner discipline. By means of this I have met life face to face, I have loved a fight, and I have realized that the main fact of life is age and death.

This makes it the more incomprehensible for me to see persons quite panic stricken at the approach of their thirtieth birthday and prepared for dissolution at forty. Few of my friends have celebrated their fiftieth birthdays, and near none their sixtieth. Of course one sees some reasons: the disappointment at meagre accomplishment which all to some extent must share; the haunting shadow of possible physical decline; the fear of death. I have been fortunate in having health and wise in keeping it. I have never shared what seems to me the essentially childish desire to live forever. Life has its pain and evil -- its bitter disappointments; but in healthful length of days there is triumphal fulness of experience and infinite joy in seeing the most interesting of continued stories unfold. Not eternity but time is for the living:

"Mein Vermaechtniss, mein Vermaechtniss,
"Wie herrlich weit und breit!
"Die Zeit ist mein Vermaechtniss--
"Mein Acker ist die Zeit!"

36-3-101

47-12-69

8:34

PROGRESS BY POVERTY

During the last ten years almost for the first time, the American people have looked Poverty squarely in the face. There were plenty of poor people in this land before 1929 but as a nation we did not like to admit it. We clung long to our idea that this was primarily the land of wealth where everybody who would could be well-to-do; where people of fair ability could become millionaires; and where, on the whole, poverty was the fault of the poor.

Indeed, in those days we almost regarded poverty as a sort of crime. We arranged our laws so that the unemployed, the vagrants and wanderers could be put in jail and charged with misdemeanor. But today we have come to what seems to me the much saner and truer attitude. We realize that this is a world where most men are poor and most men are going to be poor. We may and must dispute the degree of that poverty; we are widely resolved to combat hunger, malnutrition and compulsory ignorance. But that the question of food, shelter and clothing is going to be a major problem for most Americans of the future, is something that we have got to admit. In other words the nation has met Poverty the Stranger, and begun to inquire about his ancestry and search his stature and lineaments so as never again to forget him or ignore him.

47-12-70

2

Do not misunderstand me. I am not teaching contentment with poverty, but rather bringing to your minds the fact that here is a situation which we must face. We no longer ignore it. We cannot forget it. No sooner have we faced Poverty the Stranger, than we recognize Poverty the Enemy. We know perfectly well that so long as poverty is dire and widespread there can be no effective attack upon sickness and crime; because sickness and crime primarily and fundamentally are the children of poverty. From this we realize that there is something basically wrong with our organization of life in this country and we have discussed it in all sorts of ways and proposed many remedies; but of that aspect I am not speaking tonight. I am rather insisting that whatever the cause and cure for poverty may be, and no matter how great its evil, we are living in the midst of it and for that reason we have got to assume toward it an attitude and a philosophy and not merely give ourselves over to nerves. In other words having met as a nation Poverty the Stranger; and having recognized in him Poverty the Enemy, I am asking you to consider this same poverty from another aspect and that is Poverty the Friend.

There is no doubt that poverty has its place in the world. I do not mean extreme want, starvation and hurtful deprivation - of this there is no defense and if it endures and spreads, civilization ceases. But on the other hand, it is not too much to say, that no human being is fit to live who has not known what poverty is; who has not known exactly what it means to be hungry, what it means not to be sure of tomorrow's food, to be at times uncomfortably and inadequately housed and clothed. It is not well that this experience should go so far as to cripple souls and bodies; but no one is fit to handle the wealth and opportunities of the world who does not know in his own life what their absence means and what their presence demands in thought and effort.

In a situation like ours today, with many millions unemployed, with many more millions on the margin of subsistence and perhaps a majority of us haunted by an unnamed fear; there are certain gifts that poverty brings, certain warnings and incentives that are priceless. First of all, it curbs and restrains our self-righteousness. We are not so sure that it is our desert that raises us above want; our own effort that makes us efficient, or our sin that drags us down; we recognize vast forces within and without us, above and beneath, before which our puny might is helpless. Only in the mighty striving together of all men and powers, can we cope with evil and disaster.

Again today we begin to know the real meaning of Leisure. There are people who for the first time in their life are facing the problem of leisure. It is not to be sure the kind of leisure which they had pictured to themselves. The leisure of former American imagination was something that came after a man had satisfied all his wants, certainly all his physical wants; and then having nothing else to do, he looked around the world and straightly became bored. He became querulous and dissatisfied. He wanted to work just to keep busy; so as not to think, not to reflect. The leisure which comes to us today is different from that. Today leisure is thrust upon millions. It is leisure that we would rather not have if we could substitute for it hard work, interesting work, work that brought adequate income. Nevertheless, this leisure of unemployment and poverty is not wholly evil; it brings us real pause, we can stop and look at the world slowly and reflectively. We can realize that man was made for thought and feeling as well as action. That life is more than meat and the body more than raiment. We can bring back all the pictures of memory. We can, despite discomfort and distaste, become acquainted with ourselves and fulfill the first great law of philosophy - know thyself. We ~~even~~ have a chance, as seldom before, to become aware of the marvelous physical world in which we live. Even in the crowded city we can look at sunsets, we can see clouds, trees and waters; we can watch the infinite change and vagaries of the weather.

But above and beyond that, we can become acquainted with human beings. It is astonishing even in great cities how little we know of our fellow ~~human beings~~ men and how little we want to know. Isolation has become characteristic of city life. In the midst of crowds we are alone and we often pride ourselves on the numbers of persons whom we do not know and the few we accept as acquaintances and friends. Ordinarily and among the mass of men, the stranger is the potential enemy. He is under suspicion. Attempts at friendliness on his part are met with studied coldness. We are almost afraid lest on cars and in the streets we should wear so pleasant a countenance that someone would want to speak to us or think that we wanted to know them.

But it goes even further than this. We have what the Germans so thoughtfully call shaden-freude, joy in the ill luck of others. We seem to think that not only do we have a certain personal advantage from the bad luck of others but that our good luck is some way dependent upon the hurt of others. This, of course, comes down to us through a long social history; from the time when beast-like men fought for place and food and their survival depended upon the starvation and death of others. But we have advanced many thousand years from that day. Our happiness today is dependent and will in the future be increasingly dependent, upon the widest cooperation among men of intelligence and good will. And this will be easy only as we come to know and understand and sympathize with larger and larger numbers of our fellow human beings. Today the common misfortune of poverty is increasing this common humanity of men. They no longer stand simply as symbols: the employer, the boss, the hired girl, the merchant, the pedler, the ditch digger, the man on the street. All these have a chance in our leisure time and theirs to take on the flesh and blood of human beings. We stare at them and study them.

They suffer; they strive; they despair; they are sick and hungry. If we have a sense of humor, we laugh at them but it is a kindly laugh. We do not sneer and censure. We make new and rather unexpected friends and find friendliness where we did not ~~expect~~ await it. Above all we gain a certain tolerance. We are not so sure that the criminal was absolutely good for nothing; or that the shiftless man was simply lazy. We begin to realize the problem of the prostitute and of the thief and to cover all mankind with a veil of broad and broader charity.

Then beyond that we have (in our lack of work) unusual opportunity for knowledge, for study and learning. Perhaps in the parks and in public concerts we can actually sit still and listen to music as we never have before. We can find in the blending of silence and sound, not simply physical excitement but spiritual balm. We can consider the meaning of things; the geography and economy of the city's existence; the ~~meaning~~ place of work, the essence of wealth, the organization of government. Above all we can read. Now reading is an occupation which hitherto has taken very little of the time of Americans. There is no civilized country which does so little reading as America and pays so little for it. Where an American book sells 10,000 copies a Russian may sell 100,000. Where an Englishman pay $10 for his magazine, we are peeved because we get it for a dollar and surprised if it is not worth the dollar we pay for it. We demand in newspapers broad jokes and caricature and distortion of truth and we get what we demand.

Now in this new leisure which has been forced upon Americans, there is a chance for them to learn to read; and finding the newspaper sections of the library overcrowded, they may drift into the book section and discover books. They begin to become acquainted with that heritage sent down from the past, which is much more valuable than all the property and homes and jewels which we are seeking rather desperately now to guard. Here are the accumulated thoughts of man; sifted down to the best and broadest and most eternal; and we not only can read them; curiously enough in our poverty and unemployment we have time to read them. We have time to linger over them and re-read their words and to gather from them and from our new experience with want, and with the suffering of our fellows, and the disappointments of men, a new and deep knowledge of life. We have a chance to build a philosophy of living and without philosophy there is no real life.

A philosophy of life is a reasoned theory of the facts and surrounds of human beings. It raises us above hysteria, envy and hatred. We begin to see straight and to think clearly. We resist the temptation to let our life drift and disintegrate in the face of misfortune. Gradually and in the end we especially refuse to be misled by the temptation of gambling and chance. Perhaps chance has played its part in making us poor and without work. Perhaps too, certain indefensible kinds of gambling have placed wealth and power in hands that do not deserve them. But the cure for gambling in high places is not gambling among the poor; neither the glittering chances of the Irish Sweepstakes nor the disreputable and utterly unfair numbers game is going to answer our present problem of poverty. Rather these things by and large take from the poor even the little that they have and poverty cannot cure itself by feeding on poverty.

Men who face life squarely, no matter what their misfortune, have always the knowledge that they are not alone. It is a great and endless army that has travelled the world in misery from the dawn of history down to our day. And today we in America no matter what our trials can look across the world to people facing far greater evil than we. There are the hunted and murdered, the maimed and starving in Spain. There are the suffering in Asia, not simply in China but in Japan; not simply in countries which are at war but in countries like India where there is a situation called peace and yet where thousands regularly starve. There are the haunted homes after the earthquake in Chile; and we who sit in a city where at least some effort is made to relieve want, can think of the unrelieved need of the black and white tenant farmers of the South.

Despite the tendency undoubtedly strong to yield to wide despair in face of such disaster, we who see it and know it, know also that Courage is not simply a matter of drums and uniforms, of artifically inspired enthusiasm. It is rather in the midst of misfortune, to keep one's soul serene; to refuse to fret; to do the best under all circumstances and not to refuse or decry the seemingly cheap gifts of poverty: leisure, reading, thinking, knowing human beings. We can even go further than this and before the very wreck of a life, we can look death squarely in the face; death without trumpets, sermons and flowers - just sleep and rest.

Equitably and pleasantly we can realize that as we have been born, we are going to die; that this world is not simply one of pleasure but one of suffering even under the best of circumstances.

We may get even far enough to revise our ambitions. The ambitions of most Americans have been curiously childlish: they like to show off with a big ~~[illegible]~~ income, large house and loud clothes. We want ~~big~~ vast cities, tall buildings, and swift ~~[illegible]~~ cars, even at the expense of little souls, narrow prejudices and low desires. We want to spend money as though it made no difference how much we spent; as though we were not wasting the fruit of others' bitter toil; as though there were no end to our resources. With this bitter experience of poverty, we are forced to change all that. A class of Americans are appearing willing frankly to acknowledge to their neighbors that they cannot afford certain expenditures; that they are too poor to do this and to do that and that Poverty is no disgrace.

While we are all increasingly certain that the more grievous and dangerous aspects of dire poverty must be abolished, we have on the other hand slowly ceased to think of displacing poverty with the idea of wealth which we used to have. We used to conceive wealth as large and even riotous ability to expend even in the face of surrounding starvation, tuberculosis and syphilis; we dreamed and read greedily of excess of luxury and over-indulgence and our highest ambition was income to make us, in the old New England sense of the word, "independent" of our fellows.

We are thinking today of wealth not as independence but as more careful and orderly cooperation with our fellowmen. We conceive that a man's income should be a matter of public knowledge, public conern and intelligent public decision; so that no one would have a right to what he did not honestly earn or would be able to escape through ability to conceal his property sharing equitably the public burdens. We want a world that is wealthy in the sense that the mass of human beings are enabled to have what is necessary for their health and development and are not only compelled but eager to give for this such work and effort as they have at their command. And that, as a result, we may have for the democracy of the future, healthy, well-trained and intelligent beings, schooled in poverty and unwilling to accept any income which is not for the best interests of the whole land.

It is fitting that today we should remind ourselves of this progress by poverty because we are celebrating the birth of a man born in poverty, famous for his sympathy with human beings and for his unceasing desire to put every ounce of his effort into a determination to raise the status of the lowest and most unfortunate. Abraham Lincoln was born of a shiftless father and an illegimate mother. He was born in a cabin with mud floor, less comfortable than a Western barn. He knew hunger and dirt. He knew hard and unremitting work and rags. He was self-educated with all the imperfections and unfinished results of such training. He was ugly and gawky. His Civil War name in the South was the Gorilla.

But Abraham Lincoln knew human beings and what they experienced in this world. He had for them an unbounded and limitless sympathy. Time after time he turned away from work and almost from duty to help the unfortunate. And then too, he knew how to laugh and how to joke. His humor bubbled up in the midst of misery. His moods were ever a challenge to over-pompous men. With this training and this character he could and did withstand contempt, neglect and envy. He was called almost suddenly to high place, to the bitter surprise and indignation of the best people of his country, who did not hesitate to express their disappointment.

He undertook a thankless task of work and endurance and was damned as much for what he did as for what he did not do. He led a war to preserve slavery and then freed four million slaves because as he frankly said "Abandon all the posts now garrisoned by black men; take two hundred thousand men from our side and put them in the battlefield or cornfield against us, and we would be compelled to abandon the war in three weeks. . . . My enemies pretend I am now carrying on this war for the sole purpose of abolition. So long as I am President, it shall be carried on for the sole purpose of restoring the Union. But no human power can subdue this rebellion without the use of the emancipation policy, and every other policy calculated to weaken the moral and physical forces of the rebellion."

In the day of his hard won triumph he was murdered by an aristocrat and as he lay dead, his life of suffering and deprivation, of endless, thankless striving was carven in the deep lines of his countenance and his sagging shoulders pressed down upon his ungainly body. Progress by poverty made Abraham Lincoln a great man. May it keep us from becoming small.

8:57

1939

Orchestra Hall
Chicago, Illinois
February 12,1939

Progress by Poverty

By W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

During the last ten years almost for the first time, the American people have looked Poverty squarely in the face. There were plenty of poor people in this land before 1929 but as a nation we did not like to admit it. We clung long to our idea that this was primarily the land of wealth where everybody who would could be well-to-do; where people of fair ability could become millionaires; and where, on the whole, poverty was the fault of the poor.

Indeed, in those days we almost regarded poverty as a sort of crime. We arranged our laws so that the unemployed, the vagrants and wanderers could be put in jail and charged with misdemeanor. But today we have come to what seems to me the much saner and truer attitude. We realize that this is a world where most men are going to be poor. We may and must dispute the degree of that poverty; we are widely resolved to combat hunger, malnutrition and compulsory ignorance. But that the question of food, shelter and clothing is going to be a major problem for most Americans of the future, is something that we have got to admit. In other words the nation has met Poverty the Stranger, and begun to inquire about his ancestry and search his stature and lineaments so as never again to forget him or ignore him.

Do not misunderstand me. I am not teaching contentment with poverty, but rather bringing to your minds the fact that here is a situation which we must face. We no longer ignore it. We cannot forget it. No sooner have we faced Poverty the Stranger, than we recognize Poverty the Enemy. We know perfectly well that so long as poverty is dire and widespread there can be no effective attack upon sickness and crime; because sickness and crime primarily and fundamentally are the children of poverty. From this we realize that there is something basically wrong with our organization of life in this country and we have discussed it in all sorts of ways and proposed many remedies; but of that aspect I am not speaking tonight. I am rather insisting that whatever the cause and cure for poverty may be, and no matter how great its evil, we are living in the midst of it and for that reason we have got to assume toward it an attitude and a philosophy and not merely give ourselves over to nerves. In other words having met as a nation Poverty the Stranger; and having recognized in him Poverty the Enemy, I am asking you to consider this same poverty from another aspect and that is Poverty the Friend.

47-12-136

There is no doubt that poverty has its place in the world. I do not mean extreme want, starvation and hurtful deprivation - of this there is no defense and if it endures and spreads, civilization ceases. But on the other hand, it is not too much to say, that no human being is fit to live who has not known what poverty is; who has not known exactly what it means to be hungry, what it means not to be sure of tomorrow's food, to be at times uncomfortably and inadequately housed and clothed. It is not well that this experience should go so far as to cripple souls and bodies; but no one is fit to handle the wealth and opportunities of the world who does not know in his own life what their absence means and what their presence demands in thought and effort.

In a situation like ours today, with many millions unemployed, with many more millions on the margin of subsistence and perhaps a majority of us haunted by an unnamed fear; there are certain gifts that poverty

brings, certain warnings and incentives that are priceless. First of all, it curbs and restrains our self-righteousness. We are not so sure that it is our desert that raises us above want; our own effort that makes us efficient, or our sin that drags us down; we recognize vast forces within and without us, above and beneath, before which our puny might is helpless. Only in the mighty striving together of all men and powers, can we cope with evil and disaster.

Again today we begin to know the real meaning of Leisure. There are people who for the first time in their life are facing the problem of leisure. It is not to be sure the kind of leisure which they had pictured to themselves. The leisure of former American imagination was something that came after a man had satisfied all his wants, certainly all his physical wants; and then having nothing else to do, he looked around the world and straightly became bored. He became querulous and dissatisfied. He wanted to work just to keep busy; so as not to think, not to reflect. The leisure which comes to us today is different from that. Today leisure is thrust upon millions. It is leisure that we would rather not have if we could substitute for it hard work, interesting work, work that brought adequate income. Nevertheless, this leisure of unemployment and poverty is not wholly evil; it brings us real pause, we can stop and look at the world slowly and reflectively. We can realize that man was made for thought and feeling as well as action. That life is more than meat and the body more than raiment. We can bring back all the pictures of memory. We can, despite discomfort and distaste, become acquainted with ourselves and fulfill the first great law of philosophy - know thyself. We have a chance, as seldom before, to become aware of the marvelous physical world in which we live. Even in the crowded city we can look at sunsets, we can see clouds, trees and waters; we can watch the infinite change and vagaries of the weather.

47-12-138

But above and beyond that, we can become acquainted with human beings. It is astonishing even in great cities how little we know of our fellow men and how little we want to know. Isolation has become characteristic of city life. In the midst of crowds we are alone and we often pride ourselves on the numbers of persons whom we do not know and the few we accept as acquaintances and friends. Ordinarily and among the mass of men the stranger is the potential enemy. He is under suspicion. Attempts at friendliness on his part are met with studied coldness. We are almost afraid lest on cars and in the streets we should wear so pleasant a countenance that someone would want to speak to us or think that we wanted to know them.

But it goes even further than this. We have what the Germans so thoughtfully call shaden-freude, joy in the ill luck of others. We seem to think that not only do we have a certain personal advantage from the bad luck of others but that our good luck is some way dependent upon the hurt of others. This, of course, comes down to us through a long social history; from the time when beast-like men fought for place and food and their survival depended upon the starvation and death of others. But we have advanced many thousand years from that day. Our happiness today is dependent and will in the future be increasingly dependent, upon the widest cooperation among men of intelligence and good will. And this will be easy only as we come to know and understand and sympathize with larger and larger numbers of our fellow human beings. Today the common misfortune of poverty is increasing this common humanity of men. They no longer stand simply as symbols: the employer, the boss, the hired girl, the merchant, the pedler, the ditch digger, the man on the street. All these have a chance in our leisure time and theirs to take on the flesh and blood of human beings. We stare at them and study them. They suffer; they strive; they despair; they are sick and hungry. If we have a sense of humor, we laugh at them but it is a kindly laugh. We do not sneer and censure. We make new and rather unexpected friends and find friendliness where we did not await it. Above all we gain a certain tolerance. We are not so sure that the criminal was absolutely good for nothing; or that the shiftless man was simply lazy. We begin to realize the problem of the prostitute and of the thief and to cover all mankind with a veil of broad and broader charity.

47-12-139

Then beyond that we have in our lack of work unusual opportunity for knowledge, for study and learning. Perhaps in the parks and in public concerts we can actually sit still and listen to music as we never have before. We can find in the blending of silence and sound, not simply physical excitement but spiritual balm. We can consider the meaning of things; the geography and economy of the city's existence; the place of work, the essence of wealth, the organization of government. Above all we can read. Now reading is an occupation which hitherto has taken very little of the time of Americans. There is no civilized country which does so little reading as America and pays so little for it. Where an American book sells 10,000 copies a Russian may sell 100,000. Where an Englishman pays $10 for his magazine, we are peeved because we get it for a dollar and surprised if it is not worth the dollar we pay for it. We demand in newspapers bread jokes and caricature and distortion of truth and we get what we demand.

47-13-140

Now in this new leisure which has been forced upon Americans, there is a chance for them to learn to read; and finding the newspaper sections of the library overcrowded, they may drift into the book section and discover books. They begin to become acquainted with that heritage sent down from the past, which is much more valuable than all the property and homes and jewels which we are seeking rather desperately now to guard. Here are the accumulated thoughts of man; sifted down to the best and broadest and most eternal; and we not only can read them; curiously enough in our poverty and unemployment we have time to read them. We have time to linger over them and re-read their words and to gather from them and from our new experience with want, and with the suffering of our fellows, and the disappointments of men, a new and deep knowledge of life. We have a chance to build a philosophy of living and without philosophy there is no real life.

A philosophy of life is a reasoned theory of the facts and surroundings of human beings. It raises us above hysteria, envy and hatred. We begin to see straight and to think clearly. We resist the temptation to let our life drift and disintegrate in the face of misfortune. Gradually and in the end we especially refuse to be misled by the temptation of gambling and chance. Perhaps chance has played its part in making us poor and without work. Perhaps too, certain indefensible kinds of gambling have placed wealth and power in hands that do not deserve them. But the cure for gambling in high places is not gambling among the poor; neither the glittering chances of the Irish Sweepstakes nor the disreputable and utterly unfair numbers game is going to answer our problem of poverty. Rather these things by and large take from the poor even the little that they have and poverty cannot cure itself by feeding on poverty.

141-21-141

Men who face life squarely, no matter what their misfortune, have always the knowledge that they are not alone. It is a great and endless army that has travelled the world in misery from the dawn of history down to our day. And today we in America no matter what our trials can look across the world to people facing far greater evil than we. There are the hunted and murdered, the maimed and starving in Spain. There are the suffering in Asia, not simply in China but in Japan; not simply in countries which are at war but in countries like India where there is a situation called peace and yet where thousands regularly starve. There are the haunted homes after the earthquake in Chile; and we who sit in a city where at least some effort is made to relieve want, can think of the unrelieved need of the black and white tenant farmers of the South.

Despite the tendency undoubtedly strong to yield to wide despair in face of such disaster, we who see it and know it, know also that Courage is not simply a matter of drums and uniforms, of artificially inspired enthusiasm. It is rather in the midst of misfortune, to keep one's soul serene; to refuse to fret; to do the best under all circumstances and not to refuse or decry the seemingly cheap gifts of poverty: leisure, reading, thinking, knowing human beings. We can even go further than this and before the very wreck of a life, we can look death squarely in the face; death without trumpets, sermons and flowers - just sleep and rest. Equitably and pleasantly we can realize that as we have been born, we are going to die; that this world is not simply one of pleasure but one of suffering even under the best of circumstances.

47-12-142

We may get even far enough to revise our ambitions. The ambitions of most Americans have been curiously childish: they like to show off with a big income, large house and loud clothes. We want vast cities, tall buildings, and swift cars, even at the expense of little souls, narrow prejudices and low desires. We want to spend money as though it made no difference how much we spent; as though we were not wasting the fruit of others' bitter toil; as though there were no end to our resources. With this bitter experience of poverty, we are forced to change all that. A class of Americans are appearing willing frankly to acknowledge to their neighbors that they cannot afford certain expenditures; that they are too poor to do this and to do that and that Poverty is no disgrace.

While we are all increasingly certain that the more grievous and dangerous aspects of dire poverty must be abolished, we have on the other hand slowly ceased to think of displacing poverty with the idea of wealth which we used to have. We used to conceive wealth as large and even riotous ability to expend even in the face of surrounding starvation, tuberculosis and syphilis; we dreamed and read greedily of excess of luxury and over-indulgence and our highest ambition was income to make us, in the old New England sense of the word, "independent" of our fellows.

We are thinking today of wealth not as independence but as more careful and orderly cooperation with our fellowmen. We conceive that a man's income should be a matter of public knowledge, public concern and intelligent public decision; so that no one would have a right to what he did not honestly earn or would be able to escape through ability to conceal his property sharing equitably the public burdens. We want a world that is wealthy in the sense that the mass of human beings are enabled to have what is necessary for their health and development and are not only compelled but eager to give for this such work and effort as they have at their command. And that, as a result, we may have for the democracy of the future, healthy, well-trained and intelligent beings, schooled in poverty and unwilling to accept any income which is not for the best interests of the whole land.

417-12-143

It is fitting that today we should remind ourselves of this progress by poverty because we are celebrating the birth of a man born in poverty, famous for his sympathy with human beings and for his unceasing desire to put every ounce of his effort into a determination to raise the status of the lowest and most unfortunate. Abraham Lincoln was born of a shiftless father and an illegitimate mother. He was born in a cabin with mud floor, less comfortable than a Western barn. He knew hunger and dirt. He knew hard and unremitting work and rags. He was self-educated with all the imperfections and unfinished results of such training. He was ugly and gawky. His Civil War name in the South was the Gorilla.

But Abraham Lincoln knew human beings and what they experienced in this world. He had for them an unbounded and limitless sympathy. Time after time he turned away from work and almost from duty to help the unfortunate. And then too, he knew how to laugh and how to joke. His humor bubbled up in the midst of misery. His moods were ever a challenge to over-pompous men. With this training and this character he could and did withstand contempt, neglect and envy. He was called almost suddenly to high place, to the bitter surprise and indignation of the best people of his country, who did not hesitate to express their disappointment.

47-12-1441

He undertook a thankless task of work and endurance and was damned as much for what he did as for what he did not do. He led a war to preserve slavery and then freed four million slaves because as he frankly said "Abandon all the posts now garrisoned by black men; take two hundred thousand men from our side and put them in the battlefield or cornfield against us, and we would be compelled to abandon the war in three weeks. . . . My enemies pretend I am now carrying on this war for the sole purpose of abolition. So long as I am President, it shall be carried on for the sole purpose of restoring the Union. But no human power can subdue this rebellion without the use of the emancipation policy, and every other policy calculated to weaken the moral and physical forces of the rebellion."

In the day of his hard won triumph he was murdered by an aristocrat and as he lay dead, his life of suffering and deprivation, of endless, thankless striving was carven in the deep lines of his countenance and his sagging shoulders pressed down upon his ungainly body. Progress by poverty made Abraham Lincoln a great man. May it keep us from becoming small.

40-78-1

THE ECONOMIC PLIGHT OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO

by

W. E. Burghardt Du Bois

One may usually hear several different theories of the present economic condition of American Negroes; the reasons for it and the remedies. One of the most common is current among Negroes themselves as well as among white folk: Negroes are shiftless; they do not seize the main chance; they do not work hard and continuously; their homes are ill-kept and the condition of Negro quarters in cities is proverbial. Especially the young folk are not as careful and steady and responsible as their fathers.

Such criticism easily turns into matters of racial difference. The argument has often run thus: Europe, America, the white world has a tremendous technical mastery. They have invented and brought into common use miracles of mechanical efficiency. By this token they are a superior race and when compared to Asiatics and Negroes and indeed to the great majority of people on earth they are so naturally and evidently superior that it goes without saying that other folk are going to be found in a subordinate economic condition and are destined to stay there because of sheer lack of ability. When, therefore, one finds in the United States poor and ignorant Negroes largely unemployed and in many cases unemployable you see simply the results of racial selection evident in all the world and destined to continue indefinitely.

